That spell was put upon her by Dr. Quackenbos, who is one of the greatest authorities on hypnotism in the world. It is a case of Trilby in real life. The actress was brought to Dr. Quackenbos by her manager. She had been attacked by stage fright as the time for her appearance as a leading woman approached. Her manager tried to reassure her, but his efforts were unavailing, and as a last resort he took her to Dr. Quackenbos. Professor Quackenbos accepted the case with enthusiasm.

PUTS SPELL UPON WOMAN.

He threw the actress into the hypnotic state. The suggestions made to the actress were in part disclosed by Dr. Quackenbos to the psychological section of the Medico-Legal society. He referred to the actress as "an actress inspired by me within the year and risen at a single bound to fame and fortune."

"After treatment by hypnotism," he said, "this lady went before the footlights a consummate mistress of her art, to be curtained seven times after the climax of the play."

SUGGESTIONS MADE TO ACTRESS.

The suggestions made by Dr. Quackenbos to the actress after she had been thrown into the hypnotic condition were partly as follows:

"You are now in a position to realize your talent and your power over its expression, and you are going on the stage free from all agitation.

Your acting throughout will be consistent with this interpretation, sincere and natural in its tone.

"Realizing the efficiency within you, your whole being instinct with an intense vitality, you will naturally and unconstrainedly cast into your art all the magic that fascinates, all the control that holds an audience from first to last—your self-possession retained, but your self-consciousness all but submerged in your impersonation."

HYPNOTISM A VALUABLE AGENT

Dr. Quackenbos seen to-day at his office, supplemented this example of hypnotic suggestion with others equally startling. He denied, however, that the actress mentioned in his paper was at the time she made her great success this fall in a trance of the Trilby order. He said:

"She was not in a trance the night she made her first appearance, and I was not even present in the theater, but the subliminal force in her being had been made for the time the dominant force, and her self-consciousness was completely obliterated.

"That is all there is in the treatment. The operator brings into activity the dormant psychic power in the subject. Hypnotic suggestion will not give a man knowledge—it simply enables him to comprehend things that he has known but half forgotten; it will bring to his fingers ends all the knowledge he has ever had, and inspire him with an overwhelming confidence in himself.

VIOLINIST CURED OF FAULTS.

"There is a young woman violinist appearing in this city to-day who a short time ago was almost ruined in her art by self-consciousness. I know nothing about violin playing, but by putting her into a hypnotic sleep and impressing on her that she was capable of the highest expression on her instrument, she performs now as one inspired. See her some day and notice the utter absence of self-consciousness in her work.

MINISTERS SEEK INSPIRATION.

"I have also had a number of ministers of various denominations who got into that state where they dreaded the coming of Sunday. They come to me at regular intervals. I put them into a hypnotic sleep and by suggestion make them think that it is not themselves talking, but the spirit of God speaking through them. Some powerful sermons preached in local pulpits recently and reported in the press have come immediately after a hypnotic sleep.

"Recently I had a young woman singer come here from California to study under one of the most distinguished teachers in the city. She had a splendid voice, but had certain vices of expression which the teacher told her would take two years to correct. One hypnotic sleep was sufficient to correct these faults entirely and almost incur the enmity of her music teacher. It was done by simply impressing her with a conviction that the faults did not exist.

HELI'S STUDENTS IN COLLEGE.

"The same method has worked successfully with scores of students in Columbia University. I had one man last June, the son of a wealthy man in the city, who was promised a trip abroad if he successfully passed his examination. He felt absolutely hopeless of being able to pass, and came to me in despair to be experimented upon. The experiment was a complete success, and he took his coveted trip through Europe. By hypnotic suggestion all the knowledge gained by him during the year was simply brought to his fingers' ends, so to speak."

"Elsie's Little Brother Tom," By Alwyn M. Thurber, is one of the best of books in the realm of stories for boys and girls, and not excepting older people. It is a fine birthday or holiday gift. MORRIS PRATT INSTITUTE.

Moses Hull Has a Few Words to Say About It.

The time is ripe to make known the condition of affairs about our prospective college. Those who see and think aright can but regard the movement to found a college as at least one of the greatest movements ever undertaken by Spiritualists.

When I embraced Spiritualism thirty-nine years ago, my boast was that we had more talent—more ability in the young men and women occupying our platforms than could be found in an equal number of young people anywhere. Spiritualism was at that time considered something of a curiosity and the best card of a rising speaker was the fact that he was not educated. That day has forever gone.

Where are the young workers of our cause now? Those who were young workers in the cause in the early sixties are now either old workers in the cause—veterans in the cause, or they have passed to the other side, or fallen out of our ranks. Who takes their places? I was astonished to hear President Harrison D. Barrett say that there were not twenty of our workers under forty years old; I thought the statement exaggerated, but I have tried for two weeks to find, or think of the names of twenty of our active workers under forty years of age. Spiritualists, they are not to be found. Can anyone tell why?

The fact is, able, intelligent, respectable young men and women are not willing to go before the world as public workers unprepared. They want, in addition to what the spirit world can do for them, that preparation which culture can give. Spiritualism has never been able to thus equip its advocates. Unitarians, Universalists, and other liberal denominations have schools; they invite our young men and our young women to go to them and graduate. A few dozen of them have done so. When such have come out of school, they have had less of Spiritualism than when they entered; a pulpit was always ready for them in the denomination whose college they patronized. The result was that they were lost to us. On this, I could give a lengthy list of familiar names of people who once filled our rostrums with honor to themselves and the cause they loved. I will only mention Hayden, Brunton, Lynn and Brown.

One of our young men who attended one session of our training school became so hungry for that knowledge of which our short school only gave him a taste, that he wrote and asked my advice about his going into a Unitarian college. He told of the generous offer they made him. Of course I could not advise him not to go. Whether he is trying to make a Unitarian minister of himself or not I have not heard. That was his determination at last accounts. At this rate how many ministers will we have in another decade or two. I am not able to now count five Spiritualist lecturers under twenty-five years old.

Who, in all the world would go into the Methodist or Presbyterian ministry if these denominations gave their ministers no opportunity to come out educationally the equals of the ministers of other denominations? I must repeat what I have so often said,

WE MUST EDUCATE OUR WORKERS OR PERISH.

I took my pencil to talk about the Morris Pratt Institute. When the N. S.A. failed to do anything more than to vote "aye," on the generous offer of Morris Pratt to give the Spiritualists of the world a college building—when no attempt was made to raise one penny to start this work, then some of us felt that something must be done; and that it must be done immediately. We had too long seen and talked about the necessity of this work to let this golden opportunity go by unnoticed. Seven of us took the matter in hand, (or rather six of us, for we used one name without authority, and were asked to drop it, which we did). We six got the property, to hold until the N. S. A., or others would take it and go to work. We called a meeting to organize a something which would undertake to present an educational front to the world. Mr. Barrett, of the N. S. A., who has first, last, and every time favored an educational movement, came to that meeting; but he came under instructions to pledge the N. S. A. to nothing; so he could only work as an individual. The result was, we were compelled to form a corporation, and go to work.

Our learned attorney, Hon. William H. Rogers, had formed and dissolved many corporations. With him to guide us, we soon brought order out of chaos. A corporation was organized under the laws of Wisconsin. This corporation is managed by nine trustees, two of whom are to be the president of the N. S. A., and the president of the Wisconsin Association of Spiritualists. The officers of the corporation are to be elected annually by and from its board of trustees. At present its officers are, President, Moses Hull; vice-president and attorney, W. H. Rogers, of Madison, Wis.; secretary, Mrs. Clara L. Stewart, of Whitewater, Wis.; treasurer, John C. Bump, of Milwaukee, Wis.

The membership fee is to be five dollars for the first year; after that the dues will be one dollar per year. We have formulated plans of raising money by donations, subscriptions, scholarships and bequests.

The college will be run the first two years as an academy, after which, its students, if they wish, can enter upon a college course. We have so arranged matters that persons who do not wish to take a mathematical or scientific course, or a course in other languages besides our own, can take special courses of study which will prepare them for platform work. This special course can be completed in a two-years' course of thirty-six weeks each. The whole tuition will be only fifty dollars per year. Good, hygienic board will not exceed $3.50 per week.

As Brother A. J. Weaver has been made principal instructor and superintendent of the work in the school rooms, and appointed to prepare a curriculum for each course of study, to present to the trustees for approval, I cannot speak with exact authority as to the studies it will be thought necessary to pursue in order to prepare students for platform work. I can, however, say that it will embrace Oratory, Voice and Physical Culture; English Language and Rhetoric, Bible Exegetics, the Higher Criticism; Comparative Theology, Logic, Parliamentary Law, and Psychic Culture. All of which, it is estimated can be obtained in two years, and at an expense for tuition of one hundred dollars.

The academic year begins on Tuesday, Sept. 2, 1902, and continues until the holidays. The second term begins on January 5, 1903, and lasts eighteen weeks.

We are now spending quite a sum of money in getting letter heads, envelopes and blanks printed. We will soon publish a pamphlet giving full instructions as to our work and methods. The preparations for work, and the work of the first year of our college, I estimate will cost about four thousand dollars.

The most of this must be made up by memberships, subscriptions, bequests and endowments. We need several hundred dollars of the money now.

As president of this college I make an appeal to the liberal for help. Of all the great works undertaken by Spiritualism, history will write this down as the greatest, the most far-reaching and important. I doubt whether money can be placed where it will do the world and the donor as much good as in this work. Let us hear from honorable, liberal men and women, who consider themselves as stewards over the means placed in their possession.

I cannot close this without adding that our Training School at Lily Dale, will be continued at least one more year, on the same conditions as heretofore. It opens on Tuesday, May 13, and closes on Thursday, July 11. Those wanting full particulars will correspond either with Mrs. Hull, 72 York street, Buffalo, or with Rev. A. J. Weaver, Old Orchard, Maine.

Hoping to hear from all who are interested in educational movements, I am as ever, MOSES HULL.

TOO SENSITIVE TO LIVE.

Pathetic Suicide of an Accountant.

In the unusually pathetic suicide of Michael Leviash, whose body has been laid away at Graceland, we have another proof that there is no mystery like that of temperament.

This tender-hearted, affectionate young man, the devoted husband of a happy wife and the father of two beautiful children, was employed for the past three years as bookkeeper and auditor in one of the larger wholesale houses of Chicago.

As an accountant he was an expert; in every detail of his work he was painstaking and accurate. There was never so much as a whisper against either his ability or his integrity.

His domestic relations were in a way ideal. Between himself, his wife and his children there was nothing but love and peace.

The wolf was not howling at the door of his home. Instead he was amply able to give his loved ones all that was required to make them comfortable and happy.

He stood well among his neighbors and acquaintances. Many of them, when seen to-day, spoke of the dead man as having been one of the finest characters they ever knew. All respected him and loved him.

And yet this man, who seemed to have every reason to want to live, this man for whom life seemed to have so many charms and so much promise, on last Wednesday afternoon deliberately swallowed the poison which brought his life to its close!

PLUNGES INTO ETERNITY.

The young wife whom he passionately loved; the little ones who, at evening time, were wont to gather about his knees; the relatives and friends who loved him—to them all he said, "Good-by!" and deliberately took a wild plunge into eternity!

As already stated, young Leviash was employed as bookkeeper in a large Chicago wholesale house, and it was in the office of this establishment that he found the cause of his destruction.

The story, as told by his brother to-day, is as follows:

"His fellow bookkeepers and accountants in the office persisted in perpetrating upon him all sorts of practical jokes. They would cut the buttons from his overcoat, pin paper to his back, hide his pens, and in a hundred ways play their pranks upon him.

"They seemed to have a mania for tormenting him, and seemed to immensely enjoy the flush that would come to his face and the tremor that quivered on his lip.

"He pleaded with them to desist, but the more he begged the more they tormented him. He was an 'easy mark' and they seemed to find delight in his embarrassment, they appeared to rejoice in his humiliation."

And here the mystery of temperament comes in! Leviash might have checkmated the mischievous fellows in either of two ways: He might have paid no attention to their pranks and so shamed them into decency; or, after duly pleading with them to let him alone, he might have given the ringleaders a sound thrashing.

But Leviash did neither of these things. He was not built that way. He was gentle and he was sensitive and when the annoyance became greater than he could bear he gave up his position and sought a place elsewhere.

About a month ago he was engaged as bookkeeper by a firm in Ottumwa, Iowa.

After some days' work there he discovered a shortage in the accounts of his predecessor and the thought that the discovery might be the means of sending someone to the penitentiary preyed upon his mind.

He spoke of it to his employers, and declared to them that he could not stay, that the discovery of the defalcation had almost driven him mad!

They implored him to remain, but he could not bear the thought of aiding in sending even a total stranger to prison, and he forthwith resigned.

WAS DOWNCAST AND DESPONDENT.

Last Monday he reached Chicago, downcast and despondent, and on Wednesday ended the life which he felt that he could no longer endure!

One of the strangest pages in all the book of human life! Killed by his sensitiveness! Destroyed because of the very fineness and purity of his soul! The victim of his own nobility of nature!

Verily, it is one of the strangest stories that ever came to human ears! May the sod rest lightly on poor Michael Leviash! May the snows fall gently and lovingly upon his grave up yonder in Graceland!

And may we try to feel as charitable as possible toward those who in the office of the Chicago establishment were wont to play their pranks upon the thin-skinned, sensitive bookkeeper.

It is but fair to think that they were as ignorant as the rest of us of the deep mystery of temperament. They saw the "easy mark" and struck at it with their mischievous shafts, but we cannot think that the mischief was malicious or that they fully realized the pain they were inflicting.

It is believed that the sad sequel will teach them a lesson—even the lesson of loving thoughtfulness; so that if in the future they are thrown into the company of those who are oversensitive they will respect the temperament and conduct themselves like gentlemen.—Rev. Thomas B. Gregory in Chicago American.

JESUS A FACT.

The Gospels Prove It!—Church Value Appreciated.

I left Albany December 11, after a pleasant ten days' visit and two Sunday meetings, and picking up valuable facts and exchanging ideas, I also went to church! I like to learn all sides of all questions, and come in touch with all varieties of mind and character. I do not suffer from fear that error will stick to me, if I happen to walk awhile in its shadows and listen to its echoes. But the church is not all bad, and I am not all good. It has much truth and I want it, but must be my own judge of its values. A man that could not find food for thought in a modern church must be lacking in mental resources. But this church was not of the rigid type. It is where Bro. E. A. Doty goes when the Spiritualists furnish no attraction for his growing mind; and this cause has led many thousands to the various churches for intellectual supplies; and they have become regular attendants at church, whereas if Spiritualists had made an effort and supplied reliable talent to entertain and instruct thinkers, they might have held all of these and added many more, and instead of the wail of despondency, and decline of local societies, there might have been to-day a strong, healthy, vigorous movement, and large, growing societies, all over the land. But the Unitarians, without the chief attraction that we have, by their steady work and intellectualism, have absorbed thousands of the most substantial supporters that once led in Spiritualism.

It was the Rev. Mr. Brundage—Unitarian—that we listened to on the morning of December 8, and his subject was the "Historical Jesus." He had studied it thoroughly. But he made some rather curious statements. He affirmed that outside of the Gospels there is not a single fact or evidence regarding him. Then of course the Gospels are the only witnesses. But he said he had examined the subject critically and exhaustively, and satisfied himself that there is no historic character in the annals of the world more real, or better attested than that of Jesus of Nazareth! And to emphasize it he said that the evidence was so complete that to question it was to incur the suspicion of intellectual imbecility! Now it occurred to me that the Gospels being the only evidence, as he claimed, this was assuming that to doubt the authority of the Gospels, is a sign of mental weakness. I wonder if I correctly interpreted his thought. I talked with Bro. Doty about it, and he understood it as I did. It may be said, and doubtless will be, that it is a matter of no consequence whether Jesus is a real historical character or not. But I think it is of some importance to know the truth, if we can, about any and all subjects that engage our attention; and a character that occupies so conspicuous a place in the world's thought, and in the history of nations, cannot be an indifferent subject for study, and in anything we deal with, truth is of the first importance. What happens to most interest us personally should not be made a standard for the whole world. Upon the historic life of Jesus the issue of many important problems may depend, as upon the character he represents many of the psychic questions of human life may be considered, and perhaps settled. So, too, it may seem, to some, that the question of God, or "Infinite Intelligence," is not worth discussing. But so long as these ideas enter into the problems of human life and affect the thinking and the moral sentiments of society, it cannot be an indifferent subject to engage our efforts, and elicit study and discussion.

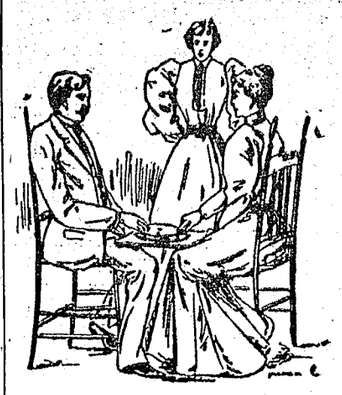
Mr. Brundage emphasized the claim that Jesus was in all respects a man, and the Son of God, only as we are all the sons and daughters of God. This is the view that has been entertained and taught by Spiritualists for the past fifty-three years, and the Unitarians are doing good work in carrying much of the Spiritual philosophy to those in outer darkness whom we cannot reach because they will not hear us.

LYMAN C. HOWE.

Which Is the Better Way?

Many who congratulate themselves upon the pleasure and enjoyment of advanced thought and reason, along lines agreed upon in any system, can remember a time when they looked upon the new, or strange, philosophy with dread, if not with downright repugnance. In the course of events, however, these objections and opposers moved into line, and assumed a place in the ranks of the investigators, and became champions of the subject matter, as well as companions of those whom they had feared or even despised.

Thus has it ever been—life lapping upon life, age lapping upon age—in the search of knowledge and the enjoyment of progress. All movements in the wonderful realm of change from darkness to light bring with them this experience to its votaries. Its enemies of to-day are its friends of to-morrow.



The attainment of perfection and absolute truth has been the vision and dream of the philosopher and seer, from which the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, time out of mind, from the beginning. During all this time the light has been shining through darkness, ever, always gaining in clearness and intensity, yet the background for its development has been the blackness with which it has been surrounded. Truth emanates in shining waves of lustre, glory and brilliancy, out from among the dark fringes of the cloudy night of time, ever moving into and toward the perfect day, that we trust will eventually dawn upo nthe human race in all its power and resplendent beauty.

Holding up to contempt and ridicule what another may accept as true is an infallible sign of weakness. Truth operates as a destroyer of this intolerant spirit and imparts to the recipient the grace of good-will and patience. Keen, sarcastic references to things commonly accepted and that has the appearance of absurdity to the one who has passed through and beyond such environment, may arrest the attention and arouse the interest of some, and no doubt it does, but there is a possibility that others at the same time may be driven away from a just consideration of that which would have been a benefit and comfort to them had they been otherwise approached. Therefore, it is fair to presume, as an accepted truth, that it is the patient, loving heart back of the outward expression, which furnishes the potency to compel a recognition of that which may be desired. In other words, it is the better, the more powerful, consequently the nearest approximation to the perfect way, of presenting what is esteemed and accepted as true—to do it, as far as possible, in such a manner as to show that you fully believe it, by your loving earnestness and candor.

THE PSYCHOGRAPH

—OR—

DIAL PLANCHETTE.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than seven years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means of developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive Communications?

The Psychograph is an invaluable assistant. A pamphlet with full directions for the

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt. D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

THE LYCEUM GUIDE

Do you want to organize a society, for the social, intellectual and spiritual advancement of the children and adults?

THE PROGRESSIVE LYCEUM

furnishes all you desire.

Do you want a self-sustaining society, founded on the basic principles of the spiritual philosophy? You have it in THE PROGRESSIVE LYCEUM.
It furnishes a system of evolution by internal growth; not the old cup and plate or Sunday-school.
It has something to interest and advance every member, and those who are most active in teaching are the ones who learn most.

NO SPECIAL INSTRUCTOR REQUIRED.

THE LYCEUM GUIDE gives every detail needed for effective organization, and for conducting the society when established.
It has Golden Chain Recitations; the prettiest songs and music; choral responses; a service for a Band of Mercy; calisthenics; how to make the badges, flags and banners; marching exercises; full instructions in conducting the exercises, with parliamentary rules, etc.
Many Spiritualists living in isolation, have formed lyceums in their own families; others have banded, two or three families together, while large societies have organized on the lyceum platform, and found great interest in this self-instructive method.
Do not wait for a "missionary" to come to your assistance, but take hold of the matter yourself, procure copies of the GUIDE, and commence with the few or many you find interested.
Mrs. Emma Rood Tuttle (address, Berlin Heights, Ohio) will answer all questions pertaining to lyceum work.
The price of THE LYCEUM GUIDE is 50 cents, postpaid, or by the dozen, 40 cents each, by express, charges paid by receiver. Address

JOYS BEYOND THE THRESHOLD

A Sequel to The To-morrow of Death.

By Louis Figuier. Translated from the French. The To-morrow of death was written to develop the idea of the principle of the permanence of the human soul after death, and its reincarnation in a chain of new beings, whose successive links are unrolled to the bosom of ethereal space. "Beyond the Threshold" continues on the same lines, enlarging and expanding the idea by reasons and considerations drawn from science and philosophy, claiming that the certainty of a new birth beyond our earthly end is the best means of arming ourselves against all weakness in the presence of death, and that the help offered by science and philosophy to that end is far superior to that of any of the existing religions. From beginning to end it is interesting, entertaining, instructive and fascinating, and whether one accepts it all or not, much will have been learned and much pleasure enjoyed in its perusal. Price, $1.25.

Psychopathy, or Spirit Healing.

A series of lessons on the relations of the spirit to its own organism, and the interrelation of human beings with reference to health, disease and healing. By the spirit of Dr. Benjamin Rush, through the mediumship of Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond. A book that every healer, physician and Spiritualist should read. Price, $1.50.

THE DIAKKA. The Diakka and Their Earthly Victims. By the Seer A. J. Davis. A very interesting and suggestive work. It is an explanation of much that is false and repulsive in Spiritualism, embodying a most important recent interview with James Victor Wilson, a resident of Summer Land. Price, 50 cents.

The Spiritual Wreath.

A collection of words and music for the choir, congregation and social circle. By S. W. Tucker. Comprises sixty or more gems of song. Price, 15 cents.

Basis of Solid Success.

We trust that no one will think The Progressive Thinker is over-insistent in pressing upon its readers' attention the importance of the Progressive Lyceum as a factor in the development and growth of Spiritualism. It must be apparent to every thoughtful mind, that the influence of the culture imparted to the young—and not excluding those of mature years—must largely determine their tone and cast of thought concerning Spiritualism and spiritual things. Like the culture received in Sunday-Schools, the impress there imparted to the child will cling while life lasts.

The ordinary Sunday-School impress is adverse to Spiritualism, and distinctly inimical to all that pertains to the name. For Spiritualism is opposed to the recognized teachings of orthodoxy and its "scheme of salvation" for man.

It is a question for Spiritualists to consider, it is worthy their most serious thought; whether they shall let their children's minds be moulded after orthodox models of religious teaching, with all that it implies in dogmas and doctrinal beliefs, and mind dwarfing restrictions against brave and fearless thinking and investigation; or, shall they teach and encourage the bravest search for truth, fearless of any evil consequences to the "soul." Shall they be taught to hate and despise Spiritualism, or taught to love and cherish it as the purest embodiment of the most precious truths ever made known to mortal man?

The question comes to just this, and it is for Spiritualists to decide for themselves. The future of our cause is wrapped up in their decision, whether our growth and expansion shall be assuredly rapid and solid, or, on the other hand, fitful, locally evanescent, with weak societies, that tend to die out as the membership passes away to the great Beyond.

The way to increase in solid membership is by interesting the young, and by proper teaching, getting them well grounded in the truths, the facts, the philosophy and ethics of Spiritualism, and this can be accomplished by the means of the home circle and the Progressive Lyceum. These, reinforced with a good Spiritualist paper for general information, will eventuate in solid, enduring Spiritualists and Spiritualist societies, a solid help to mediums and speakers.

Lying as a Result of Prayer.

It may seem a harsh thing to say, but from a point of philosophical reason, as well as from many an individual experience, it may be averred that the practice of praying, as a matter of compulsory duty, cultivates a habit of lying. When a "minister of the gospel," for instance, arises in his pulpit—or a deacon in his pew—and drones out a forced prayer—without heart or felt sincerity, but just because he thinks he must pray, to fulfill the ceremonial formalities and proprieties of the occasion, what is it but a lie, instead of a real prayer?

We have known a devoutly pious Christian mother, after giving voice to her own earnest prayer, awake her young son from his sleep, on his knees, and authoritatively bid him pray; which he did, because he felt he must obey—not because he felt like praying. He went through the "motions" of praying, but he did not "feel" the prayer, and it was all "put on," in fact a lie.

All that species of prayers do, then, cultivate the lying habit; and many fathers and mothers have made liars of their children by making them pray.

In this connection it is gratifying to read in the Chicago Tribune of recent date, that old-time methods of conveying teachings of morality to pupils of lower grade and high schools were declared useless by William L. Crane, of the Steele High School of Dayton, Ohio, at the educational conference at the University of Chicago.

The speaker asserted that the mumbling of the Lord's Prayer by pupils who took no cognizance of what they were saying was one of the worst practices in classrooms, and he added that the committing of verses by young pupils in which they voiced a desire to be juvenile paragons made "cheerful little liars" out of children.

"Little work of the secondary educational system directed toward character building has ended in distinct achievement," said Mr. Crane in his talk on social and moral aspects of secondary education. "So many methods have been tried to lead students to ways of morality that the students never seem to have a clear idea of their moral duties. A new device for enlarging on the moral nature will make schools drop their current systems and run after a new scheme.

"One of the earliest methods of teaching children moral lessons was to give them little verses to repeat, in which they told of their wish to emulate the faultless little boys and girls depicted in the rhymes. A practice of lying was thus developed, because the children usually had no such wish.

"Another practice in the schools that does not produce the good that is wished for it is the repeating of the Lord's Prayer by the class in unison. Pupils mouth the prayer with small thought of its meaning and come to feel that this performance is all that is required to evince their feelings of morality.

"Morality in the school does not come from the plan of pupil government. It is better that children should fear the teacher than distrust each other. Pupil government is the father of fear and the grandfather of many crimes. Fear casteth out all love as much as love casteth out all fear. Let the children be induced rather than forced to be moral."

God and the Creed.

The following from the editorial columns of the Chicago Inter Ocean reads as though it might have been written by some clerical apologist for and defender of Calvinistic theology—a theology which, whether it be based upon Scripture text or not, runs counter to the moral conceptions of justice and right implanted in the constitution of mankind:

The Presbyterian revision committee, now in session at Washington, has declined to give out any partial statement of its work. Thus the public, in considering what is likely to be done, is thrown back upon what the General Assembly approved in the former committee's report. That report recommended that this committee be instructed to prepare amendments to four specified sections and one whole chapter of the Westminster Confession, and should add statements concerning the love of God for all men, missions, and the Holy Spirit.

One of the sections to be amended is that which denounces the Roman pontiff as Antichrist. Another contains a sentence which may be held to justify refusal to take oath to support a non-Christian government. These relics of the political passions of the time when they were written can certainly be dispensed with. Still another declares unavailing the good works of the unregenerate. It is hard to see why this should be objected to. It simply affirms that God will, as men constantly do, regard the motive as well as the act.

The fourth is the famous declaration as to "elect infants," probably the excuse for more ignorant slander of Calvinism than any other clause in the Confession. Yet in this the Westminster divines did but stop short where they saw human knowledge must end. No man can positively affirm that all dying in infancy are saved. To do so would be to limit the power of God. So the question was wisely left open, but with it was coupled the affirmation that the Holy Spirit can save without means, when and where and how he please. Thus, without presuming to set bounds to Omnipotence, there was offered that steadfast hope in which all may agree.

The main object of revision, however, was evidently chapter 3 of the Confession, concerning the doctrine of election and its logical correlative of preterition, with the latter's logical implication that sin may be so fatal as to require eternal punishment. The former committee declared it to be "the mind of the church" that "God is not willing that any one should perish, nor is it his decree, but the wickedness of their own hearts, which shuts men out from salvation." As only sixty-three presbyteries out of 233 agreed upon any definite proposal, it is hard to see how "the mind of the church" was ascertained. Nevertheless, the General Assembly appointed a committee to proceed with revision. Thus the main question before the committee is whether the doctrine of election, with its correlative and implication, shall be modified.

There is no doubt that many modern minds have so exalted the idea that God is Love that they have lost sight of the idea that he is also Justice. Hence they resent the idea that God can possibly punish any sin severely. They distort justice into cruelty, and would abolish hell because hell concretely expresses the possibility of the severest punishment. In other words, because God did not see fit to create a universe without sin and suffering, they ask us to change our conception of God from that of an absolute monarch to that of a constitutional president.

The attack upon the Westminster Confession is really an attack upon the absolute sovereignty of God. This is a democratic age, full of the idea that the universe was made for man, and that his notions of good taste should regulate its conduct. Calvin and other theologians of the past started not from man, but from God, and courageously declared that nothing, either good or evil, happened in his universe against his will. They denied that human happiness and misery were the result of good and evil powers in conflict, and affirmed that both existed by the will of God.

The questions, then, that the revision committee and the next General Assembly are to answer are fundamentally: To which conception of God will the Presbyterian Church adhere? Will it declare him limited by human desires, or the absolute sovereign of his universe?

The effort of the Presbyterian revisers is a vain attempt to achieve the impossible; that is, to reconcile Calvinism with the enlightened moral sense of man.

"God is not willing that any one should perish, nor is it his decree," and yet God "foreordains whatsoever comes to pass"—which includes the sins and ultimate damnation of souls. These statements involve a direct contradiction, as every sane mind must perceive. Some souls are lost; if they are lost without God's decree, he does not foreordain whatsoever comes to pass.

If "nothing, either good or evil, happened in his universe against his will," then sin and damnation are according to God's will. There is no use in trying to evade this conclusion.

The fact is, Calvinistic theology is full of contradictions of itself, and of man's reason and moral sense. The Presbyterian revisers ought to frankly recognize this fact, and totally discard the whole system. In a later age of the world, it will be a matter of amazement that such theology was ever believed and contended for, by reasoning human beings.

It may be stated as a fact that there is no possible method by which the idea of the love and justice of God can be reconciled with the idea of His predestinating or foreordaining from all eternity that some members of the human family should suffer endless misery.

If God foreordains whatsoever comes to pass, He foreordains all sin and that the sinner shall be punished for what he was foreordained to do.

All this beating around the bush in apologizing to man's sense of justice and right, is a vain attempt to excuse and defend an inexcusable and indefensible act on the part of the Calvinistic God.

Absolute sovereignty can have no more moral right than a limited sovereignty to run counter to justice.

The world is outgrowing Calvinistic notions, and the Presbyterian Church authorities are compelled to make at least a feint of moving with the trend of man's moral sense, in the direction of larger and sweeter truths.

Spiritualism is one of the propelling forces compelling the advance of the churches toward higher and better religious views.

A Noted Medium in Prison.

A dispatch from London, Eng., to the Chicago Tribune, states that Ann Odelia Diss de Bar and Theodore Jackson were on December 20 found guilty on the charge of immoral practices and obtaining money and jewelry under false pretenses. It took the jury only five minutes to agree upon the verdict. The Judge, with equal celerity, sentenced Jackson to fifteen years' imprisonment at hard labor and Diss de Bar to seven.

Mrs. Diss de Bar was a well known medium in New York and Chicago, but was a total wreck morally. She was in the penitentiarry of this State for two years. She was a bad woman in every sense of the word, continually mixing genuine spirit manifestations with the fraudulent.

When the sentences were pronounced neither prisoner uttered a word. Theodore immediately turned and walked down the steps of the dock to the cells. The "Swami," smiling to the last, bowed to the Judge and court, and also disappeared.

The closing scenes of the trial were somewhat dramatic. Both Jackson and his reputed wife addressed the jury in their own behalf.

When the case for the prosecution was closed the defendants announced that they would not call any witnesses, but would testify in their own behalf.

Jackson was then sworn and commenced an address, much in the nature of a lecture, in the course of which he claimed to be a man bound to single life by religious vows, and emphatically denied the testimony furnished as to his conduct with Daisy Adams, whose story, he said, was a tissue of falsehoods. He described the female prisoner as a medium through whom he, Jackson, had communicated with his "spirit wife."

Jackson declared that he possessed 7,280 acres of land in Florida, from which, however, he derived no income. He admitted that both he and "Swami" (Diss de Bar) had been in prison for a month in New York on account of a lecture which the latter had given.

Laura Jackson (Diss de Bar) next occupied the witness stand. Her mode of giving evidence consisted in making voluble speeches as answers to the questions of the prosecution.

During her cross-examination the name Diss de Bar mentioned for the first time in court, the witness admitting that she was the divorced wife of General Diss de Bar, adding that she had inherited a fortune from him.

The woman also admitted that she had been married to a man named McGool and to P. H. Messaut. She said her income from the Diss de Bar property was $14,000 yearly, acknowledged that she had served six months in jail in New York for defrauding Luther C. Marsh, and denied that she had ever been known as Vera P. Ava.

After Mrs. Jackson had made a general denial of the crimes charged against her the Solicitor General announced that, as the prisoners were not defended, he would not address the jury.

Jackson then began a speech to the jury. He said it was monstrous that such an infamous charge should be laid at their door, that especially considering that his companion had devoted her life to Christian reform.

"However," he added, "I believe that absolute justice can be obtained from an English judge and jury, which is more than I can say for America."

The female prisoner in turn addressed the jury. Drawing her classic robe around her ample form, and raising herself to her full height, she held the court spellbound for over an hour. She seemed never at a loss for words. She carefully dissected all the evidence and wound up with a powerful peroration to the effect that she did not desire any halting, ambiguous verdict, but an unequivocable expression of justice.

Justice Bigham then summed up strongly against the prisoners, saying it was difficult to conceive of more revolting and abominable conduct. He said he would not be doing his duty unless he prevented the male prisoner from practicing such acts under the cloak of religion for some years to come.

The jury was absent less than five minutes. A deathlike silence followed the pronouncement of the word "Guilty," and the Judge quickly passed the sentences.

Thus closes the record of one of the worst mediums that ever disgraced Spiritualism. It is an object lesson for those mediums who mix the genuine with the false; they too ought to be behind the bars with Diss de Bar.

Expelled for Not Praying.

From Topeka, Kansas, comes the news that the 10-year-old son of J. W. Willard, a wealthy grain dealer, was expelled from the Quincy street school for refusing to take part in the religious exercises at the opening of the school. Mr. Willard says the boy was acting under his instructions, and threatens to take the matter into court for settlement.

"I object to religion in the public schools," said he, "and if necessary I will bring an action in the courts to see if the board of education can force me to allow my son to submit to religious instruction in the public schools."

The objections of Mr. Willard are made in consequence of the resolution presented to the board of education and adopted at the last meeting that the reading of the Bible and repeating of the Lord's prayer at the opening of school each morning be compulsory. The resolution was drafted and presented to the board for adoption by Dr. J. T. McFarland, representing the Ministerial Union.

Compelling children to pray is equivalent to compelling them to lie, and hence cultivates a habit of lying, deception and insincerity. It is forcing them to put on an appearance of worship, and in this and other instances, a show of belief in and reverence for the Bible, which the pupil does not possess—and thus in a manner compels the pupil to enact a lie.

But the Ministerial Union would rather children would thus become habitual liars, than omit Bible-reading and compulsory prayers in the schools.

A HUMANITARIAN WORK.

No Longer a Skeleton in Our Closet.

To the Editor:—Some three years ago there was a very valuable article in your paper, with a cut of a skeleton, and the article was headed "A Skeleton in Our Closet." You faithfully depicted the condition in our ranks—how that we had no hospital, or home for our aged, sick or helpless ones.

That hour is past—thanks to the N. S. A. and its valuable officers. At a meeting of the board on October 19, they called me into their counsels and asked me the nature of my proposition in relation to endowment beds in my sanitarium, and what my facilities were, and how cheap I could or would care for the same? After I had carefully detailed to them my plans and anxiety to help the sick, with no profit to myself, Mr. Theodore J. Mayer said to me, "Is there any building close to your own that can be bought cheap?"

I said to him, "Yes, one twenty feet from my sanitarium."

"Have you a large dining-room, and how many can you seat and feed, and what will you feed our aged, disabled ones for that are not sick, in case we should buy said building?"

I told him, making the price actual cost. The result was that the board selected Alonzo Thompson, of Fullerton, Neb., to act as committee to visit my place, which he did. He made an offer for this building, which has since been accepted. The N. S. A. board has sent on the money, and the building is being put into shape for the care, accommodation and home for mediums, broken-down speakers and Spiritualists.

This home is 20 feet front, and nearly 80 feet deep, and two stories high. It will have a nice cozy sitting-room, 12 by 16, with 18 good rooms. These will be heated with steam, and made home-like and comfortable. If any become sick, or any sick ones in our ranks are found worthy of help by the executive committee of the N. S. A., they will have medical attendance, board and nursing in the sanitarium. All arrangements in relation to whom shall have the benefit of this munificent gift, must be made to the secretary, Mrs. Mary T. Longley, 600 Pennsylvania avenue, S. E., Washington, D. C.

Now I have stated this matter in as few words as possible, for our object is to ask any Spiritualist in the country to aid in this good work. While the building is purchased, and these rooms are being provided for both sick and disabled ones, it is money alone that can carry it on. This money will be wisely used, and carefully watched by Mr. Theodore Mayer, and his valuable board.

For fifty-four years we have preached and written of our beautiful philosophy of our great religion of Spiritualism. Now the time is ripe that we make this philosophy and religion truly humanitarian and all who are blessed with means contribute to, and bless, and care for those who have none, those who have given their life to the work of the cause, and humanity.

I hope and feel that every medium, every speaker, and Spiritualist worker in the United states will make themselves a committee of one, to work to secure funds. All money should be sent to headquarters, and I hope your valuable journal and all Spiritualist papers will be a recipient for funds. This building which they have purchased very cheap—less than half what it cost—when finished and ready for occupancy, will be worth $2,500. Then in order to provide for the board of those already needing the same in our ranks, also to care for, or to take care of those who are sick, and needing care in this hospital for the next year, we need at least $1,000.

The N. S. A. has advanced the money for the purchase. Now what is needed to carry this good work forward for the next twelve months is at least $3,000. This sum can be easily raised if each Spiritualist will send in their mite, if each will do something to help those who are needy and worthy. My offer in relation to price for board and care for the sick, is below the actual cost, and I have added to that a contribution of $100 dollars, and have deeded to the N. S. A. land worth at least $500, in case they ever wish to enlarge their building.

I think I have said enough for the present. Hoping that this article, with what others may say, will set the ball rolling, and show to the world what is true—that all true Spiritualists are truly humanitarians.

In addition to giving all I can for endowment beds, and the care and watchfulness of the Home, I want to do all I can to help raise funds, and let the Spiritualists know the nature of this effort, and home which the N. S. A. has provided. To do so I will attend mass-meetings, state conventions and all camp-meetings in my own state or anywhere in the United States, and give at least two lectures on Spiritualism or other subjects—thus saving them engaging some other speaker, free; only asking my actual expenses from my home, if they will give me a chance to present the claims, needs and importance of this mediums' and speakers' home. In order to fill such engagements, I must have notice months ahead, that I may meet the demands, and not interfere with the care and management of my sanitarium. In relation to my ability as a speaker, I will refer to editors of any of our Spiritualist papers, or the officers of the N. S. A.

In conclusion, let me say to the Spiritualist public, to all who believe in the blessed truth of spirit communion, stop and think and ask yourself, "Can I not—should I not be my brother's keeper and helper? Should not my love of the truth, the right, and the needy go from heart to my pocket-book? From my sympathies to actual action?" May God and His angels touch your hearts in this matter, and cause all to act in sympathy with and for humanity.

The Two Ideals.

I.

It was in the early morning dawn, and it seemed as if an angelic artist had frescoed the eastern sky with scenes that are only realized in the highest heaven, or that the God of Nature had crystallized his highest ideals of beauty and sublimity on the East, with the blue vaults of the sky as a background. The divinely blended colors changed their expression and tone, just as the features of an exalted spirit would change and become illuminated as he viewed some noble act of an earthly mortal, after observing the haunts of sin and vice. The wisps of clouds seemed to bear upon them and within them a smile of ineffable beauty, acting like a kaleideoscope as the sun gradually approaches to usher in the coming day. The very atmosphere appeared to impart the sweetness of heaven to lawns and gardens, and the gradual opening of the Gates of the East, was like disclosing to view the interior of an enchanted palace.

The morning dawn is when Nature is seemingly engaged in writing poetry, or thinking sublime thoughts that crystallize in a thousand different ways, and shade the wisps of cloud that float around like fairies, waiting for the ushering in of a full-fledged morn to bless the world. No artist could ever picture the extreme loveliness of the morning dawn, as the colors of the rainbow change with each advance of the sun towards the horizon.

It was on such an occasion as this, that a lady in a southern city, as the daily papers said at the time, opened the door of her stately residence and surveyed the grandeur of the frescoed East, the various colors of the wisps of clouds changing each moment as if imbued with life; and then raising her hands adoringly, she uttered a fervent prayer that the whole world might be redeemed from sin and misery, and all rise to a plane where they could realize the grandeur of creation, and read the poetry of the morning dawn as pictured on the eastern sky. Then glancing at a bed of flowers in the yard, she thought she saw a strange [illegible] preceded him three [illegible] the head office. They were both ardent [illegible] and gazed at her. Just as the spirit [illegible] prised at the scene before her, a beautiful smile [illegible] bed of flowers while the head of the [illegible] back, as if afraid of detection. Parting the flowers, she was amazed at the scene before her. There was lying a little girl, with a basket of matches by her side. There—right there—in a bed of beautiful flowers with the incense of heaven folded, as if by an angel, in each bud and blossom; there, in the morning dawn, when nature smiles serenely, as if pleased at the outlook, a human soul was lying. Whether legitimate or illegitimate; whether born in wedlock or out, it was a human soul, a budding flower in the garden of the brotherhood of man, and should be tenderly cared for—just as much entitled to careful rearing and the tender solicitude of a mother, as if its parents were among the mighty potentates of earth.

MARIONETTE
By Godfrey of the Library

Mrs. X. gazed bewilderingly at the scene. The little girl closed her eyes as if in sleep. Her dress was in shreds, her face begrimed with dirt, her hair in tangled tresses clustered around her neck and fell over her face. Kindly, as if overshadowed by an angel, a message of light and love from the courts of heaven, Mrs. X. stooped down and carefully lifted this little waif from her night-bed among the flowers and trailing vines, and clasping her in her arms, all aglow with a mother's divine love—a guardian angel indeed!—she carried her into the house, and then commenced the work of transformation—a sublime and beautiful transfiguration! The wisps of tangled hair were cleansed and straightened; the dirty clothes were removed; vermin on her little body were destroyed, and a bath restored this little girl, brought her out as Nature's God intended her to be—and no change ever wrought in a photographer's plate in a dark room was more wonderful. Dressed in the beautiful clothing of Mrs. X's little daughter who had lately passed to the realms of souls, she was transformed into a beautiful little girl. Clasped in the arms of this angelic mother, and relieved of all fear, the little girl told of her dream in her flower-bed in the garden; how a lovely mother came to her and clasped her to her heart, and concentrated on her the precious love so long stored up and demanding expression. And here the dream was realized!

II.

Every human soul ushered on to the material plane of life, is entitled to careful culture and training. The forces of nature—material or spiritual—work for all alike. There are no earthly bankers, brokers or corporations that are entitled to monopolize them. The child of the peasant should stand on an equal footing with those reared in the palatial rooms of a king. The same forces—material and spiritual—that impart an immortal soul to the magnate's child, does the same to the poverty-stricken one in a hovel. The genial sunshine warms all alike, and of nature's bounteous stores throughout the universe all should be able to partake.

You are a miser just in proportion as you are able to assist the unfortunate, and do not.

If you hoard your possibilities for doing good, how much better are you than the miser who selfishly and fiendishly clutches his gold, and gloats over its existence?

The one who hoards his possibilities for doing good, and the miser who hoards his gold are on the same plane.

III.

There was a striking resemblance between the little waif found in the flower-bed where she had crept for a night's repose, little thinking that her whole life-lines would be changed by that act, and the daughter of Mrs. X., who had lately passed to the spirit world. Her own daughter's name was Ideal—an ideal child!—a child of love!—a child begotten with one's nature all aflame with goodness, vibrating with poetical thoughts and imagery, while there nestled on her lips a sweet prayer of love for all, and therefore she concluded after much thought to call this flower-waif, Ideal, as she came into existence to this new mother in an ideal place—a bed of charming flowers—and in an ideal morning dawn when all nature was speaking a divine language, in ideal summer weather when everything was serenely sweet and beautiful—a curious name, indeed, for a little waif cast on the turbulent sea of life, seemingly without hope.

Every child ushered into existence on the material side of existence, comes from that Infinite Reservoir of Life, eternal in the fields of space; whether the child be legitimate or illegitimate; whether it be born in wedlock or out, or whether its parents, so-called, be brigands, peasants, or the most exalted ones of earth, it is an emanation of this grand Reservoir of Life, and as such it is entitled to a home where it can be properly trained, properly cultured, properly developed. Each one being an emanation from this source of all life, no one is exalted above another as to origin; no one possesses a single right that should not be accorded to every human soul; the privileges of one should become the privileges of all—the right to be properly trained from babyhood to maturity.

IV.

A lady writes to Ella Wheeler Wilcox, as set forth in the Chicago American, that she has a little girl of eight years who possesses remarkable mediumistic or clairvoyant powers. The mother says she is a very bright child and a favorite with everybody. About one year ago this lady began the investigation of psychic science, and asked her little daughter to sit with her and try if she could see anything. The first time they sat, which was only a very few moments, the little girl proclaimed in open-eyed amazement that she had seen a vision of angels and the Christ. The mother was in doubt as to whether she really saw this or whether it was imagination, but upon further sittings, as the power seemed to grow, she told of angels' visits, of what they say, of their putting things or thoughts in her mind. Sometimes they dance and sing. She hears them also. She communes regularly with this source of intelligence, and tells of spheres and states of things beyond, which, if true, would shake the whole orthodox religion to its foundation. There cannot be a shadow of doubt that she does see, asserts the mother. She can and has proven it to the most skeptical.

Here we have a remarkable development of mediumistic powers in a little girl, which is in perfect harmony with the experiences of thousands of Spiritualsts. It only illustrates the important fact that the denizens of the spirit realms are always active, continually searching for new avenues that lead to this creed-bound earth. The children have not yet learned the tricks of the fraudulent mediums, hence the angels are strongly attracted towards them, and surround them with a sweet and holy influence.

V.

What a kaleidoscopic world this is! No two morning dawns throughout all time have been exactly alike; no two setting suns have kissed the same wisps of fleecy clouds with their rainbow-tinting rays of light; no two lilies, whether on the banks of the sacred Nile or Ganges, or in the cloister of the pious nun, or in the flower-laden vines of the hot house, throughout all the vastness of time, have been similar in all respects; no two souls, an emanation from God's Reservoir of Life throughout the infinitude of space, have been cast in the same mold. Infinity—God—whether male or female, or both, or neither, or an it or a principle, never repeats itself, and therein infinite wisdom is expressed. Infinite wisdom would cease to be if two things were exactly alike.

VI.

Mrs. X. found her little waif Ideal resembled in many respects her own daughter. Equally as sweet, equally as sunny, equally as affectionate, equally as dreamy in childhood's fancies, yet greatly different in all those respects—seemingly a contradiction in terms. One day while Ideal was playing in the arbor where trailing vines and flowers had woven a place fit for the fairies, she heard her talking. Knowing she was [illegible], she stealthily approached where she could be an unobserved listener. Ideal was playing with an angel visitor, and having a delightful time. That angel visitor was Ideal, too, the real spirit daughter of her foster mother, and she was telling of her spirit home, of her spirit playmates, of the beautiful scenes with which she was constantly greeted, and when Mrs. X. stepped quietly in, the interview continued, and she was enlivened, refreshed, exalted and made more noble by receiving sweet messages from her angel child. The child of her adoption proved to be a medium, and in constant touch with the spirit realms, bringing sweet messages from her adopted sister, thus making the home of Mr. X. the holy of holies, a place where the spirit realms were in touch with those of earth, and where angels of light loved to dwell.

VII.

Here is an example where a homeless waif brought love, peace, happiness, contentment and good cheer to a home that had been saddened by death, filling a void in a father's and mother's heart, making their life one of angelic sweetness, illuminating their pathway with the joys of childhood's mirth and loveliness, giving them a foretaste of heaven, making them wiser and better in all respects.

In the good time coming, in the millennial dawn, every home that is blessed with an abundance of this world's goods, will become an asylum for those less fortunate. Every immortal waif then will have a comfortable home shelter. Where there is one orphan asylum now, there will be thousands of them then, for every well-to-do family will be on the constant outlook for child waifs, rearing them with paternal care, and in that degree diminishing crime and misery. Christianity to-day has only a fragment of heaven in its make-up, for it huddles all the orphans together instead of making every Christian home an asylum for one or more, where they can be properly reared and cared for.

VIII.

How many readers of this Home Circle address ever thought of rearing a human soul, ruthlessly cast on the earth plane from that Reservoir of all Life from which all souls originate? What is the aim of existence if all human souls are not interlinked in one grand brotherhood? If emanating from one common source, who can claim superiority over another, only just in proportion as they live unselfish lives? Who are the ones to be exalted in the spheres of love, light and knowledge, the selfish or the unselfish; the good or the bad; the one whose aspirations go out to help others, or the one who selfishly only helps himself? Spirituality and selfishness never go hand in hand, whether in a minister of the gospel or a Spiritualist medium. One cannot be selfish and spiritual at the same time. There are misguided church members—misguided in belief—who are divinely beautiful and spiritual, who are angelic in nature and aspirations, and who are prepared for a grand reception in the higher spiritual realms, because they are unselfish, constantly striving to aid those in the lower walks of life. Remember, then, the only way to attain spirituality is to banish selfishness as far as possible, commensurate with one's duty to self.

THE WORLD IS GOOD TO THEM AND ME.

Has the world gone wrong? I hear a child
Who is singing a happy song,
And across the way an anvil rings,
And yonder a maiden hurries along
With a look that only gladness brings.

Has the world gone wrong? I see the gleam
Of love in a lover's eyes,
And yonder upon the wooden gate,
Where lovers have gazed at the starry skies,
A sparrow cheeps to its little mate.

Has the world gone wrong? I hear the sounds
That men who are busy make,
I hear the engines puff away,
And, strong in body, I go to take
The little part that I have to play.

Has the world gone wrong? There's many a man,
When his work is done to-night,
Who will hurry away from care, to see
Glad faces glow where hearts are light—
Oh, the world is good to them and me.

A SALUTARY LESSON FROM JAPANESE CIVILIZATION.

Showing That Our Boasted Christian Civilization May Find Many Things It Might Copy to Good Purpose.

Japan has a civilization peculiar to itself and extremely suggestive. Its people are unique. Their ways, habits, customs, language, morals, manners, ideas and practices in daily life are in strong contrast to ours. There is an Old Japan and a New Japan. What I write will be of the former—of Japan where it has been untouched by Western civilization.

Among the books treating of Japan, none are considered more authoritative and unbiased than those written by Prof. Hearn, Professor of English in a Japanese College, and by Lowell in his book entitled "Occult Japan;" Miss Bacon's book on "Girls in Japan," though not unbiased, is good.

In material prosperity and scientific attainments Old Japan was a failure. Her people have had very little of the ambition for wealth and power on which material development is based. Yet they have a most attractive and advanced civilization—in many respects superior to ours. In this article I shall give, as best I can in the space, a picture of the most prominent features of that civilization, by quoting largely from the books I have mentioned.

The Japanese are small and wiry in their physique, dainty and delicate in their tastes, polite and courteous in their manners, refined and sensitive in temperament.

"To Europeans the smooth-featured, slender, low statured Japanese seemed like boys and they call them 'boys.' To the Japanese the first red-haired, rowdy, drunken European sailors seemed fiends, 'shojo,' demons of the sea, and by the Chinese the Westerners are still called 'foreign devils.' The great stature, massive strength, deep-set eye, protruding brow, occipitrine nose, ponderous jaw and fierce gait of foreigners in Japan, made children cry for fear on seeing them pass along the streets."

PRIVACY.

There is but little privacy in Japanese life. Their houses are built of bamboo, the lightest of all material. There are only paper walls dividing the rooms and these are but little higher than one's head and movable at pleasure. There are only sliding screens instead of doors. There are neither locks nor bolts to be used by day, and in good weather the fronts and even sides of the house are removed and the interior opened to the public gaze. In a hotel or even a common dwelling house, nobody knocks before entering your room; no one is ashamed or afraid of fellow men or women. Personal habits, virtues and vices, are not easily hidden. Perhaps this is one reason so few vices exist.

TASTE.

The Japanese have cultivated taste to a higher degree than any other people. They have a passion for things nice and dainty. "To divert themselves by making curious, rare, and pretty things seems to have been the main purpose of Japanese existence for centuries, and they make long pilgrimages to see such things. Every hill and vale has its temple, and every temple is a gallery where people flock to see its works of art."

"In decorative art there is no repetition or anything resembling regularity, either in distribution, juxtaposition, grouping, dimensions, or contraries. The ingenuity by which these are avoided rises to the dignity of genius. To see a regular pattern on a wall, a carpet, a curtain, a ceiling, is painful and vulgar to one accustomed to seeing Japanese art."

"In floral display European taste is simple vulgarity in comparison with the Japanese. It is but a vulgar murdering of flowers, an outrage upon the color sense, a brutality. The Japanese race comprehends nature infinitely better than we do, at least in her visible forms. Wherever in Japan one sees something uninteresting in porcelain or metal, one may be sure that commonplace something has been shaped under foreign influence."

SCHOOLS.

The teacher is teacher, not master. He never tries to impress his will upon his pupils; he never scolds; he seldom criticizes; he scarcely ever punishes. No teacher strikes a pupil; if so he would lose his place. He never loses his temper; if so he would be disgraced. If a pupil is so bad he cannot be managed, he is expelled. As a rule, the pupils govern the school. If a teacher is incompetent, they ask for his dismissal; they seldom rebel against him; they rarely insult him or disturb his class; they will simply refuse to attend school till he is removed.

PARENTAL LOVE.

This is the highest love except love for country, which a Japanese knows. If a Japanese man found himself in deep water with his wife and father, and he could save only one, he would in all cases and without hesitation leave his wife and save his father. Filial piety is supreme and the foundation of their religion. Therefore the text "For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother and shall cleave unto his wife" appears to the Japanese as one of the most immoral sentences ever written.

The following is taken from a boy's composition at school! "Often perhaps our parents were hungry, yet we always had plenty of food. Sometimes they could scarcely get money to live, yet we were sent to school. When we think of all it cost them to educate us, all the trouble it took to bring us up, all the love they gave us, and all the pain we caused them in our foolish childhood, then we think we never, never do enough for them."

HONESTY.

"Long before visiting Obe I had heard that such a crime as theft was unknown in the little archipelago; that it had never been found necessary there to lock things up; and that, whenever weather permitted, the people slept with their houses open to the four winds of heaven. After careful personal investigation while there I found these surprising statements, to a great extent, true. In the Dozen group, a group which so far has remained untouched by foreigners, there at least are no thieves, and practically no crime. It has 30,196 population scattered in small towns and villages. There are ten policemen in all. Each policeman has under his inspection a number of v[illegible]. He visits on regular days, and his absence [illegible] their way at inst[illegible] beautiful Savior. Tra[illegible] advantage of, His work so[illegible]n, whose constant pleading [illegible]nforcement of hygienic reg[illegible]s, in such beauty before [illegible]ports. It very physicians, all permission that also [illegible] arrest, for [illegible] her remark- should no [illegible]rel. When an arrest is ma[illegible] or quarreling, which is unlawful, and even this is not done except in the one island of Dago."

"Anywhere in Japan the doors are never locked or even closed in daytime, and even when they are locked at night they could not resist one vigorous pull. Anyone can also cut his way into an ordinary house with a pocket-knife. Rich men have safes in which to keep their money and jewelry, but all else is open. It should never be forgotten that those portions of Japan which have not come in contact with foreigners are as much in advance of the 19th century in moral development as they are behind it in material development."

SELF-DENIAL.

"I offered one of my pupils, who called upon me, some candy, and he refused, saying, 'As I am the youngest brother, I must begin soon to earn my own living. I shall have to endure many hardships. If I allow myself to like dainties now, I shall only suffer more later on. The same self-constraint is visible towards others which they manifest toward themselves. They seldom show anger; if they feel it they restrain it.

KINDNESS.

"I have been fourteen months in Zzeemo and I have not yet heard voices raised in anger or witnessed a quarrel. Never have I seen one man strike another or a woman bullied or a child slapped. Indeed I have never seen any real roughness anywhere I have been in Japan except at the open ports, where, through contact with Europeans, the poorer classes lose their native politeness and morals and happy spirit."

At another time and place while traveling through the interior he writes: "As in all the other little country villages I find the people here in the interior of Japan as elsewhere, kind with a kindness and a courtesy unimaginable, indescribable, unknown in any other country, and even in Japan itself, only in the interior. Their simple politeness is not an art; their goodness is unconscious goodness, both straight from the heart. Courtesy in its utmost possible exquisiteness, surpassing even the French, seems as natural to a boy as the color of his hair, nor is he less kind than courteous.

MAKING LIFE HAPPY.

"Among no other civilized people is childhood so happy or the secret of happy living among the adult population so thoroughly comprehended as among the Japanese. By no other race is the truth so widely understood that our pleasure in life must depend upon the happiness of those about us, and consequently upon the cultivation in ourselves of unselfishness and patience. Hence in Japanese society, sarcasm, irony, cruel wit are not indulged. A personal failing is not made the subject of ridicule or reproach; an eccentricity is not commented upon; an involuntary mistake excites no laughter.

GIRLS.

Miss Bacon says the average Japanese girl is "obedient, pleasant, polite, cleanly, neat, self-restrained, dignified, and is nearly free from the bad manners of Western society. At 16 or 18 she is a finished product of a most perfect civilization, pure, sweet, amiable and undemonstrative."

KINDNESS TO ANIMALS.

All over the Orient, wherever Buddhism has spread its gentle influence, people are kind not only to each other but equally kind to animals. If even a snake is crossing the road the vehicle is checked in its speed that the harmless reptile may be allowed to escape uninjured. The result of such universal kindness to the animal creation is given by Prof. Morse in his travels in Japan.

He says: "Birds build their nests in the city houses; while fowl, geese and ducks alight in the public parks; wild deer trot about the streets. I have actually been followed by wild deer in the streets nibbling melon out of my hand. One day a beautiful heron alighted on the limb of a tree and the busy, jostling throng stopped. No one attempted to injure the bird but several began sketching him." Imagine such a thing in any Christian country where members of churches and even ministers resort to the sea shore to shoot on the wing the harmless sea-gulls, or to the forest to lie in wait for the opportunity to spill the blood of the beautiful deer, as he comes unconscious of danger to the quiet lake to quench his thirst. And this is sport, recreation, enjoyment!

THE LESSON.

I have put before my readers the above authentic facts not simply that they may be informed in regard to Japan, which has only lately become known, but I have given these facts as an object lesson to overthrow the conceit and falseness of the common, wide-spread, Christian idea that there can be no high moral civilization built up without the aid of the Christian religion. Ever since I was a boy, and indeed ever since Christianity entered Europe, the claim has been made and repeated, echoed and re-echoed in every pulpit in every sect in every part of Christendom that our Bible, our Christ, our Sunday and our marriage law were the four corner-stones of all progress and all right living—that they came from God and must not be questioned—that a word said against any one of them was a blow at morality and all that ennobles life—that without them nations would crumble into ruins and the people go back into barbarism and brutality. So persistent and determined had been the work of pressing this idea to the front in politics and in business as well as in religion, that people tacitly acquiesced in it.

But a few years ago Japan came to the front in international affairs and a knowledge of her history and condition overthrew utterly the Christian presumption so long made. Japan is a land which has grown from a savage state up to a civilization unsurpassed if not unequalled on the earth in those finer, gentler, sweeter and more humane qualities which characterize a genuine spiritual life. It has also developed a national life more free from the three great national sins of avarice, slavery and drunkenness than any Christian nation on earth. And it has done all this without a single copy of the Christian Bible anywhere within its borders; it has done all this without a solitary Christian church and without even ever having heard there was a Christ.

For centuries Christianity taught that the world owes its moral progress and spiritual enlightenment to the existence and observance of Sunday as a day of rest and worship. Even infidels and agnostics have been so influenced as to consent to this claim. And yet Japan reached her high morality with no Sunday and no day of the week set apart as a day of rest and worship, but with every day as a week-day. Instead of the brutal and worldly spirit reigning supreme where there is no recognized Sabbath, it is just the opposite in Japan.

But even a greater surprise awaits the Christian reader in regard to marriage. In Japan the very highest domestic happiness has been reached, and this has been done with the loosest and most elastic marriage law. There is no minister nor magistrate to unite in marriage. It is simply that a man and woman announce that they wish to be husband and wife; and after a simple ceremony which custom has made—drinking from the same goblet—they commence married life. If they find they have made a mistake, instead of feeling they must live together anyway, even if it is in misery, they mutually agree to dissolve the partnership, the husband taking the children, if they have any, unless they mutually agree otherwise, and each is free to marry again and there is no scandal, no disgrace and no expense attached to the affair.

May this lesson which Japan teaches help to take the conceit and arrogance and intolerance out of the Christian pulpit and establish the fact that no religion is the whole and final truth.

THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE.

A VERY IMPORTANT WORK.

The Spiritual Significance is by Lilian Whiting, author of "The World Beautiful," "After Her Death," "Kate Field, A Record," "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning." Cloth, $1.00.

Miss Whiting finds the title of her new book in these lines from "Aurora Leigh:"

"'If a man could feel
Not one, but every day, feast, fast, and working-day,
The spiritual significance burn through
The hieroglyphic of material shows,
Henceforward he would paint the globe with wings."

The aim of this book is to reveal the curiously close correspondence between the developments of modern science and spiritual laws; to note that new forces, as discovered and applied in wireless telegraphy, are simply laws of an unseen realm into which humanity is rapidly advancing and thus gaining a new environment. From this evolutionary progress, as illustrated by physical science the author of "The World Beautiful" continues the same argument presented in those volumes in a plea that the future life is the continuation and development of our present life in all its faculties and powers, and that the present may be ennobled by the constant sense of the Divine Presence, and a truer knowledge of the nature of man and his relations to God tend to a higher morality and increasing happiness. The book is characterized by the same essential style and qualities that have insured for "The World Beautiful" volumes an almost world-wide popularity.

HEALING.

Its History and Philosophic Basis.

There is an epidemic spreading among the people in regard to healing. These were said to be sixty-six divine healers over a year ago. The journals regarding it are multiplying. Almost every one who is not a disbeliever and opposer seems to think he must prevent others from monopolizing the business.

Regular practitioners of the old schools are alarmed and trying to suppress the new methods. Doctors as well as ministers, teachers and lawyers are being manufactured faster than the opportunities for employment.

But those who would smother out the new idea and drive back the leaders will not succeed. The human soul cannot be caged. It is born of God and in the sphere of its action is omnipotent. The evolution of humanity cannot be thwarted. It can be truly said there never was a time when the world in its development stood still. All we can do is to obstruct and delay.

The Theoraputes of Egypt, and their missionaries in many places, practiced healing more than 2,000 years ago. The New Testament scriptures makes great mention of it. From that time down, it has been occasionally claimed, especially by Catholics.

At the present time there are many of these cults with different passwords. They are fighting each other to their own hurt, trying to secure the whole praise or the whole benefit. They will be driven to unite. The secret they are using for self will be universally known for the general good.

The power used in all this work is undoubtedly the same. It is a universal law, a principle existing in nature by the establishing of the universe. As there is no respect of persons, it is for all. Without calling names, no particular person or sect can claim the whole thing. So far as I can see, errors attach to each of the different claimants; but the truth in each and all of them will not be lost but united into one grand system of health, joy, power and universal religion.

The basis of it all is life. And is not life spirit? And is not spirit God? But here is the key given. Thoughts are things and are alive. They are under the control of the will. With them we build disease or health; deformed manhood or good character; discord or harmony.

But we have to come into the proper condition, under the law of life, to receive and use this gift, blessing, power. To drink from the fountain we must be athirst and open our mouths. We must be receptive, desirous. We must have faith, this quality so much talked about.

As to the reality of these things much of it must be true. On the other hand, exorbitant claims and fraud have always been and are now a discouraging element.

Many quote trite words from scripture to bolster up a theory. Some stilt themselves up in sanctity to sell you a robe of their pattern before they admit you to court.

It is true all goodness is commendable, and the better we act and the whiter and sweeter our lives the greater our assurance of success.

It is not only a sowing but a winnowing time. The error will dissolve, but the truth will remain. In the haste to catch the market, let us not overdraw.

The real truth is spirits do a large percentage of the work. We will say I, as a mortal, impinge my thought into the mind and body of a fellow, to change the vibration from inharmonious action to that of health. Now mortals who have passed to spirit life took their life, intelligence, and magnetic power with them. When they are attracted to me, and wish to aid a good object, their added or multiplied power joins to give strength to the work. The French zouave Jacobs could see the spirits manipulating his subjects as he stood by them. As I wish to give a variety of incidents to prove these statements, I will pursue the subject no farther this time.

Learned Her Piece While Asleep.

To the Editor:—We have in our family three little girls attending school, ages six, twelve and fifteen years. Ina, the twelve-year-old girl, was requested to learn a piece for Christmas. Accordingly she carried to school an old speaker from which the teacher selected her a piece to speak. She either left the book at the school house or lost it on the way home, for a thorough search of the house failed to find the book. Ina has been very much worried over the loss of the book, as she is very fond of speaking and delights to please her teacher. Last night, however, her trouble was turned into joy, for during the time she was sleeping some spirit friend brought her an exact copy of the book, from which she learned the piece by heart, so on arising this morning she was delighted that she had her piece, and to prove it, repeated it in full to her mother, without a single mistake, or at least without hesitating. She declares she turned the leaves of the book in her sleep and recognized it as her old speaker. Ina knows nothing of the philosophy and teaching of Spiritualism. We know she did not learn the piece during her waking hours. The truth of the foregoing I will be sworn to willingly at any time.

C. W. LITTLEFIELD, M. D.

Alexandria, Ind.

umpet and Materialization.

To the Editor:—At the request of the writer, Mr. D. A. Herrick, of Alliance, Ohio, came to Canton Sunday, and held a trumpet seance at the residence of Mr. John Belter. While this particular kind of seance is commonly called a trumpet seance, fully one-half of the spirit friends who came and made their presence known spoke to and conversed with their friends of earth independently, without the use of the trumpet, and quite frequently two and occasionally three were conversing with their loved ones of earth at the same time.

During this seance Mr. John McSweeney, formerly a great criminal lawyer, came and many of his friends who knew him well while in the earth life believed him to be the greatest criminal lawyer Ohio ever had. He made his presence known, first, by saying "Good evening, Mr. Snyder and friends," after which he directed his remarks to ex-Senator T. C. Snyder, and after conversing with him for a few moments he delivered a short but grand lecture to the ladies and gentlemen present. He spoke in a loud and distinct tone of voice, and the manner in which he expressed his thoughts, together with the flowery language used, were characteristic of Mr. McSweeney while in earth life, yet his lecture was more spiritual than were his political campaign speeches the writer had the pleasure of listening to some years ago, also the masterly addresses made by him to jurors when prosecuting or defending some one.

There were also many other interesting features connected with this seance, one or two of which I would like to mention. A very bright spirit, a young lady, who passed to the spirit side when quite young, came to a member of the circle, giving him her name and telling him that she was his sister. At first he thought it a mistake, but after she had reminded him of the fact that she was very young at the time she passed to the other side, together with other convincing proofs, he remembered and acknowledged that he did have a sister in the spirit world, but was not thinking of her and did not know that little innocent babes grew on and on to beautiful womanhood or to bright and useful manhood, as the case may be, after passing out of this world into the celestial spheres of the spirit world, and where as well, they are cared for and educated by friends and teachers of those spheres of life.

Another interesting feature was the coming of Spirit Belter, who claimed to be a relative of Mr. John Belter. This spirit also claimed to have been in spirit life over three hundred years, having passed out from Germany, that he was a guide of Miss Belter, a daughter of Mr. John Belter, and who, by the way, is quite clairvoyant and has seen Spirit Belter a number of times and each time he was surrounded by a halo of light, therefore she took him to be an ancient spirit, nevertheless his presence frightened her, she being a girl and not out of her teens. Spirit Belter knowing this to be true, came to Miss Belter, telling her who he was, why attracted to her, that he was her guide, would help to develop her, and when developed that he would be her main guide and seance control; all of which was very gratifying to Miss Belter, since her spirit friends are very anxious for her to sit for full-form materialization, which they claim she will get in addition to her clairvoyant powers.

A Home Medium.

The spiritually-minded person ever prays the time may come when our good and true channels of communication between the two worlds shall, as were the psychics of the ancient time, be lovingly cared for by those who prize this nineteenth century revelation, and be freed from making merchandise of their heavenly gifts, being supported by the efforts of Spiritualists.

The necessity for this is shown in the fact that there are in other places as well as in Grand Rapids, Mich., two kinds of mediums: the professional, whose necessities compel them to exercise their spiritual gifts as a business, and the home worker, who does no work outside the home, and who, having income from some other source, shrinks from making the usual charge for mediumistic service, yet for certain reasons is obliged to do so.

Of this latter class, Marguerite Spencer, of this city, is a trumpet medium; to which phase is added the production of beautiful lights in decorative forms and the imprinting of portraits on handkerchiefs. This lady's development came through sittings with Chas. E. Winans. The spirit conductor who always closes the circle with invocation and blessing is Mr. De Land; who with his loud, sonorous voice impresses you with his great candor and integrity in his devotion to the work of intercommunication. Frank Ogden, also in full, strong tone, with a masterly manner holds running conversation with one after another in the circle half an hour at a time. Sunshine, the child entertainer, wins all hearts with her sweet, guileless innocence in a slight, yet clear, silvery voice. These are the characters of Mrs. Spencer's seances aside from the variety in messages from individual spirit friends as changed by the changing circle. This is often Catholic people entire. The skeptic is always made welcome. The circle is changed while in progress, the unconvinced given a seat next the medium, those on either side holding her hand.

With no more than necessary recognition of non-belief in some present, all is conducted so closely on the line of human affection that the dullest cannot fail to recognize the mission of Spiritualism through this medium as that of a consoler. For the shadows of human life are so great the sunshine cannot too often enter; the path is so rocky and thorn-lined, that the healing ointment of an angel love can only cure the wounds and bruises of the traveler, and bind up in compassion his sore and bleeding feet. The work of this medium being conducted so closely on this line, such is the power of human affection that many are here for the first time convinced of Spiritualism's truth who have been habitual attendants of other circles.

Every psychic has his or her especial work. It seems to be that of this medium to make for her patrons a kind of Spiritualistic kindergarten where the first object lessons in things spiritual are so simply yet so strongly placed on the blackboard of memory they can never be obliterated.

Mrs. Spencer's private sittings are with the trumpet only, under the usual conditions. These accentuate the religion of nature, and are characterized by a worship of and devotion to the beautiful, the good and the true.

"Blest be the tie that binds" the two worlds! O, human love! thou art the savior that shall redeem the world.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

Bear in mind that all notices for this page are cut down to suit the space we have to occupy when received.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Mrs. Buel Corwin died at Greenport, L. I., a few weeks ago and left $12,000 to be spent on lectures on Spiritualism, to be delivered in the towns of East Marion, Orient, Greenport, Southold, Peconic and Shelter Island.

W. C. Hodge has returned to the city. He reports a pleasant trip and very enjoyable visit with the friends at Rochester, Ind. He can be addressed at 40 Loomis street, Chicago, Ill., for engagements to lecture.

Carrie F. Weatherford can be addressed for funerals and engagements during winter and spring months, at Alaska, Mich. Citizens' Phone.

Lucy Burkholser, of Allentown, Pa., has just had revealed to her in a dream that her grandfather, whom she thought dead, is alive. Ten years ago her father died, and a few months later she heard that her grandfather was also dead. The report was never contradicted. Several weeks ago she had a dream, in which her father seemed to appear to her and tell her that her grandfather was still living and that she should write to him. At the suggestion of some friends to whom she related the dream she wrote to the postmaster at Schuylkill Haven, where she knew Mr. Berkheiser had at one time resided. The letter finally reached the grandfather, and he has answered.—Chicago American.

G. F. Perkins writes from 1073½ Market street, San Francisco, Cal.: "I desire to inform the many friends of Mrs. Perkins and myself that I have located for business in my line of legitimate mediumship, viz.: tests and psychometrical readings, healing, developing etc., at 1073½ Market street, this city. I will give psychic biological readings by letter if the sending party will write their date of birth, stating sex. I have given such readings all over this continent for fifteen years with great success. In view of the fact that I have not had the proper opportunities for earning sufficient to meet our demands by reason of the close attention to Mrs. Perkins during her illness of many months, I appeal to those wishing my services for a nominal sum, to call at once or write me, and thus enable me to procure that which we all must have. Mrs. Perkins has recovered to that extent that she has assisted at our Friday circles on two occasions, and expects to as much as is prudent. We wish all of our friends who came to our relief in the dark summer days a 'Happy New Year,' at the same time hoping that the clouds which have been hanging over our heads during 1901 will clear away during the coming year. Our case against the gas company of Chicago has not as yet brought us any satisfaction, hence we are unable to reimburse our benefactors as we had hoped."

The Spiritualist Association of Poquonock, Ct., celebrated the fortieth anniversary of its organization in their hall in that town, a large attendance being on hand. The speaker of the afternoon was Mrs. Helen Temple Brigham, of New York, an inspirational speaker well known in this vicinity, she having held many public meetings in Hartford a dozen years ago or more. Mr. Harrison D. Barrett, of Boston, president of the National Spiritualists' Association, made the address of the evening, presenting on scientific lines an argument of striking power. In forcible manner he presented an analysis of the most advanced thought on matter, spirit, life, soul, presenting simple but strong illustrations from everyday life. A spirit body may be seen by a clairvoyant, but soul, and the source of life, never. A body on the dissecting table may be cut to atoms, but the source of the life that animated it cannot be found. It requires life to produce life. A professor in a college handed his students an egg and asked them what it was. They examined it in turn, and pronounced it a good hen's egg. He told them the egg had been produced in his laboratory, every part of it. A hen might set on that egg till the crack of doom, but no chicken could ever come from it. It takes life to produce life, and life, or its source, can never be destroyed. A block of ice may be turned to water, the water to steam and the steam to vapor, and that go into the invisible, but the elements or principles back of it cannot be destroyed. A man may be reduced by fire to a handful of ashes, but the 'real man,' the life-principle, the soul, remains intact throughout the crash of worlds. Socrates said, "You may have me if you can catch me," referring to his soul after death. One of the attractions of the meeting was the tests of Mrs. May S. Pepper, of Providence, at the close of the afternoon and evening addresses. Some of those who attended the meetings received what they called "stunning" proofs of the genuineness of these tests. Mrs. Thrall seems to be the head center and life of the Poquonock Association, having devoted much time and money to building it up, and her genuineness and sincerity are appreciated by all.

Mrs. L. E. Sackett, of Springfield, Mass., in sending a subscription to this office, says that "Spiritualism was never stronger than to-day."

Campbell Brothers, the psychics, are now located for the winter on the Boardwalk, one door below St. James' Place, Atlantic, N. J.

J. W. Barker, of Buffalo, N. Y., writes that F. O. Matthews is doing a good work there.

Mrs. Dr. Edwards writes: "The weather is extremely cold here, 30 degrees below zero last week. I went to the hall last Sunday night not expecting to see any one there, but we had a good audience. I have changed my residence. I am now located at No. 10 South 11th street, Minneapolis, Minn."

Mrs. Sarah S. Rockhill, a prominent Spiritualist, lately read a paper at Alliance, Ohio, on Political Equality. We make an extract as follows: "There are eternal principles of right and justice, and if these are contravened disaster and ruin are the sure result, as in mathematics if only one mistake is made the whole result is imperfect. People are beginning to find out that there is an immutable law of cause and effect that is as inexorable in its results to society as are any of the exact sciences. Most truly the greatest study of our times should be the philosophy of social life. We know that all the governments of the past, all the civilizations of the world have been failures—have gone down in inglorious extinction—and why? Because they were founded upon ignorance, selfishness and injustice. There can be no permanent order of social life until man and woman, together, shall formulate a system of social ethics founded upon the law of right and the practice of justice. The mother element of love and reform, instead of revenge and punishment, must be introduced into the working order of society before there can be any improvement. Whoever can read the signs of the times must be convinced that the last days of the best government the world has ever known are fast approaching. Corruption, fraud, treachery and oppression are on all sides; the whole body politic is one seething mass of internal and external disease. Where is the remedy? Can it be by evolution, or must it come by revolution? If by the former and by peaceable methods the first thing to be done, and the most effective, will be the full, free and unconditional enfranchisement of woman, and then with her help a governmental house-cleaning will ensue such as the world has never seen."

Charles L. Ainsworth is now located at No. 35 Talbott block, Indianapolis, Ind.

E. J. Bowtell writes: "The Olneyville Spiritual Society, Olneyville, R. I., will give an entertainment followed by a watch-night service, at Library Hall, Olneyville Square, on the night of Dec. 31, commencing at 8 o'clock."

Mrs. C. H. Mullins, an excellent medium of Chicago, writes: "I expect to spend the holidays in Kansas. I would like to meet some of the Spiritualists there. My address will be Holton, Kansas, care of B. M. Mullins."

Lyman C. Howe writes from 170 Liberty street, Fredonia, N. Y.: "I reached home the 12th, and am collecting data and preparing to write the introductory chapter of a History of Modern Spiritualism; but am free to answer calls for lectures or funerals, etc. Mrs. Howe and Herbert (Maud's boy) have kept the house level during my two and a half months' absence."

Mrs. Harriet Hyne writes from Galveston, Texas, that she regards the premium books sent to her as a Christmas present, she has such a high appreciation of them, and the nominal price for which they are sent out.

T. S. Lamborn writes: "This makes about twenty subscriptions I have sent you out of my pocket. I take advantage of your low rates to do a little missionary work."

Messrs. Winans and Norman, mediums for materialization and independent slate writing, are now permanently located, and ready to receive their friends after January 1, 1902. All mail for engagements, with enclosed stamp, should be addressed to 2721 Ninth avenue, South, Minneapolis, Minn.

H. Voorhees, of Traverse City, Mich., writes: "As a philosophical problem, is it true that the human soul is immortal as an ego? All nature says, No! Some spirits say we are not immortal. The spirit has to have some kind of sustenance; constant increase and no ending would over-populate all individual life. This explains why ancient spirits are liars and humbugs."

Mrs. S. S. Rockhill writes from Alliance, Ohio: "We are having Prof. Lockwood here to demonstrate the invisible forces in nature. What a grand revelation he is prepared to give to the student along these lines. Most wonderful are the secrets of nature in her hidden laboratory; yet more wonderful is the divine possibilities of the mind of man who has sought them out and applied them to his uses. How grand will be the 20th century when these discoveries are upon its very threshold."

Mrs. Maggie Stewart writes from Piqua, Ohio: "I have received three of your premium books—Art Magic, Occult Life of Jesus, and A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands. I cannot see how you can afford to give such valuable premiums, as the paper itself is so cheap. I have just finished reading A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands, and think it is an excellent book, and should be in the hands of every Spiritualist. The book contains a profitable lesson for all who will read it. Whether it be a perfect portraiture of life in the spirit lands or not, there is nothing in this book that could possibly give offense to any Christian who views things from a reasonable standpoint. The Progressive Thinker is doing much to enlighten its readers, and I hope its patronage will increase a hundred fold in the incoming year."

At Detroit, Mich., Dec. 11, 1901, John T. McCormick and Elizabeth Dennis, both of Durand, Mich., were united in marriage. Mrs. Marion Carpenter performed the ceremony.

A. C. Priest writes from Spokane, Wash.: "My wife's Sunday night meetings have been removed from Oliver Hall to the K. of P. Hall, Riverside avenue; 7:30 p. m."

The first annual convention of the State Spiritualists Association of Iowa will be held in the Woodman Hall, Oskaloosa, Iowa, corner of First avenue and Second street, January 16, 17, 18 and 19, 1902. Officers: President, Dr. G. A. Hinton, Oskaloosa; vice-president, John D. Vail, Marshalltown; secretary, Stella A. Fisk, Keokuk; treasurer, Moses Whistler, Delta. Trustees: Daniel Davis, Oskaloosa; Ed. Weller, Haysville; Nellie Enoch, Ferry; W. F. Hamilton, Wellman; Jennie V. Sheffer, Ottumwa. Missionaries: H. C. Holsclaw, Marshalltown; Mrs. Eva McCoy, Marshalltown; Mrs. Hattie C. Westlake, Marshalltown. The public are most cordially invited to attend these meetings, both for the purpose of listening to the philosophy as well as to observe the phenomena of Spiritualism. Some of the best physical mediums now before the public will assist in the work. The management have spared no means to make this convention a success, and earnestly urge all honest investigators to attend.

Angley Abernathy, a respected farmer living near Chapel Hill church, nine miles east of Huntington, Tenn., says his house has been visited by an unseen spirit. The spirit came and began whistling. No attention was paid to it at first, and then it began whistling louder. The family asked each other what the noise meant. Abernathy made a search about the house and yard, and no one could be found, so he asked in a stern voice what the spirit meant or what it wanted. The family, and especially the children, had become alarmed, and all kinds of ghost stories were recalled. A little daughter, who is almost too young to talk distinctly, asked in a childish manner what it was whistling for. It readily said: "I came to see you." The child then asked what it wanted with her. "I have some money for you" was the reply. The child said: "Where is it?" The spirit replied: "It is buried three feet deep under the kitchen floor in a kettle, and the amount is $2,000. I want your father to dig it up and it shall be yours." The spirit then disappeared, but returned next day and began whistling its tune. It was questioned again by the little girl and repeated what it had said the night before. The spirit would talk to no one but the child, and the father thinks it specially came to tell her about the money. It returned every day and night until Friday night and talked in the same manner. Abernathy dug under the kitchen for the money, but failed to find any. He says he hardly knows to what to attribute the visit of the spirit unless it is the spirit of Bill Ross, who lived there during the Civil War. Ross was killed soon after the war, and it is said by his neighbors that he had money buried somewhere, and it may be that the old man's spirit has returned to tell the little girl of the money's hiding place.—St. Louis Republic.

J. T. McClure writes from Denver, Colo.: "For some time past Mr. and Mrs. John B. Hutch and Mr. William H. Hough have been inspired to start a new association of truth-seekers to aid in the great work of enlightening mankind. The time was ripe and auspicious for the movement. The Circle of Light was organized December 12. The officers elected were president, William Hall Hough; vice-president, Mrs. Mary E. Mutch; treasurer, Albert J. Dibbens, and secretary, John T. McClure. The Circle will hold meetings at the residence of Mr. Mutch, 440 Pearl street, until a hall can be procured. The meetings have been exceedingly harmonious and uplifting to all who were present and the outlook for the future is very encouraging. The work before the Circle is very great but the power of love is unlimited. I subjoin the declaration of principles which were adopted and which are as follows: We, the undersigned, whose names are hereto attached for mutual benefit and to make united endeavor to uplift mankind by all the power we possess in both morality and in religious development. We are on this plane of action to focalize both material and ethereal forces and our powers of thought are unlimited. We can choose to vibrate on a low or a high plane, and the higher our thoughts and the more they are centered on a grand ideal the more power for good we can exert. Our mission being understood by us and the great work of teaching men the truth being shown to us by our spirit guides, we do hereby consecrate ourselves to this grand and glorious endeavor. We do also agree to incorporate as a legal person (but not for pecuniary profit) under the laws of the state of Colorado in order to better fulfill our mission and to carry out the purposes of the organization as above enumerated. The name we adopt is The Circle of Light."

Mrs. M. Butterfield writes from Trenton, N. J.: "I received the book, A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands. I have read it, and can recommend it as being a very valuable and precious book. I find in it many things that my own spirit guides have spoken of through me. The Progressive Thinker is a welcome visitor in my home, and is often taken up and read by people while waiting for private sittings in my home. I have been a public medium in Trenton for eleven years. We have no association here at present, but I hope we may have in the near future. I hold public circles, and they are very well attended. My work here has been very successful so far with the exception of being arrested a year ago, with others who came to the city, but who, practicing in the guise of Spiritualism, proved to be fakirs, and they were the cause of the true mediums being classed with them. By my appealing to a higher court, my fine was remitted, and I was allowed to go on with my spiritual work. I am in hopes that this will not happen again."

Dr. T. A. Bland writes from 161 South Hoyne avenue, Chicago: "I beg to express my appreciation of your kindness in giving your readers the very admirable review of my book, 'In the World Celestial,' which appeared in The Progressive Thinker of December 7, and which has already brought a great many orders for the book from different parts of the country, East, West, North and South, proving that your paper has intelligent and progressive readers in every section of this great nation."

E. W. Sprague and wife, missionaries for the N. S. A., will serve the Philadelphia (Pa) Spiritualist Society during the month of January. Their services can be secured to hold meetings and organize societies anywhere within two hundred miles of Philadelphia. Parties wishing their services during that month please address them at 605 North 7th street, Philadelphia, Pa. They will return to Ohio and Indiana, February 1.

E. J. Schellhous writes: "In The Progressive Thinker of December 21, is published a lecture by Col. H. S. Olcott. It is an able, clear, explicit comprehensive exposition of the subject treated. It is just the thing the most needed in the investigation of Spiritualism. For one I am rejoiced to see it your paper. I have been repeatedly told that Col. Olcott had exposed Spiritualism and denounced it, and spoke as if that settled it. I wish it could be widely diffused among those interested in this subject. I shall lend my copy containing it until it is worn out."

Important from Iowa.

To all Spiritualists and Freethinking Men and Women in Iowa:—The State Spiritualists Association of Iowa will hold its fifth annual convention in Oskaloosa, Iowa, Jan. 16 to 19, 1902, and as there will be some very important matters to come before the meeting, it makes it the duty of every Spiritualist in the state to be present. As the General Assembly meets about the same time and as there is now on hand some proposed medical legislation, also some "Blue Law Restrictions" contemplated against mediums, we should be prepared to combat this medical trust as well as tyrannical legislation against our religion.

Our programs are now ready for distribution, and will be mailed to those sending their address to the secretary, Mrs. Stella A. Fisk, Keokuk, Iowa. I receive a great many letters of inquiry daily from all parts of the state, indicating that the searchlight of progress is awakening an interest in truth heretofore unheard of. Let every one attend that can possibly do so, and I will assure them a hearty welcome to our beautiful and prosperous city.

DR. G. A. HINTON,
Pres. S. S. A. of Iowa.
Oskaloosa, Iowa.

International Woman Suffrage Convention.

The National Woman Suffrage Association has extended an invitation to the woman suffragists of the world to meet in Washington, D. C., February 12 to 18 inclusive, where in connection with its annual meeting an International Woman Suffrage Conference will be held. Fourteen great nations of the world now have either well defined woman suffrage movements or well organized Woman Suffrage Associations, and these have been all invited to cooperate in the International meeting. Seven of these, England, Canada, Australia, India, Russia, Germany and Sweden have promised to send delegates, and our invitation is awaiting action at the regular meeting of official boards in Norway, France and Holland.

The civilized nations of the earth are slowly but steadily acknowledging the benefits and the justice of self-government. The suffrage has been widely extended in all, within the last fifty years, until in the most of them there is either universal suffrage for men or suffrage with but limited restrictions. All civilized nations have likewise kept pace with the United States and England in the agitation which has insisted that the fundamental principle of self-government, "Taxation without representation is tyranny," and "Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed," logically apply to women as well as to men, and there are now few European nations in which women do not enjoy some form of suffrage. In Belgium, one of these, there is an energetic woman suffrage movement, and in another, Holland, there is a Woman Suffrage organization, which will doubtless be represented in the International Conference.

The representative of each nation will present a report, setting forth clearly the educational, legal, industrial, social, religious and political status of its own women. This great meeting will unquestionably stand as a significant, historical mile-post in the progress of the world.

The Conference will be opened on February 12, with an "Evening With American Pioneers;" Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Susan B. Anthony, Mary A. Livermore, Julia Ward Howe, Isabella Beecher Hooker and Carolina Hallowell Miller, six octogenarians, the value of whose services in the emancipation of women from old time laws and customs are beyond computation, have promised to speak. The pioneer suffragists of each State will be invited to be present and to sit upon the platform.

An evening with the "New Woman" will follow on February 13, and women who have reaped the benefits of liberal opportunities, secured for them by the pioneers, will fill the program. The representatives of the college, the professions, the club and the works of philanthropy, will demonstrate that the New Woman is a helpful factor in the world.

An evening with the "New Man," for the New Man is both worthy and willing to walk by the side of the New Woman, will follow, and the remainder of the evenings will be probably filled by foreign speakers.

All auxiliary State Associations are urged to especial diligence in the effort of sending full delegations. We should greet our pioneers and our foreign guests with the largest suffrage convention the association ever held. With the promise of so inspiring and important a meeting, delegates will easily be found. Suffragists everywhere are cordially invited to be present.

Several of our foreign guests are willing to remain a few weeks in the United States and will accept lecture appointments. Every club in the United States is urged to consider the advisability of securing either one of our foreign speakers or one of our "home talent" for a lecture during the winter. An opportunity is offered to hear new presentations of the cause with fresh voices. Let our great Washington meeting be followed with a campaign of education, until its echoes shall be heard in the remotest hamlet of the nation. For names and terms apply to the National Headquarters, 2008 American Tract Building, New York. Clubs, will you not help this campaign by arranging for a good meeting in your town?

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

Mrs. Hannah Patterson, aged 62, a native of Northumberland, England, passed to spirit life, Sunday evening, December 8, at Lucyville, Pa. She had been a Spiritualist for thirteen years, being converted by mediumship in the family. Services were conducted by Mrs. Zalda Brown Kates. K.

Suddenly, at Paw Paw, Mich., December 2, 1901, Death's messenger came and took from the home my father, James Phillips. The funeral was largely attended at the late home, December 6, conducted by George B. Holmes, of 309 Lyon street, Grand Rapids, Mich.

NELLIE PHILLIPS RALEIGH.

Isaac Gabrion, Jr., passed to spirit life, March 26, 1900, aged 23 years, 11 months and 2 days. On September 2, 1898, he was married to Elizabeth Plowfield, daughter of David Plowfield, of New Haven, and in the spring of 1899 took charge of the farm where he lived at the time of his death. He was a kind and indulgent husband, and the idol of his father. The bereaved family has the sympathy of the entire community. The funeral, which was one of the largest ever held in this community—85 teams in the procession, was conducted by Rev. Wm. A. Taylor, at the town hall at New Haven Center, Wednesday forenoon, March 28. Interment in New Haven Center cemetery.

Passed to spirit life, Mrs. Edith L. Lyall, of Cleveland, O., aged 22 years. She was a medium, one that was surrounded by high and beautiful influences. None knew her but to love her. She has left this body of mortal clay, but only passed on to a higher sphere of action. Funeral services conducted by Mrs. Alice Baker. B.

Passed to spirit life, December 18, 1901, Alvin Bertram Coombs, only son of Charles A. and Ruth Coombs (a member of the Band of Harmony), at his residence, 286 N. Lawndale avenue, Chicago, Ill., aged 11 years, 7 months and 7 days. Memorial serives will be held at Handel Hall, December 29, 1901, at 10:45 a. m. COR.

Passed to the higher life, after a long illness, from Holland, Mich., November 21, Mrs. A. E. Sawyer, aged 74 years. She leaves two daughters, Mrs. W. H. Beach, of Holland, Mich., and Dr. Maude C. M. Haddock, of Saginaw, Mich. She was ever a loving and unselfish mother, a true and earnest Spiritualist, and a member of the Sun Angel Order of Light for many years. COR.

Services were held in the Methodist church. It was filled to the doors. Services were conducted by the writer. MARIAN CARPENTER.

Ilion D. Thurston, aged 21 years, passed to spirit life, Nov. 9, by being drowned, falling from the steamer Michigan into the St. Joseph river, in the state of Idaho, where he had gone for his health. He was a young man of sterling qualities. The relatives have the deep sympathy of a very large circle of friends in this hour of their great bereavement, and especially the sweet-faced girl that was so soon to have been his bride. He was a Spiritualist, and knew that continuity of life was a truth. There was a very large attendance at the funeral. Services were conducted by the writer. MARIAN CARPENTER.

The funeral of Mrs. Aurinda Maynard was held on Dec. 5, at her home in Auburn, Ohio. Mrs. Maynard was the wife of Luther Maynard, who preceded her eight years ago. She and her husband were pioneers of Ohio, and were firm supporters in the immortality of the soul. She has lived to see many changes, having reached the age of 89 years. The services were conducted by Dr. D. M. King. X.

Lawrence L. Brown passed from this life Wednesday night, Dec. 4, at the age of 82 years. His funeral was held on Sunday at the home, and was largely attended by neighbors and friends. Mrs. Brown was one of the founders of Maple Dell camp. He leaves a wife and many friends who will miss his presence. By his request his body was cremated. He was a man of wealth and integrity. D. M. King officiated. X.

Passed to spirit life, Dec. 8, 1901, at the home of her daughter, (Mrs. E. S. Davis, Warrendale, St. Paul), Mrs. Sarah W. Hoar, in her 96th year. After a long and useful life, her spirit passed peacefully away during sleep. Although bent with the weight of years and totally blind, she retained her spiritual gifts to the last, which she was always glad to use for the benefit of mankind. The funeral was ideal from our point of view. Her wishes were carried out in every detail. Laid out in the garb of a bride, her gown was a beautiful silver gray; the casket covered with the same; lace and flowers arranged by loving hands. Thus attired she was ready to be received by the life companion gone on some years ago. More wonderful still was the great spiritual strength manifested which enabled the daughter to stand beside her mother's bier and improvise verse after verse, appropriate for the occasion. Several mediums took part, and all present were impressed with the beauty of the scene. C.

"The Gospel of Buddha, According to Old Records." Told by Paul Carus. This book is heartily commended to students of the science of religions, and to all who would gain a fair conception of Buddhism in its spirit and living principles. Spiritualist or Christian can scarcely read it without spiritual profit. Price $1. For sale at this office.

"The Molecular Hypothesis of Nature." By Prof. Wm. M. Lockwood. Prof. Lockwood is recognized as one of the ablest lecturers on the spiritual rostrum. In this little volume he presents in succinct form the substance of his lectures on the Molecular Hypothesis of Nature; and presents his views as demonstrating a scientific basis of Spiritualism. The book is commended to all who love to study and think. For sale at this office. Price, 25 cents.

"The Commandments Analyzed." By W. H. Bach. The Commandments are not only analyzed, but contrasted with other Bible passages, showing great incongruities. Price 25 cents. For sale at this office.

"Never-Ending Life Assured by Science." By Daniel Kent Tenney. A strong and conclusive argument from the basis of science. For sale at this office. Price 6 cents.

STANDING UP FOR JESUS, Or what the Editor of the Freethinker's Magazine thinks of him. Price, 4 cents; twenty-five copies for 50 cents.

RELIGION OF THE FUTURE. By S. Weil. Cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents. This is a work of great value, written by one of the keenest, most powerful and most truly religious minds of the day. It is particularly a work which should be put into the hands of those who have freed themselves from the dogmas of orthodoxy and from the dogmas of materialistic science, for it will strengthen the conviction of the free mind that mind and senses are not the whole of life.

The chapters reveal a new method in psychic and spiritual research. They show vivid glimpses of a stupendous moral cosmos that will supersede moral confusion, that only verifiable tenets can survive, and the childhood period of faith and fancy will be superseded by knowledge and facts.

MAHOMET, THE ILLUSTRIOUS. By Godfrey Higgins, Esq. This work is one of Liberal Classics. No author was better qualified to write an impartial and honest life of Mahomet than Godfrey Higgins, and this volume is intensely interesting. It should be read in conjunction with Gibbon's work. Price, 25 cents.

The Religion of Spiritualism. Its Phenomena and Philosophy. By the Rev. Samuel Watson. This work was written by a modern Savior, a grand and noble man. Price, $1.00. A valuable book for the money.

"AS IT IS TO BE."

A VERY SUGGESTIVE WORK.

It Beams With Spiritual Truths.

This is a beautiful book, by Cora Lynn Daniels, and it scintillates with grand spiritual thought. An idea of this work can be obtained by reading the titles of a few of the chapters therein:

The Process of Dying; Light and Spirit; The Law of Attraction; Senses of the Spirit; What Is Unconscious Will; Fear; Astrology; The God-Soul of Man; The Drama; A Day in Heaven. Price $1. For sale at this office.

"NO BEGINNING."

An Excellent Work for Thinkers.

This book, "No Beginning," is by William H. Maple. The Arena says of it: "The argument is unanswerable. The book will at once appeal to the reason of every reader, and leave him more amazed than ever at the prevalence of the theory of Creation." The Two has always been a fateful num- Free Thought Ideal says: "We found it full of glittering thoughts for thinkers, and the very death warrant of Christian superstition shines upon its pages." Price 75 cents.

LIGHT OF EGYPT.

The Second Volume of a Most Valuable Work.

This is the author's posthumous work left in MS. to a few of his private pupils in occultism, and like Volume I. is (a valuable addition and) a library on occult subjects. Spiritual astrology is especially elaborated. Alchemy, Talismans, the Magic Wand, Symbolism, Correspondence, Penetralia, etc., are a few of the subjects treated of in a scholarly and masterly manner, showing the author to be familiar with his subjects. You cannot afford to be without it, as well as all his other books, viz.: The Light of Egypt, Vol. I., bound in cloth, $2; paper, $1. The Light of Egypt, Vol. II., bound in cloth only, $2. Celestial Dynamics, cloth, $1. The Language of the Stars, paper, 50 cents. For sale at this office.

Glimpses of Heaven: Through the hand of Carrie E. S. Twing automatically. By Gilbert Haven, late Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church. This is the second book from this eminent divine since he passed to Spirit-life. Price 20c. For sale at this office.

Life of WILLIAM M'KINLEY,

Our Martyred President,

With Short Biographies of Lincoln and Garfield, and a Comprehensive Life of President Roosevelt.

Edited by

RT. REV. SAMUEL FALLOWS, LL. D.

The book contains 453 pages, weighs a little more than three pounds, is printed from large clear type, has 51 illustrations, including half-tone portraits of Mr. and Mrs. McKinley, and his mother, the author and members of his cabinet and warm friends, Lincoln, Garfield, President Roosevelt and family; battle scenes of the rebellion in which Mr. McKinley participated; also a photo of the assassin, scenes of the tragedy, the death-bed, Mrs. McKinley's leave-taking of her illustrious and devoted husband, and other interesting illustrations.

This massive work contains a complete biography of the martyred President, and many of his masterpieces of eloquence as a statesman, and a record of his beautiful home life and untiring devotion to his wife and mother. It also contains sketches of Lincoln and Garfield, and a brief history of Anarchy, its purposes and results.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

Mechanic: Q. Is it possible to utilize the internal heat of the earth as a source of power?

A. Certain professors have gained a cheap notoriety, by having reporters interview them and filling their willing ears with speculations on what may be done, and what they are going to do with the internal heat of the earth. The vast coal beds will be exhausted they say, and some other source of heat and power must be looked for. It is only a question of time, and the demand is rapidly increasing. The great source of energy has not yet been "tapped," nor Edison resolved coal direct into electric power. If we are not to be deprived of power, heat and light, then the crust of the earth must be cracked. It is hot enough beneath. The average increase of temperature downward of mines and deep borings, is one degree Fahrenheit for every sixty feet. At a depth of 8,000 feet the temperature of boiling water is reached, and at a depth of thirty or forty miles a degree of heat is reached sufficient to melt the most refractory known substance. The proportion of this thin crust to the molten central mass, even taking the thickness of the crust at one hundred miles, is about that of an orange peel to the pulp.

There is plenty of heat there, and enough escapes through the volcanic vents to fire the boilers of all the engines in the world. Why not bore to sufficient depth to reach this supply, and have heat stream up, just as a gusher spouts oil? Then according to the old song: "Mollie put the kettle on, and we'll all take tea!"

This will be making better use of the central fire than some famous theologians, who would have it for a sort of local hell for those who fail to believe with them. It is well equipped for their purpose, except that although it will keep hot a long time, it will surely cool off and cannot burn forever. And surely that ought to satisfy them and their God; burning a sinner as long as there is any heat left in the earth to burn him with!

Were it possible to sink a shaft down to the molten interior, what would be the result? The pressure with which the liquid matter is held is measured by the power of eight or ten thousand degrees of heat. The direct power which restrains this expansion may be measured by the weight of a square inch of crust reaching down 100 miles. This, calculating from the weight of granite and allowing for condensation in descending, may be placed at from one and a half to two pounds to the foot, or for 100 miles, from eight hundred thousand to one million pounds. That is, the pressure to the square inch by which the shell holds its contents is expressed by these numbers, which are only equalled by that of gunpowder in a cannon at the initial of explosion, estimated all the way from 7 to 662 tons to the square inch. If a shaft were sunk through the crust, molten matter would rise just as it does in the shaft of a volcano, and pour forth until the repressed force was relieved. The project is as practical as it would be to draw a train of cars by a rope to the tail of a comet.

A Mourner: Q. If a friend die in a distant land, does it affect the spirit, whether the body be there interred or brought home?

A. The return of the body may be consolation to the friends, and gratify the wishes of the spirit, yet the estate of the spirit will not be in the least affected thereby. This sacredness of the body is a growth of immemorial religious doctrines. In the days of the Pharaohs, the belief in the final return of the spirit to the body; the resurrection of the latter, made it imperative to preserve it with great care. The Greeks considered it the height of impiety to leave their dead on the field of battle unburied, for the spirits wandered on the misty banks of the nether world until their bodies received burial.

The judgment day transferred from Egyptian to Christian theology, with the idea of a physical resurrection, has preserved the superstitious regard for the physical body.

If the dead are to rise at the first sound of the trump of doom, it will be pleasant for friends and families to stand grouped together, and it would indeed be lonely to arise on the other side of the globe amidst howling savages.

Spiritualists accept none of these myths. They believe and know that death is the final separation of the spirit and body. The latter goes back to the elements from which it came, to be resolved into new forms. To the spirit it is no more than a cast-off garment. Friends may treasure it as the only tangible object between them and the silence which gathers over the tomb, and love may find relief in its last, blinding homage, yet the freed spirit must regard the broken body, as the butterfly does the shell of the chrysalis from which it has escaped.

The physical body is renewed with every passing hour, completely perhaps with every year, and the especial form from which the spirit departs is no more its personality than the many others it has discarded atom by atom.

Why should we bring back the discarded shreds? Why trouble ourselves about the broken cage? Has not the spirit rose supreme, and come near to us? As Spiritualists should we not cease to entertain such reverence for the body, and regard the spirit as all in all?

My heart is full of sympathy for those whose loved ones rest in distant lands, or lie on the floor of the deep, deep sea. To them the knowledge of the home-coming of the unseen, yet responsive spirits is a balm in Gilead.

There is one aspect of this subject which also comes from the lingering shadows of old beliefs. The friend who dies and is buried far from home, never seems dead to us. Not until we see the wasted form, and with reverent care consign it to the tomb, do we realize our conseling loss. Or we may after distant journeyings stand by the neglected mound thrown by strange hands over the beloved form, and through our tears become conscious that indeed our loved have gone. A lady said she did not realize the death of her husband, who was buried in the Carribbean Sea, until his trunk came home six months thereafter. Yet before his body slipped from the deck into the rolling sea he was with her!

Instead of the vain care for the broken cage, should we cultivate the faculties which enable us to hear the song of the bird which has escaped. All the insignia of mourning, regrets and tears, are as clouds which obscure our spiritual perceptions at a time we most need hem.

Not in the grave, beneath the grassy mound, or under the immeasurable tide of waters, sleep the treasured ones. They are near us, with full consciousness of our thoughts; with minds clouded by our tears, or full of joy at our gladness.

Thos. A. White: Q. As Jesus Christ did not leave any written account of his life, how long after his death was it before anything was written about him, and who wrote it?

A. When and by whom the books of Matthew, Mark, Luke and St. John were written is absolutely unknown and cannot be determined. The ablest critics vary centuries in their conjectures, for conjectures they are and nothing more. Outside these books there is not an authentic allusion to Christ or his work in all the voluminous Greek and Roman literature of that time.

Good Work in Buffalo.

In addition to the pastorate of Rev. Moses Hull at the Temple, corner of Jersey and Prospect, there are several lesser lights shining in their own way and sphere. Conspicuous as an all-around worker, whose helpfulness founded the Temple and has done much to keep it alive with good works, is the famous clairvoyant doctor, Mrs. J. H. R. Matteson, at 248 N. Division street. She is kept in a constant fight by the plottings and persecutions of the jealous regulars; and has been arrested some ten or fifteen times, but never convicted. This is remarkable, since she always confessed that she has no medical diploma, and that she examines and prescribes for the sick. But her success in curing is so well known, and her patients are among lawyers, judges, juries, and even physicians, all of whom know the value of her remarkable gifts, that no one, except a medical despot wants her practice meddled with. They realize the injustice of these pseudo-legal prosecutions, and no one has yet been found to convict her. But they are vigilant and untiring, in their efforts to secure her conviction, and to make it possible they are all the time meddling with the legislature to get more and more absurd and prohibitory laws, to enable them to destroy her work and all others who do not ask their permission to cure the patients which they cannot cure. Here is the danger. They must be watched, and their plots exposed before the legislative committees, and their nefarious schemes defeated before they become laws, or they may make it possible to crucify every one who dares to cure the sick by any process, even if it be but a bath, or a cup of tea, or a word of cheer. There is need of unity among all Spiritualists and all progressive people and all liberals, to protect ourselves from the evil designs of proscriptive bigots, and medical censors. Mrs. Dr. Matteson is the most conspicuous target for their arrows, in Buffalo, and the Christian Scientists are pretty well enlisted now. But last winter, while they helped to fight the medical bill, and had the help of Spiritualists with Moses Hull, Dr. Weaver, and A. H. Richardson, who defended their rights in common with all others, they had not the manly liberality, or regard for human rights, to stand by the Spiritualists when our religion was attacked by the same gang of legislative tinkers. Thus the Christian Scientists of the state of New York proved themselves unworthy the confidence of the lovers of liberty and justice.

Another conspicuous co-worker in Buffalo is Mrs. A. Atcheson, 274 North Division street, near Mrs. Dr. Matteson's, whose steady work has won the confidence and respect of Spiritualists and the general public, by her faithfulness, honesty and fine mediumship. It is to her credit, too, that she does not seek to rival, or conflict with the work of the main society by holding Sunday meetings at the same hour. But she and her husband are members of the Society over which Mr. Hull presides, and attend and support its meetings, and she has her meetings at her own parlors Monday evenings, and gives sittings daily through the week. Thus her work contributes to the support of the Temple, and adds to instead of drawing from Mr. Hull's support. At her Monday evening meetings she can only accommodate 30 to 35, and often turns away more than as many as find seats. To each of those in attendance she usually gives something that is recognized as a special test, and thus carries conviction and makes converts to Spiritualism. From all that I know of her and her work I am confident that she is doing an honest and valuable work for Spiritualism and is a credit to the cause she represents.

Christian Scientists have a large following in Buffalo, and have a chapel just across the street from the Spiritual Temple.

Mr. Hull is serving on his fourth year for the same society, and I hope he is building up the spiritual church. A man of his experience and ability ought to make Buffalo tremble with success. LYMAN C. HOWE.

SAVED BY THE SPIRIT.

She Was Not Forgotten by the Angels.

She had led the life and pace that kills. Had been the pet and fad of wealth; had been carried on the highest rolling wave of pleasure; had enjoyed every good thing that life holds for youth, beauty, brilliance and ability.

In less than twenty-four hours the great change was declared. None could explain it, and she would not. All her kind stared, wide-eyed, then shrugged their dimpled shoulders.

"Sudden insanity!" they whispered, then forget her, with a laugh.

But, blessed be the Highest, the good angels did not forget her, and the constant supplications of her mother—ah! her mother!—had spread and waved their way at last to the feet of the beautiful Savior. Tracing the spirit whose constant pleading had bloomed in such beauty before Him, He gave permission that she and she alone, should go and save her child!

Think a moment, how all the realm of heaven vibrated in harmony and unison with the happy pulsing of that mother's heart!

Whenever Elene slumbered, this Sweet Spirit placed her hands upon her head, then Elene would dream of her mother, of her childhood days and the flower garden she had loved in those days. Though she never told it, it was these constant recurring dreams and visions of her mother's face, that brought at last, the great change in her mode of life.

She gave away with lavish hand all she possessed. She cared for no remembrances of those times nor of those friends, so they accepted her gifts and let her drift from sight and knowledge. For all they knew, she was dead by this crispy fair October morning.

In reality, she was trudging sadly along a dreary country road, having sheltered the night before beneath the stars. Despite her weariness and weakness she was a graceful, striking figure. Tall and slender, with a strange, somber, beautiful face, she seemed almost wonderful to thesimple-minded, honest-hearted country folk she chanced to meet.

She was seeking work, she said. "What could she do?" they asked.

"Anything! from teaching music and painting their portraits, to paring potatoes and washing plates!"

They looked in those brilliant, soul-sick eyes, and turned away. Ah, sister souls, on this rack of life, when will ye learn mercy, and the courtesy of sympathy?

To tell the truth, they were afraid of her, yet they knew not it was a tragedy of the soul they witnessed.

Said one honest old soul, "I don't believe you can work; you never did a day's work in your life, now tell the truth?"

"Madam," she replied, with her stately courtesy, "acts speak louder than words; give me opportunity to show you how I will work."

"Not I; you are too handsome by far, and I have sons!"

"Ah! so the silly sons of the land are of more value than the lives of the daughters. By all means protect your sons, my mother!"

So she turned and went her way. The orchards bent their boughs across the walls and fences, but the fruit had been plucked. A few stray autumn dandelions spread their gold before her. A chill breeze swept down from the top of the hill, scattering leaves of red and dark bronze about her. She shuddered, but the Sweet Spirit walking by her side clasped hands with her.

"Something in this weather," murmured Elene, "reminds me so of mother. Is there no heart on earth gentle and tender as hers? I've known her, in the days that are gone, take the weary wanderer in and give food and rest." Suddenly throwing wide her arms to the grey skies, where storm clouds seemed gathering, she exclaimed:

"Mother, I am a wanderer now, your little girl, Elene, and I am hungry, mother, very hungry. Open your arms and find room for me, let me rest again in your dear bosom." She could not see the Sweet Spirit's open arms and glowing eyes, yet she felt warmed and cheered.

Lifting her dark, tired eyes, she saw midway between the top and bottom of the hill a little house. The Sweet Spirit passed in front and holding out her hands drew the wanderer on and gave her faltering limbs more strength.

"Mother," she whispered, "I will ask for aid in that little brown house on the hill: If I am refused again, you will not blame me that I lie down to-night and die."

Wearily she struggled on her upward way. Strength was so nearly gone when she finished the climb, she had to lean on the fence a while before she could open the gate and enter.

The Sweet Spirit wound her arms about her child, and gave from all her delicate ethereal frame, life and vigor to the coarser atoms of Elene's material body. That was maternal love! She had given of her life and vigor once before to build that body!

Thus invigorated, Elene opened the gate and passed in. A few steps, and she halted, her hands clasped as in prayer. What was this—original Eden? She felt strong impulses to pray!

Do you know the delicacy of the hop-vine foliage, the feathery grace of the cypress-vine, with its stars of red and snow? Do you know the real glory of the morning-vine that opens its fairy goblets of pink, of blue, or red and white to all the bees and butterflies of cool October days?

On all sides Elene now saw all this delicate, delicious beauty. Perhaps not in years had she thought of the simple favorites of old-time gardens. Now here they smiled and nodded to her a merry welcome. Blue larkspurs, rich pansies in purple and black velvet with golden eyes, tall hollyhocks in crimson satin reached up to her, golden, dark-hearted marigolds were at her knees!

Where for years, had been hidden, all the loves and companions of her youth? A little further, asters, chrysanthemums and dahlias beckoned to her. She was in a neat graveled walk, and on each hand were lavished these old-fashioned darlings. The climax was reached when in a large pot she spied a generous growth of the rich old carnation pinks!

Before that, from very weakness and excess of emotion she went on her knees. She bowed her head and kissed the spicy, rosy beauties. She held the clusters in her white hands, turned her head side-wise to view them, and big silver tears fell over her face.

"Do you love them so much?" asked a gentle voice per by.

A woman, older much than Elene, little and lean and grey-haired, was surveying her with eyes of pitying interest. This woman, in her dark print dress and snow-white apron, was evidently the mistress of the house.

Elene tried to rise but really could not, but she had intuition, or was it the Sweet Spirit's whisper? She believed she was looking into the eyes of a sister-soul, and with an effort after her natural courtesy, said feebly:

"Madam, I am fainting with exhaustion—to tell the truth, I am starving; but before you give me of your bread I must confess, lest you feel later your sympathies were played upon, I am not the clean-souled woman you are! I have been a great sinner,—have you sons to save? Some one sent me away because they had sons, and I had a handsome face, they said, but my face does not feed me.

"Somewhere I have heard words about 'a cup of water in my name.' Will you give me a cup of water in that Name? and I would be thankful for a piece of bread also, for I have walked miles and miles to leave that life of sin, and seek a new chance to live. Am I not worthy of a bite of bread to hold my life a little longer?"

She was simply babbling her wandering thoughts, partly to the woman, partly to the red carnations. Now this little, lean, grey-haired woman was a wonder among women, for she carried charity in her heart, and she knew there are forces that often shape our lives not as we would, but as we must endure. She looked for the Soul, and not for Sin. She put out her hands and helped Elene to her feet.

"Come in the house with me, friend. You shall be very welcome. You have found it hard, hard work, dear child, to play the prodigal daughter's return! It always is. Seldom comes the golden ring to us when we return, and seldom the feast of the fatted calf, but you and I will have a cozy coffee-cup and a broiled fowl instead. I am glad now my breakfast was delayed. I knew some sweet spirit hindered my efforts this morning."

The good woman broke a cluster of the carnations and pressed them in the cold fingers of her unexpected guest. With her arm about Elene she helped her to the house, and did set meat before her, and bring water for her wearied feet, as the Scriptures bid one do for the traveler.

Looking down into Elene's dark, troubled eyes she said: "My child, I can read it all! the repentance and the grief, and the soul-killing repulses on the way! But, blessed be the Chest, you have reached me at last. Here you shall rest—rest until you are rebuilt again; then from here as a centre of strength and safety, you may reach out until you find your place in this world and life.

"Men shall yet revere you; no woman may draw her skirts aside from you! I give you this good word as from the Greatest; you are not at present fit to battle with the world. Here you are to rest, and you shall be to me as my daughter. Be not alarmed, Elene. If you could see my soul, as I do yours, and perhaps some day you may, you would know it is all right!

"In the ages that are past, you, your soul I mean, have aided me, and this rest and haven I offer you is only against the debt of love I owe you!"

Bending down to Elene, the soul in grey hair pressed lips lovingly with the soul in golden hair, and at her hypnotic command, "Rest, sleep, and be at peace," Elene obeyed.

A LOUD CALL.

To the Spiritualists of Ohio.

We are willing as a board of the Ohio State Spiritual Association (without salary or emoluments), to comply with the adage of our revered Thomas Jefferson: "When a man assumes a public trust, he should consider himself as public property." It is our desire to promulgate the truths of Spiritualism, both in the phenomenal and philosophical aspect, by which those yet in darkness can be reached and convinced of the reality in the domain of nature; but in the extent and effectiveness thereof we are checkmated by the apathy and indifference of the officers of our dependent societies, in not keeping the State Association informed of the number of members of the several societies (for statistical purpose), requirements and requests, in fact, all such data as may be of interest to our cause. Let us illustrate: In the last United States census report we find record of only 45,030 confessed Spiritualists, who have proof of their existence beyond this "vale of tears" and claim that individual immortality has been proven beyond the shadow of a doubt. It is ridiculous to consider that this is a fact; mental weakness and dereliction of duties is the only excuse.

To the members and officers of the several societies we would say: It rests with you; we as a board can perform certain functions only when we have the assistance and co-operation of our dependent societies. It is the intention of our State Association with the assistance of the N. S. A. and yourselves to organize and perpetuate a society in every town and hamlet in this State, and thereby build up a strong association, which will command respect in our secular legislative halls, saying nothing about orthodoxy.

Now, sisters and brothers, let us be Spiritualists, not Spiritists. "Come over to Macedonia" and give us what mental and pecuniary assistance you can in the vineyard, for the uplifting of womanhood and manhood, and receive your "eleventh hour penny" when you step over the border. Judging from the present indications the prospect for practical and progressive spiritual unfoldment was never brighter than at the present time, in reaching the materialist and church alike. Let us make a long pull, a strong pull and a pull all together.

"Let ten thousand be your pens and object all as one."

JOHN C. HEMMETER,
Cleveland, O. Sec'y O. S. A.

By an Eye Witness.

To the Editor:—A unique, inspiring and interesting ceremonial took place at the residence of Mrs. Billiford, in connection with the transition of her mother, Lena Birg, to the higher spiritual realm. Certain facts in connection with the passing over of this aged and interesting sister are worthy of comment, and pleasurable to all who take an interest in our loved phenomena and philosophy. The medium chosen to officiate at the funeral was Mrs. A. C. Priest, just returned from a prolonged visit to the East. In connection with the departed it is necessary to say that she was a convert to our beautiful knowledge about five years ago, and developed mediumistic qualities in a marked degree. For some time previous to her advent into the next sphere of action, she had expressed a strong desire to see Mrs. Priest once more, as she had been instrumental in leading her to the light of truth, and on Mrs. Priest's visiting her after her arrival home, the old lady expressed much joy, and said she was now ready to go to her spirit home. She had always expressed a strong desire for Mrs. Priest to officiate at her funeral, which she did in an efficient manner.

The material arrangements provided by the family of the translated sister were of a perfect nature and simply terminated their untiring energies and provisions for the sister while in her earthly body. The ceremonial at the house was simple but impressive, and suggestive of joy and happiness, tinctured, of course, by natural regret at losing the physical presence of a loved mother and grandmother. After an appropriate song by the medium and also a very sweet, concise and inspiring eulogy, the casket was borne through the rooms and presented to the view of a numerous gathering of friends who could not fail to be inspired by the exquisite display of floral offerings so in accordance with the pure, sweet spirit passed on, and whose physical remains rested peacefully under them.

To those who know the Spokane surroundings, a description of the resting-place of the sister is unnecessary, but for the stranger to the same we would say that the road to the cemetery winds through undulating ground and hills which command a lovely view of the Spokane river, and a considerable portion of the town and surrounding country, and the resting place provided by her loving family is one of the prettiest possible, and would suggest a thought of desire for a like spot when required; and now at the grave the ceremonial comes. The casket was placed in position over the grave and held there by the most modern appliances without the aid of human hands and muscle, when the medium gave an inspiring song to the dear sister passed over, and after a few appropriate words of peace to the departed and her family present, then followed one of the most graceful and impressive scenes ever witnessed by the writer. The casket, entirely covered by the beautiful floral tributes, began slowly descending to its final position, conveyed there by the touch of the kneeling undertaker's fingers upon the patent spring in connection with the apparatus, and the casket slowly disappeared from sight. In addition to the foregoing, Mr. Milgard, friend of the departed, who is also a convert through Mrs. Priest's mediumship, gave a eulogy in the German tongue for the benefit of the Germans present.

DEAFNESS CURED

By No Means Until ACTINA Was Discovered.

Ninety-five per cent of all cases of Deafness brought to our attention is the result of chronic catarrh of the throat and middle ear. The air passages become clogged by catarrhal deposits, stopping the action of the vibratory bones. Until these deposits are removed a cure is impossible. The inner ear cannot be reached by probing or spraying, hence the inability of Aurists or Physicians to cure. Ear drums are worse than useless.

It is folly, therefore, for deaf persons to hope for a cure by the old methods of the aurists and physicians, and instead of wasting precious time and money on methods that never have cured Deafness or Catarrh, they should awake to the times and apply the scientific cure. That there is a scientific cure for Deafness and Catarrh is demonstrated every day by the use of ACTINA. The vapor current generated in the ACTINA passes through the Eustachian tubes into the middle ear, removing the Catarrhal obstructions as it passes through the tubes and loosens up the bones (hammer, anvil and stirrup) in the inner ear, making them respond to the slightest vibration of sound.

RINGING NOISES IN THE HEAD.

ACTINA has never failed to cure this distressing symptom. The vapor current passes quickly and freely through the Eustachian tubes removing the catarrhal substances that obstruct the easy exit of the wave sounds. We have known people troubled with this symptom for years to be completely cured in only three weeks' use of the ACTINA.

As Deafness and ringing noises are caused from Catarrh, the hearing cannot be restored and noises stopped till the Catarrh is cured, and as Catarrh cannot exist under the use of ACTINA no person need be deaf or have ringing noises in the head if they will use ACTINA properly.

ACTINA also cures Asthma, Bronchitis, Sore Throat, Weak Lungs, Colds and Headache; all of which are directly or indirectly due to catarrh.

Write us about your case. We give advice free, and positive proof of cures.

"A REMARKABLE DOCTOR BOOK"

Has Just Been Issued, Entitled

THE NATURE CURE

By Physical and Mental Methods, Illustrated.

A Bridge from the Old to the New; the Dawn of a New Day in Medical Practice. A Clear, Short-Cut Treatise on the Cause and Cure of Disease.

By MARVIN E. CONGER, M. D., assisted by ROSA C. CONGER, M. D.

A VALUABLE TEXT BOOK FOR ALL PEOPLE, FOR ALL TIME.

Light is turned on to medical mysteries, latin prescriptions, dogmatic theories and dangerous experiments of expensive medical practice of to day. Every effort has been taken to make the leading points so plain that all, young and old, may easily understand. Condensed facts, short, clear-cut paragraphs are some of the attractive features.

Our definition of Medicine.—Any method or remedy that will remove or modify pain and restore the sick to normal condition, is practical medicine.

Stripped of mystery and deception, the study and practice of medicine can be carried to success in every intelligent home.

The best medical practice is the one that will cure in the shortest time with the least risk and expense.

Nature Cure is a true exponent of the practice of medicine as defined, and stands squarely upon truth and demonstration.

The new and better methods of curing the sick and preventing disease, have never before been so clearly stated in plain English for the plain people.

The Nature Cure teaches how Nature cures.

It does not use poisonous drugs.

It does not endorse dangerous experiments with the surgeon's knife.

It will save money in every home.

It teaches how typhoid and other fevers, pneumonia, la-grippe, diphtheria and other forms of disease considered dangerous, may be cured by short-cut methods.

As a medical book for homes, it is THE BEST, and up-to-date in every particular.

TESTIMONIALS.

SUSANNA W. DODDS, M. D., of St. Louis, Mo., writes:—"I have not read anything in a long time that has given me so much pleasure. It is brimful and running over with good things. One single prescription—how to cure malaria in 24 to 48 hours—is worth more than the price of the book."

"I agree with you that we need physicians to teach the people how to live, in place of filling their systems with drugs."—CARRIE A. WILBUR, M. D., Sutter City, Cal.

"This book is plainly the work of rational minds."—METAPHISICAL MAGAZINE, 503 5th Ave., N. Y.

"I think NATURE CURE is admirably adapted to the wants of the people generally."—JULIET H. SEVERANCE, M. D., Milwaukee, Wis.

"NATURE CURE received. Have looked it over carefully, and read a great deal of it; think it one of the best books I have run across for the home, as it talks in terms which can be understood by any one."—F. A. ONDERDONK, 5 and 7 Pearl Street, Grand Rapids, Mich.

"The volume is one we can heartily commend to all."—PROGRESSIVE THINKER, Chicago.

"The Chapter by Mrs. Conger upon women and children and their ailments is invaluable, and lends completeness to the work as a popular household counsellor."—HUMAN NATURE, San Francisco.

"The truths of hygiene and right living are ably combined with every-day common sense."—L. M. C., Grand Rapids, Mich.

The Book Contains 375 pages, and is finely illustrated; the mechanical and artistic work are the very best. Bound in fine English cloth marble edges, $2.00; common cloth, $1.50.

THE BEAUTIFUL SOUVENIR VOLUME,

By A. LEAH UNDERHILL,
(Of the Fox Family.)

The Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism.

Thirty-three chapters, 477 pages, superbly printed, and bound in colors and gold, 15 illustrations, 5 steel engraved portraits of the celebrated Fox Family, a full page engraving of the old house at Hydesville, which to this day, by the act of its wealthy and respected owner, Artemas Hyde, Esq., bears the inscription, "Here Spiritualism Originated in 1848."

A complete history of the initiation of the movement known as Modern Spiritualism, from the epochal period which dates from March 31, 1848. Since that day, starting from a small country village in western New York, Spiritualism has made its way against tremendous obstacles around the civilized globe.

Only a limited number of copies of this rare book, now out of print, are to be had, and these can be obtained only at this office. Those who remit at once will receive a copy, post paid, at the GREATLY REDUCED PRICE OF $1.

Note.—By failure in 1885 to complete contract with the author, a large portion of the edition was left unbound, and so remained for a number of years, when they were rescued and bound at additional cost, hence this valuable contribution to the cause of Spiritualism was not properly presented to the Spiritualistic public, and a host of investigators have not had the opportunity of securing a copy until the present time. DR. G. E. WATKINS,

The Noted Chronist,

Will on October 15, open his new Boston office, at 1087 Boylston street, where he will be pleased to meet all who may call between the hours of 10 a. m. and 2 p. m. The wonderful work in healing the sick that Dr. Watkins is accomplishing is indeed most astounding; his patients live to testify to his wonderful powers as a healer. For the last year his work has been most wonderful. He says himself that his cures this year have been more than ever before in numbers, as he confined himself to only 30 new patients a month. Dr. Watkins attends personally to each case, and therefore he can do better work than if he had a great many assistants; no staff of visible helpers are in his office to annoy and suggest this and that. He knows what is the trouble with each patient, and knows the right specific to give. He prepares and puts up all of his medicine, and has no help in his medical treatments that is visible help. Write him to-day, and by return mail you will receive the diagnose. No charge made for diagnosing your case. Send age, sex and leading sympton. C. E. BATH, M'gr.

INFLUENCES

That Are Either Beneficent or Malignant.

The law of attraction and repulsion that causes bodies to be drawn toward each other or expelled, is a universal one and in its properly balanced manifestations causes harmonious conditions to exist through the great universe of mind and matter. Modern life in its religious, social and political phases when retrospectively viewed, and noting the advancement that has been made by a comparison of the present with the past, should not lay claim to have attained unto that advanced state through its own unaided efforts, as it is only fulfilling an obligation that justly devolves upon it, for it has the benefit of the experiences of past ages which have cast up the highway and prepared conditions more favorable for progressive development on beneficent lines while struggling against malignant forces that the present age is happily free from.

Progress is inherent in the human soul, not a faculty that it has lately been endowed with. It has through the countless ages of the past little by little advanced against the powers of darkness, the malignant influences of the mere animal existences that would, if not antagonized by the higher forces, have held the human soul down to the plane of the lower orders of life; and in that advancement it has been lifting the lower forms nearer a harmonious association with its own. While they will not attain unto anything but a subordinate grade when brought into comparison with human life, there must be a relative advance all along the line, or else progress would cease to be a recorded fact. When human life advances to a degree that there ceases to be any magnetic attraction and sympathy between it and the lower manifestations of life, the latter will drop out of the race, become extinct as have the prehistoric monsters that once inhabited the earth, and which have ceased to be, and their removal was a necessary act in the great drama of progressive life.

The magnificently luscious fruits and beautiful flowers that have been developed to their present state of perfection have been accomplished by a transmission of that progressive energy from the human, which has taken them out from their wild forms in which they seemed contented to remain and in that primitive state to manifest their life, and unaided would there have remained; and what has been attained would without efforts for farther improvements by human life revert back to their primitive types.

Those reactionary forces can only be typified by the title of malignant influences, because their tendency is a reversion to the primitive types which under the domination of the beneficent forces the world is striving to outgrow. That condition must be combated by those influences that are not contented with even what has been gained in progressive development but is constantly urging forward, but in that effort there is an ebb and flow of the tide. The ebb in its effects is produced by the magnetic attraction of the lower animal forms of life that cannot sympathise or be in accord with the spiritual aspirations of the human soul, and will not surrender by a recognition of those higher forces which are leading, slowly but surely human life to a condition where those forces of what may properly be termed the lower world cease to have an influence. When that is attained there will dawn the golden age for human life on this planet, and until that is attained there will be that violent clashing of interests which periodically will culminate in war, that being only the legalized form of the spirit of anarchy and which must be evoluted out of before those individual manifestations of that spirit which is shocking the finer feelings of civilized society can be suppressed. They are both the result of those emanations from the malignant animalistic influences that at times seems, more than at other times, control the nations of the world.

That the nations of the world have been at times violently convulsed, their efforts to throw off the malignant influences of those conditions wrecked the progressive spirit that was reaching upward for better things were oppression of the false, and had become intolerable, historical records prove; and in considering the phase of development of human society the fact must be admitted that those violent convulsions were necessary, the only practical method for the time being, by which the beneficent influences could accomplish their purpose. As life gets farther removed from the influences of the lower world, progress will be by more peaceful means; it will advance by evolution instead of by revolution.

But looking on the bright side of the illustration, we see that in every flow of that spiritual tide, the attractions of the lower have less and less influence over the human soul; that it is attaining unto a state where the phrase human redemption will not be merely an idle expression without any meaning but an established fact. Those struggles that have been made, and at present are being made by the beneficent influences for the attainment of that end, are proof positive that human life is something more than animal; that its spiritual nature is the part of his being that will eventually be dominant; as it is the immortal principle that will survive the dissolution of the mere animal, which is not the life but only the auxiliary manifestation which is a mere incident of his temporary sojourn here.

The restlessness of the human soul, its inability to remain satisfied with the conditions in which it finds itself placed, and its determination to advance, to give courageous battle to the forces that seek to impede its progress, are evidence that there is an undiscovered country that it is called upon to explore. The antagonism that it meets is only a quickener of the inherent energies that otherwise would have remained dormant. There is truth in the saying that "the Lord, (the beneficent influences) helps those that help themselves."

Human life is not a treadmill existence, it is an onward march. The history of the world is one of progress. Nations and races have in the past arisen, come to maturity, accomplished their mission and decayed; and in studying the history of the world at the present time we see the same forces in operation, but whatever influences are at work removing the effete matter in the religious and political world, they are preparing the conditions that higher forms of life's manifestations can be revealed; they are the beneficent influences that are working in conjunction with human life for its advancement.

Life moves in cycles, that of active work on reformatory lines when the beneficent forces are brimming with zeal to bring into practical use better conditions; and then there is the passive state which to the superficial observer appears to be reactionary, a domination of the malignant forces that seem to be impeding the efforts for advancement; but when rightly understood will be seen to be of an educational work which is needful to prepare human life to realize the necessity of taking an active interest in the progressive work that it has been detailed to accomplish. The planting time must precede the period of active growth and the harvest.

The influences which are bearing on human life, whether of a nature helpful in the advancement of life to higher planes of exstence, or one of a repressive nature, seeking to hold the energies of life down to the plane of the lower types of existence, are the culmination and manifestation of the phase of development that human life has attained in the evolution of its spiritual forces. To deny that they manifest their power in human affairs would be useless in the face of the evidence that is produced from the acts of daily life in the sphere of individual and national exstences. We see that for the time being sometimes one and then the other are dominant in their influence, but there is one fact which every soul who is in accord with the beneficent forces can affirm, which in the words of the poet are so beautifully expressed.

"Look up through the clouds to the sunlight of heaven,
For the wheels of progression are moving to-day;
Look up and fear not, for the sun hath arisen,
The shadows are passing away."

The consciousness that the beneficent influences which are working for human redemption will eventually triumph over all opposing forces has been the inspiration that has strengthened those who in all ages have marched in the vanguard and caused them to be willing to suffer that the truth might triumph; and as the ages roll on their influence is augmenting, enabling the coming generations to more perfectly realize the ideals for which many have suffered a glorious martyrdom, and whose radiance is illuminating the pathway of the present time, making more possible a realization of the fact that it is only the truth which is immortal.

One of the most important factors needful in the progressive development of the soul is a recognition of the fact that there are conditions of life from which it must be separated, absolved from all partnership with, and recognition of those conditions; and that it look forward and upward to those influences which seek to inspire it with hope, and impress it with the knowledge that there are conditions of life superior to any that were formerly recognized. In the journey toward the attainment of those higher life conditions, we see some fall by the way, come under the control of those malignant influences that temporarily have thwarted their noble ambition. The great majority of human life pass them by on the other side, leaving them wounded and alone. The selfish instincts of the animal life have been hard to evolute away from, but in the degree that the spiritual life has been unfolded there has been a greater recognition of the duty of each individual life towards its fellows on the line of assistance in helping to ascend to the plane of higher conditions; and in the degree that that duty is mutually recognized will human life be emancipated from those influences that as the years roll on are becoming more and more oppressive to life's expanding energies.

Good News

FOR THE AFFLICTED.

Dr. Peebles, with His Able Staff of Assistants, Has Originated a System of

PSYCHIC, HYGIENIC, AND MEDICAL

Treatment that is Curing Thousands Who Have Been Pronounced Incurable.

DR. J. M. PEEBLES.

This wonderful system of treatment has so revolutionized the healing of disease that it can almost be said there are no hopeless or incurable cases. Geo. H. Weeks, of Cleveland, Ohio, sends heartfelt thanks for restoration to health after suffering from nervous prostration and insomnia for years; he says he now enjoys excellent health and restful sleep every night. Mrs. J. A. Rust, of Ithaca, Minn., cured of uric acid poisoning in two months' treatment, writes: "I am better than in years and each day brings new strength and health. I will refer all ailing ones to you." Mary A. Earl, of Crawford, Mich., suffering from pronounced female difficulties and kidney disease, says: "I took your treatment three months, and it has been a success in my case. I am indeed grateful to you for my recovery." C. E. Davis, Woodman, N. H., who suffered all the miseries of a dyspeptic, writes that as a result of Dr. Peebles' treatment he has not missed a meal since last March.

If you are in poor health, no matter how long you have suffered or what your complaint is, just write the Doctors a plain letter about your condition and they will confidentially consider the same and send you FREE OF CHARGE a full diagnosis of your case, together with valuable Literature, explaining fully this grand science and their wonderful methods of treatment which gives hope to all the afflicted and special advice in your case, which in itself would be worth more to you than countless sums of money, for Health is above all price. If you are suffering, do not delay a moment, but write at once and receive, ABSOLUTELY FREE, their opinion on your case and the literature to acquaint you fully with their method of treatment.

HIS OLD YELLOW ALMANAC.

I left the farm when mother died, and changed my place of dwellin'
To daughter Susie's stylish house, right in the city street,
And there was them, before I came,
that sort of scared me tellin'
How I would find the town folks' ways so difficult to meet.
They said I'd have no comfort in the rustlin', fixed-up throng,
And I'd have to wear stiff collars every week day right along.

I find I take to city ways just like a duck to water,
I like the racket and the noise, and never tire of shows;
And there's no end of comfort in the mansion of my daughter,
And everything is right at hand, and money freely flows,
And hired help is all about, just listen-
in' for my call,
But I miss the yellow almanac off my old kitchen wall.

The house is full of calendars, from attic to the cellar,
They're painted in all colors, and are fancy-like to see;
But just in this particular I'm not a modern feller,
And the yellow-covered almanac is good enough for me;
I'm used to it, I've seen it 'round from boyhood to old age,
And I rather like the jokin' at the bottom of each page.

I like the way the "S" stood out to show the week's beginnin' (In these new-fangled calendars the days seemed sort of mixed),
And the man upon the cover, though he
wa'n't exactly winnin',
With lungs and liver all exposed, still showed how we are fixed;
And the letters and credentials that were writ to Mr. Ayer, I've often, on a rainy day, found read-
in' very fair.

I tried to find one recently; there wa'n't one in the city.
They toted out great calendars in every sort of style;
I looked at 'em in cold disdain, and answered 'em in pity:
"I'd rather have my almanac than all that costly pile."
And, though I take to city life, I'm lonesome after all
For that old yellow almanac upon my kitchen wall.

BOOK REVIEW.

How to Control Fate Through Suggestion. By Henry Harrison Brown, Editor of Now, San Francisco, Cal. Price 25 cents.

A valuable contribution to New Thought literature; makes suggestion a science as well as an art, applied to healing and to growth in spirituality.

What Converted Me to Spiritualism. One Hundred Testimonies. Edited by B. F. Austin, B. A., Toronto, Canada.

This is a collection of experiences, told in a concise way, and illustrated with excellent cuts of most of the writers, who are persons of prominence in Spiritualism. It makes an eminently interesting, readable and instructive book; not only to Spiritualists, but is well adapted to place in the hands of enquirers and seekers after knowledge.

Death, the Meaning and Result. By J. K. Wilson, a member of the Pennsylvania Bar. Bradford, Pa. 550 pages; cloth, $1.25.

Death, the meaning and result, is a problem of most intense import and interest to man. From the dawn of intellect in primitive man, to the most advanced, mentally developed and intelligent of past and present time, this problem has confronted and challenged the best thought of philosopher and scientist, as well as those in the humbler walks of life. It still remains to incite the attention and draw the investigation of interested minds of all classes.

This book comprises a narrative of wonderful events in the author's experience, of the coming to the author of spirit friends; the manner and circumstances of their coming, and what was said and done by them. The narrative is intensely realistic, as indeed it must be to meet the facts of the case.

The author claims for the book, among other things, that it contains evidence establishing the fact that the resisting power to spirit communion on the earth side of life can be practically overcome, and that the difficulty in establishing a free and uninterrupted intercommunication between earth and the spirit world emanates on the spirit side of life; and it also proves what the resisting power on the spirit side is and by whom interposed—which is certainly very important to know.

The trained mind of an intelligent lawyer is manifested in the author's style.

It is excellent not only for the instruction of Spiritualists, but for missionary work among others.

Esoteric Lessons.

An Argument Against Physical Causation.

The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely physical health upon a purely psychical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom, insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief in which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

SPIRITUALISM—Progress, the Universal Law of Nature; Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.—SPIRITUALISM

VOL. 25. CHICAGO, ILL., JAN. 4, 1902. NO. 632.

SPIRITUAL RATIONALISM AND THE HISTORIC STATUS OF CHRISTIANITY.

In the true Liberal or Rationalist the sectarian spirit is dead. It is against his profession; it is abhorrent to his intellectual nature. He makes its suppression a duty, taking himself severely to task if he finds any vestige of it remaining in his mind. He can neither fight for a creed nor spend for a creed. Such enthusiasm as he has must be an enthusiasm for religion pure and undefiled, for the beauty and truth of ideas, for intellectual principles freed from all alloy of private or class prejudice; his allegiance is to truth uncompromised and unadorned.

It must not be expected that an enthusiasm like this will make any show beside the noisy, hot, partisan fanaticism whose whole ambition is for party triumph.

That the popular religion gains adherents through the promise it holds out of worldly emolument and success, need not be said. Allegiance to orthodoxy certainly is more lucrative than any allegiance to radical views. Evangelicalism is rich and popular; and it controls opinion; it commands the avenues to power and place; it has the key to social favor and distinction. But the allegiance of the self-seeking is no real help to any form of faith. They pull down the institutions they patronize. They are as a plague of mice or locusts, devouring the fields they occupy.

They are an army of traitors, dangerous in proportion to the clashing of their weapons and the noise of their "hurrah." Liberalism is well rid of such—if it has any such.

To a lucid understanding of the world as we find it in the theological field to-day, and a fair conception of its abiding institutions, a bird's-eye view of the facts attending the "evolution" of the Christian churches in their grand divisions will be helpful to all minds, especially those who seek truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth about Christianity.

It is true that Jesus lived and taught and healed. He lived a consistent and devoted life. He practised the practical socialism which he preached. Among the heretics and the few spiritually enlightened people of his day he was understood and revered as an angel of light and power.

He taught in the midst of the heathen of that day, declaring to them all that they were filled with spiritual darkness and that nothing but the knowledge and light of God could free them.

Spiritual or living light alone could break the control of the darkness which held their inner life captive to low conditions.

This doctrine is the secret of Jesus. It is the basic truth and substance of all his teaching. Love to God. Love to man. Charity to all men. The Beatitudes, the Sermon on the Mount, are all but the unfoldings of this great central truth. It is as important to-day as it was in his day; although the light of love and kindness has indeed caught here and there and human conditions have greatly improved.

When man or woman is reborn or developed into the heavenly element, all old things in that soul are done away. Some men watch themselves and strive that no evil mars the begetting of light and life in their souls.

The great mission is to show men the way from spiritual darkness into Light and Life. Men must take up their crosses daily if they would grow in real spirituality.

The Greek church, the Roman and Protestant churches are not of any such congregation, they do not strive against the earthly elements of their natures. They war, they fight, they indulge carnalities. Note the history of the Greek church in its beginning.

We have first-hand testimony here in the evidence of Bartholomew, who was one of the followers with Jesus' disciples:

"Then an aged priest arose and said: We were compelled to do what we did do, form ourselves into a body, as the crazy heretics had scattered their ideas among the heathens relative to females being held by anointed priests and confessors, and they were fools enough to hold themselves from confession until the priests were compelled to force them, by a decree, to come to their relief. And now we must have an idol they all do know did live, and if you want Jesus we will have him, but if you want John then we will have him. It matters not which, as John scattered heresy, even as much as the crazy fool of a Hebrew, the first born of Joseph and Mary. Now choose which shall be held before the faithful followers of Moses. He was a priest and he begat an hundred and forty-four children, and he was never bound to any. His concubines were ever ready at his will and pleasure, and as we bow to him as a director, let us share the pleasure of his life, even as he did, and if we can hold control over the heathen people let us give them an idol, one they all know did live, that we can be comforted even as Moses was comforted. Then the council remained in session four days, ere they could decide what was best to do for an idol. As they knew Jesus had become more notorious than John, among the heathen, by his many acts, which could not be denied, they came to the conclusion that it was better to take the humble child of Joseph and Mary as their idol, under the name of Christ, which is, when truly translated from the heathen dialect, a controller of hell. Now, here I am to defend my brother, lest he should be accused of being the instigator of such a heathen plot as being held between Almighty God and his children, as mediator. Does God ask man to assist him in his wondrous formations, and in holding his myriads of worlds in harmony, one with the other? Then how is it that the heathen bigots still chain and hold control of the human mind, and cause ideality to bow to priestcraft, hypocrisy, deceit and hell? Hell is ignorance, and ignorance lays the foundation for the ambitious to chain and bind the lesser mind, and these are the souls that are chained and bound by the crafty priesthood. And what are your isms to-day but the devices of crafty man, in order he may live in ease and splendor, while the humble laborer can toil on from day to day, to feed and clothe him that holds himself before the people as the one that is making intercession with the holy Jesus, and he interceding with the Creator, to hold his own created from temptation and the devil? Holy God, if thou hast created such a being to tempt the highest and holiest of thy creations, thy own children to go astray, are thy children accountable for aught that may befall them? Lay not to the charge of Almighty God, the foul stigma of tempting his feeble children in their earthy condition. Give them light that they may behold their father, God, and his mighty changes, in order to bring the human mind in rapport with himself as he is, then they will not ask for an idol to intercede for them in any form whatever—pope, priest, confessor, layman or clergy—but they will be willing to say, here I am, my Father and my God. Lead me through the knowledge I may be able to draw from thee, thou God of immensity, by conditions that are before me, and all of thy created, that have light given from the first great cause, eternal light. Here I am that humanity may know how they have been held by the designing priesthood, that they may be looked upon as holy things, and cause the ignorant to feel their necessities must be satisfied, even before their own. Now these facts I have laid down happened two hundred and sixty-four years after Jesus had ceased to be earthy. And now the Catholics had begun to lose ground again, and they knew unless some new control could be brought to bear upon the minds of the masses, the influence would be lost in Judeaism, heresy and light. Therefore they held a council again at Antioch, and they concluded to have a female idol, to set beside their male idol, in order that the females would be attracted to them by looking upon the mother of their holy idol. They looked upon the female idol as the mother of their God—all the God they dared ask for. That had the desired effect. They gathered in holy admiration to their idols—and they have held them even to this day—and they will hold them until light from the eternal God dispels their darkness."

This is how they came to be first called Christians at Antioch—and this was in the year 298 A. D., or 264 years after the crucifixion.

Bartholomew, in what we call his spirit body—unseeable by such beasts as these; was there watching their proceedings.

This was the beginning of the church of Anti Christ—instituted by heathen confessors and priests. The "mass" and the entire ritualistic performance were their work, and were brought with them from India. (See Lamaism and Buddhism of Thibet.) Jesus never founded a church—nor ever approved of any of those priestly performances.

There is held to have been a Jewish Christian church at Jerusalem. Holding all things in common. They did not marry, abstained from war, possessed the power of rising above the earthly elements into the heavenly sphere. Those who realized this life were saved from darkness and death—(spiritual death)—with them rested the spirit of ethical life and progress. They were Spiritual Socialists. The Pagan-Christian churches not only were not a part of the Pentecostal church, but they were not even an integral part thereof—they were distinct bodies. They were not admitted into the Pentecostal church at all. The Pagan-Christian church held private property, married, held slaves, and practiced war. It was this court that ultimately "scattered the power of the holy people"—the power that saves from sin, assuming authority and standing where it ought on the holy place, it trod under foot holy things, counterfeited and feigned the power of Jesus, and so became Anti-Christ.

The Pagan-Christian church was composed of heterogeneous materials, such as foolish Galatians, carnal Corinthians, guilty of deeds not even named among the heathen. Permit me an illustration. That was a searching anecdote of the Middle Ages which says, "When St. Thomas went as a guest to the Pope, and the priests showed him their chests full of golden vessels and their treasure house of jewels, and said to him, 'Master Thomas, no longer need the church say, as was once said, in the days of the apostles, "Silver and gold have I none." "No," said the saint sadly, the church can say that no longer; neither can she say what immediately follows: "In the name of Jesus Christ, rise up and walk."

In the second century a great schism took place in the Pagan-Christian church. The then Bishop of Rome excommunicated all the Bishops of the East, because those of the East would not eat lamb (the feast) when he ate it. Those of the East excommunicated those of the West, the Bishop of Rome, in return, thereby nullifying the whole Pagan-Christian church. ("Christ is not divided!") Both parties remained obstinate in quarreling over the slaughtered peaceful lamb, and are not reconciled to this day. Hence there are two Popes in Christendom at this hour, the Patriarch of the Greek Church, and the Papa or Pope of Rome. And since it is of the nature of parts to possess the properties of the whole, if the Pagan-Christian church possessed infallibility when it fell into two parts, that property must have been split into two also. And when the Roman church fell into two under Luther and Calvin, they must in the very nature of things have retained their share of infallibility and of "power to minister in holy things." These men were accounted good Catholics. All the difficulty was in their being a little too zealous. They wanted the old woman of the Vatican to walk a little straighter and not to cover with indulgences, etc., etc., so many dirty things with such a width of crinoline—that was all.

The ritualistic churches of to-day are the lineal descendants of the said Pagan-Christian churches. The Protestants are fragments of the Roman church, and are related as parts are to a whole. As water can find its way among the fragments of a rock which it cannot penetrate—so there is more light, progress, personal and civil and spiritual freedom, and security of life in Protestant than in Catholic countries. (Look at Cuba and the United States.) The solution of that rock has been begun. The mind must be disenthralled, so that that power which creates all things anew may, without let or hindrance, bring forth the new heavens and the new earth—in which shall dwell righteousness—and that fullness of life which flows down from above.

Come, then, my brothers and sisters, and look forward to a better day,

"When man by love and mercy taught
Shall rue the wreck his fury wrought
And lay the sword away."

Come, then, good men and women of all sects and all parties; of all colors and of every clime, of all religions and of no theology, come and raise a voice, and lift a hand to bring about on earth the reign of love, justice, equality and universal peace.

Undo the heavy burdens, let the oppressed go free, bind up the broken-hearted, give deliverance to the captives; and to all an equal chance to an equal share of all God's blessings, spiritual and temporal. As dear old Whittier said:—

"Through the harsh noises of our day—
A low sweet prelude finds its way.
Through clouds of dust and creeds of fear
A light is breaking calm and clear.
Henceforth my heart shall sigh no more
For olden time and holier shore,
God's love and blessing then and there
Are now and here, and everywhere."

THE SUBJECT OF PRAYER.

It Is Handled with Reference to Its Strict Meaning.

Could every person give his own meaning to a word, there would be such a confusion of ideas that no one could understand another; therefore, dictionaries, which are recognized as authority, must and do define the meaning of words. When I wish to know the meaning of the word prayer, I consult Noah Webster or some other generally admitted authority.

Prayer has always been associated with some form of worship given to God and if some one is said to be a praying man, it is generally understood that he prays to God for some favor, blessing, or the gratification of a desire. Aspiration is not synonymous with prayer, let those who will so claim; for aspiration can and does exist without any thought or belief in it. To aspire for better conditions in life or to rise in the social and intellectual scale, is one thing; to pray to God to give such conditions or to lift one up, is another. The man who never had aspirations was never born, but thousands have been who never prayed or believed in prayer.

When people talk about praying, if they use the word in its proper meaning, they convey the idea that by supplication, request, and beseechment, some thing or favor is expected from God. There is, says Voltaire, no system of religion without prayer, and the moment one uses the word we take it for granted that there is a God attached to it. If one prays he must pray to something or there can be no prayer. It is simply absurd to talk about prayer in any other sense.

Says one writer, "We shall not pray to Deity, but we shall invoke the beatitudes." To "invoke," says the dictionary, is to call for or ask; to summon; to invite earnestly or solemnly. The question now rises, who keeps the beatitudes and gives them when asked for "earnestly or solemnly?" Are they kept in stock to be delivered like ready-made goods on demand; and if so, who shall be importuned for them if Deity is ignored? Before I begin praying for the beatitudes I desire full instructions, that my efforts be not attended by failure; and before we go further, let us see what beatitude is. The lexicon says it is felicity of the highest kind; consummate bliss. This, then, is what we are to ask for; but as all rational men know happiness or felicity is not a thing in and of itself; but a state of mind that results from sound and healthy physical organs, and harmonious relations with our associates and surroundings, what good will it do to ask for it unless these essential conditions produce it, and, if they do, what need to ask for it? No invocation addressed to something or nothing can insure beatitude in any human being; for if the conditions are lacking that make felicity, to ask for it in their absence would be like trying to feed on the wind. If a person is happy, invocations are needless; if unhappy they cannot give him what he desires; for conditions alone can do that. Therefore I deny that invocations and felicity have any connection or relation.

Music will place one for the time being in a state of mental harmony, for it is a powerful and positive influence, and nothing in this world equals or excels it; but invocations—a play upon words to use up time and produce solemnity are the poorest things ever introduced to invite consummate bliss, alias beatitude. If one desires to get in a passive state and to feel at peace with his own soul and the whole world, a certain kind of music will place him there; but to expect that condition of mind to result from hearing some one with closed optics work off an invocation, would be to invite disappointment.

Formalities and ceremonies have ever been a marked feature of all religions and invocations of whatever kind or character, therein find their basis; for no one, unless he claims to be religious, will use or believe in invocations. Small boys are amused by drumming on a tin pan, and it may be that certain adults are likewise pleased to hear the sound of self emitted words, that really produce no more effect than the detonation of the aforsaid pan; but I will here state confidentially, that I am not one of them.

Another writer says the best prayer is that which is expressed in work for humanity. If we stay with the dictionary we will never confound prayer with work, for the words do not in any sense mean the same thing. The man who prays wants something without work, and the man who works for a thing or object, does so because he knows he cannot attain it by prayer.

Prayer, we are again informed, is the sincere and earnest longing for aid and relief. Here we have more confusion of ideas, for every one has such longings at times; but those longings are one thing, and a prayer or request for their gratification is another. To pray is to ask for something; let us not lose sight of this fact and our remarks on that subject will be more rational. "Give us this day our daily bread," is a prayer pure and simple, for it is a request; a beseechment; but though it has been uttered a million times or more by human beings, it never did and never will have any more effect in furnishing a supply of bread than the cravings of hunger which produce a desire for bread. If we want bread we must work for it, and so with everything else we desire.

Prayer is a diversion and education, writes another. The former is admitted; the latter denied. It is no doubt a diversion to pray, and so it is to go fishing, for the mind is led into other channels of thought; but there are many channels of thought not worth following, and the prayer channel seems to be one of them. A man might pray for forty years and he would have no more education than he had on the start if it was not derived in some other manner. What a man can learn by praying is so little and of so small importance that prayer will never receive a boom from that direction. If a man practices praying he may improve as he does writing, in the construction of his language, but in no other sense can it be connected with education. To pray well and to use euphonious and grammatical language, may be an accomplishment, but it is one of such doubtful value that few will care to take it up for that purpose. If prayer is entertainment, as the same person says, it will never become so generally attractive as to stand any show in competition with music and the drama; for it is so closely connected with trouble and misery that only those thus afflicted will hanker after that kind of entertainment. The healthy and happy portion of humanity are not overpoweringly attracted to prayers or those who pray. Most people prefer joy to sorrow, and sorrow we all know, of some kind, is the basis of prayer. Happy people feel thankful, but the unhappy are the ones who pray, and they pray because of that unhappiness.

Another thinks prayer a source of help and strength; but it is a source looked to as a last resort. "When everything else fails, let us pray, is the motto of those who thus believe, and prayer is their last and final hope. It is extremely difficult to see where there is any strength in prayer, for it is an attempt to lean on powers and forces that can neither be found nor defined.

The cultivation of self-reliance is one of the most desirable things any person can undertake, for the more the will power is exercised and developed, the less will be felt that weakness which leads to prayer or makes it seem a necessity. "I will," is a thought that carries more power than all the prayers ever uttered, and that person who makes an habitual use of it, will seldom be found invoking aid from gods or spirits; visible or invisible forces. Prayer, then, is a weakness, and invariably shows lack of self-reliance; for when one stops to pray he stops working and depending on self. The man who stops to pray in a shipwreck is the one who generally gets drowned, for if salvation is possible it comes through human endeavor. There is no power outside of man himself that can protect or save him from evil, and to pray to any exterior power is evidence of a misguided intellect and a wrong conception of natural forces.

Prayer is a delusion and a snare, for it results in weakness of the will and leads to a false dependence that ever fails in time of need. Let us rise on the wings of hope and cherish every desire and aspiration worth having; but if we ever expect to attain them, it must be through trial and effort and not through prayers and invocations. Work is the price that must be paid for success; and whether our goal is in material possessions or intellectual attainments; whether we seek for knowledge or happiness, self reliance and not prayer, will be found to be our only and reliable dependence.

Prayer has never done anything for the human race except to insure and prolong weakness of mind and will. It is a relic of hoary-headed superstition, which, despite the light of science still casts its baleful shadow over the earth. When that goes its offspring will likewise depart. Speed the day.

VISIONS AND REVELATIONS

Moses Hull Has Another Visitant From the Other Side of Life.

Moses Hull, the veteran worker, has had another Vision, which will be spread before our readers at no distant day. It is one that will be read with deep interest, and which conveys an important lesson. Every Spiritualist in the United States should read it; every Spiritualist, however, will not read it, for there are millions who take no Spiritualist paper, hence are in darkness in reference to what is going on in our ranks. Such being the case, each of our subscribers can find an ample field in which to do some missionary work—calling the attention of the Spiritualists who take no Spiritualist paper, to The Progressive Thinker. Send in one additional subscriber, at least, and thus aid in the great reformatory work now going on. The Progressive Thinker will continue to lead in all things that pertain to our movement.

Universal Peace Propaganda.

In traveling over the state of Minnesota I have met many friends whose earnestness and zeal for the cause of truth, and whose kindness and appreciation toward my work, I shall long remember with feelings of heartfelt gratitude. None perhaps are more earnest or untiring in their efforts than I. O. Brown, the secretary of the Wheaton Spiritual Society, and his estimable wife, who is the president. These worthy workers in connection with other members of that society have succeeded in providing a comfortable temple, which is something seldom met with in the western states. Many towns have to be missed by workers on account of the great expense of opera houses or convenient places for meetings, and it is high time a general move were made toward getting control of some hall or building in every town, for the progressive people of such towns, whether they be full-fledged Spiritualists or simply liberal-minded people.

In Montevideo, for instance, where I am now stopping for a few days, nothing can be done without paying five dollars for the privilege of giving forth to the world a few progressive ideas. This may be all right for one lecture but to thoroughly arouse an interest in a town like this a number of lectures should be given. So far as I can learn no lecture on the Spiritual philosophy has ever been given here, but an effort will be made to break the ice (which, by the way, is very thick in more ways than one).

Next Sunday, the 22d, we will hold a meeting in the opera house and try to sow some good seed along the lines of universal peace, brotherhood, and progressive thought.

While I am giving lectures on a number of subjects pertaining to our grand movement, yet I make a special effort along the lines of The Universal Peace Propaganda which I consider the most important at the present time. War is hell, and if we could banish war, many other things would right themselves. It is the worst phase of the competitive system, which is bad enough in all its phases. I have written a large number of letters to persons that I supposed were prominent in the work of benefiting the world by educating their neighbors in peace principles and progressive thought; these letters have generally been accompanied with a leaflet setting forth the object of my lectures. Many have kindly written in reply, some have arranged for lectures and have assisted very materially in circulating the leaflets, others, many of them are still owing me a letter. I would like to hear from all Spiritualists in this and adjoining states who have an interest in extending peace principles and progressive thought generally. My last work was in Wheaton, where I gave seven lectures during my stay of about two weeks. Letters addressed to me at Montevideo, Minn., will be forwarded, but should be sent here soon.

WILLIAM E. BONNEY.

A TERRIBLE INDICTMENT.

Extract from Senate Document 190.

IT SHOWS THE PERNICIOUS INFLUENCE OF THE CATHOLICS IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Don Jose C. Mijares, a resident of Bacolod, capital of the island of Negros, an agriculturist and owner of city and suburban properties, informs as follows:

1. I have lived, and continue living, in the Philippines sixty-three years.

2. In Laguna, Tayabas, Iloilo, and Negros.

3. Since the year 1853, when for the first time I left Tuyapa (Manila) to reside successively in the other provinces above named, up to 1895. The cases and things of the friar curates I have seen would cause the very stones to blush, were they to have the power of blushing, for which reason I beg the commission to pardon me from giving categorical answer by relating facts which, because of their nastiness and repugnancy, the pen refuses to describe. I am glad, however, to be able to recall having known in Tayabas a Franciscan parish priest who—rare exception—was a model friar, of exemplary conduct and austere life, whose hand was kissed with respect by all, from the governor down to the humblest Spanish employe. Unfortunately for my country, I have never again known another possessing the qualities of that blessed friar.

4. So numerous are the friars I have known that I have lost the count.

5. I have never trod the territory of Spain, but through several Spaniards I have learned that the friars of the several corporations that have come to the Philippines in greater part have come from the peasant, shepherd, and rustic class of Spain.

6. From my early youth I have known that in the jurisdiction of Cavite, Laguna, and other provinces of Luzon, the friars possess vast landholdings, the rents of which, called canon, produced great sums of money, and they also secured a good income from the many parcels of improved real estate they had in Manila and its additions.

7. The friar curates, usurping the attributes of the local authorities, not only intervened but exercised joint action with the said authorities in the three branches, administrative, judicial and economical. The gobernadorcillo or justice of the peace who should have dared to disobey the curate friar was certain to land in jail within a few days if he were not deported, to which end the reverend friars always had on hand, like a panacea against them, the accusation of being a filibusterer and anti-Spanish.

8. The heads of the Spanish government, to the detriment of their dignity, became servile tools, because they knew that the friars, with the powerful lever of their money treasured up in the convents of Manila, were above the law; therefore more powerful than the very Governor-General of the Islands.

9. In some parish houses I have seen printed schedules published by Archbishop Sancho de Santa Justa y Rufina. I also had occasion to observe that several curates have charged parish fees at will and without fixed standard, exceeding what was designated in said schedule. I do not know whether this may have been the cause in some cases for reluctance to contract ecclesiastical matrimony, although in my judgment what mostly influenced this reluctance is that some reverend friars had arrogated to themselves rights which in feudal times were called rights of "pernada." (The right asserted by certain feudal lords to enter the marriage bed before the husband.) Far from my mind is the idea of injuring or slandering, for I can cite specific and concrete facts, with the names and descriptions of the parties interested, should I be compelled thereto.

10. Speaking generally, and with rare exceptions, their morality was detestable, as I have said above.

11. The causes I have set forth above, and many others, have produced in the masses of the Filipino people an intense hatred for the four religious communities, the Augustinians, Recolettos, Dominicans, and Franciscans.

12. In this respect I repeat my foregoing answer.

13. For many years past the friars have taken possession of nearly all the curacies in the Philippines formerly occupied by native priests, the latter being relegated to the position of coadjutors, and carrying on their shoulders all the weight of the ecclesiastical labors and occupation, for the meagre remuneration of fifteen pesos per month, which was the most they earned. In the meanwhile their immediate chief, the friar curate, filled in his idle moments with corporeal enjoyments and pleasures, and at times saying to the patient subordinate, "Do as I say and not as I do."

14. I remember as a young man having seen in the reception room of the old college or seminary of San Jose, Magellanes St., in the walled city of Manila, large oil portraits of Filipino prelates, whose names, which I cannot now recall, appeared in the lower part of the said paintings. In those days I personally knew several canons of the cathedral chapter of Manila, some of them showing the tassel of a doctor, and I ought to add that they were all sons of the Philippines. From the foregoing, the capacity of the Filipino priests who occupy the highest ecclesiastical posts in the Philippines is demonstrated.

15. The injury which would result to the country through the return of the friars to their parishes is incalculable, even should they become secularized, as the people would only see the external difference from the costume, although at bottom they would not cease to be what they have been, are, and always will be, friars.

16. Provided the American archbishop were a Catholic, he would, in my opinion, be more acceptable in case he did not allow himself to be carried away by the suggestions of the friars, who, unfortunately, still proudly promenade through the environs of Manila.

17. I think what is proposed in this question is an excellent idea.

18. This system, as I look at it, can establish a firm bond of union between the people and the ministers of the church.

19. On this point I can express no specific opinion.

JOSE C. MIJARES.

Bacolod, Nov. 15, 1900.

MAN IMMORTAL.

His Entity Never Had a Beginning.

Man is an individualized spiritual entity. This entity never had a beginning. It was never created; but eternally existed as a possibility in the infinite realm of spirit and matter. Hence it is correlated with all the divine forces in nature. In his physical is embodied whatever lies in the realm of matter; and in his spiritual nature are all the elements and qualities that inhere in the realm of spirit. Hence he is of necessity immortal. Being an integral part of infinite life, he is deathless organically and constructively. If the life of an individual can be annihilated, then all life may be destroyed, which is illogical and unthinkable. Chaos is not the ultimate destiny of any sentient being; but an eternal and everlasting unfoldment of the divine possibilities that in here in his nature.

The potential forces involved in the soul cannot be estimated. No pen can portray or imagination conceive their infinitude. Eternity is too short to evolve all that the soul contains; its resources are exhaustless. New scenes will present themselves for his investigation, higher ideals will touch his inner consciousness and demand an interpretation. The infinite realm of spirit will open up to his enraptured vision problems of absorbing interest and invite study. The universe will be an open book, whose pages he can scan with a deep and lively interest, and ever revealing to him its spiritual treasures. She will give freely of her munificence to those who seek her exhaustless storehouse of wealth.

The aspirations of the soul will exact this knowledge from Mother Nature, and freely she will impart to all who will earnestly seek it. She withholds nothing the tendency of which is adapted to arouse our dormant energies and quicken our active powers. Every department in nature is ready to contribute her quota of information and instruction to the soul seeking for knowledge in her limitless domain.

In the womb of time everything is provided for man's unfoldment and advancement; every aspiration will be supplied, every longing gratified and every hope realized.

What a glorious heritage for the soul, who can fathom its ultimate possibilities, rising higher and still higher, onward and upward through endless time, approaching nearer and still nearer to the infinite all, and never exhausting the storehouse wrapped up in the bosom of infinity.

Will this concept ever be realized, or will it be relegated to the realm of utopia? If it be a fact in nature, then its realization is assured. Under the law of evolution, the human mind can, in a limited degree, grasp this result; eternal progress is in harmony with life's unfoldment, which is a fundamental principle in the very nature of things.

Man's ego is not an idle dream. It is not the shadow of inanity, or the playground of a diseased mentality; but it is a stupendous fact in nature, a primordial and deathless entity, possessing infinite possibilities for growth and unfoldment. The soul is an uncreated spiritual element, an ever active essence of the life principle, seeking an opportunity for its expression. Soul is thinking stuff. This stuff has never been seen by mortal vision; it eludes the keenest analysis.

The thought thing, whatever it may be, has its home in consciousness, and cannot be defined or comprehended. We may perceive its manifestations, but the thing itself is forever hidden in the realm of mystery. The operating forces in nature are spiritual. The life principle of oxygen and hydorgen is spiritual, so of all forces in the domain of nature. All the manifestations in the universe point to the realm of causation as the home of their birth. Nature holds in her loving arms all that ever was, is, or ever will be, so that nothing can be lost, and everything will subserve the end for which it was designed. The power of accomplishment inheres in the thing, as the majestic oak inheres in the acorn.

May it ever be our highest aim to put ourselves in harmonious relation with natural tendencies, and thus reap the rich fruitage of the psychic forces inherent in our birthright; and in no other way can we secure this result. It is the divine method and admits of no infringement.

THE GREATEST DEBATE WITHIN A HALF-CENTURY UPON MODERN SPIRITUALISM

DISPUTANTS:

REV. MOSES HULL,

President New York State Spiritualists' Association, Headquarters, Buffalo, N. Y.

—AND—

W. F. JAMIESON,

Secretary National Liberal League, Headquarters, Cincinnati, Ohio.

SECOND PROPOSITION.

Resolved, That the phenomena and philosophy of Modern Spiritualism can be explained without admitting the agency of departed human spirits.

W. F. JAMIESON, Affirms.
MOSES HULL, Denies.

Moderators Lee and Judge Koons Presiding.

MR. JAMIESON'S FIFTH SPEECH.

(Ninth Address of the Debate.)

Mr. Chairman, Ladies and Gentlemen, and My Esteemed Opponent:—A debate of this character should be not less than twelve sessions. A few only of the main features have yet been touched.

Our friends on the opposite side often say, "If it is not spirits, what is it?"

It is more pertinent for me to inquire, "If it is not humans, what is it?"

Spiritualists are compelled to admit that most of the phenomena and nearly all the philosophy have no other source than human. This admission on their part leaves very little for me to explain. I frankly admit that if, in our day, a departed human spirit ever communicated to anybody, the question is theirs.

My Spiritualist friends assert that there is an intelligence connected with the modern manifestations which always claims to be a departed human spirit. If it is not spirit that once lived in a human body, explain what it is.

Take the human element out of the problem altogether; do away with the human body, brain, mind, and there will remain no intelligence whatever.

First. Nearly all so-called physical manifestations are the result of trickery on the part of so-called mediums, as admitted by Spiritualistic writers.

Second. Even many so-called "spirit" manifestations are admitted by them to be the work of mind in the body.

Third. We maintain that almost every case of spirit influence, so-termed, is the effect of mind in the body.

Fourth. The very small residue is claimed by Spiritualists to be the work of spirits out of the body.

This leaves Spiritualism a very narrow margin.

William Emmette Coleman, a voluminous writer upon Spiritualism, says: "Many kinds of spiritual phenomena have been produced by the spirits of embodied persons, not by the direct action of disembodied spirits."

An English Spiritualist paper, Light, says:

"Spiritualists generally admit in explanation of the phenomena called spiritual, the possibility of the following agencies:

"1. The disembodied human spirit.

"2. The embodied human spirit.

"3. 'Spirit' other than that which is, or has been, embodied in human form."

C. W. Stewart, an able Spiritualist lecturer, combated the notion that mediums are "controlled by disembodied spirits only. We propose to show that they are oftener controlled by spirits in the form."

A vast army who have investigated Spiritualism, and remained unconvinced, share the conviction of Don Piatt, of Washington, who said, as related in "Startling Facts," page 273, "I must yet have other and better proof to convince me that the intelligence is from the spirits of the departed. The more I strive to convict my understanding, the more unsatisfactory it becomes."

This is my experience precisely. All the intelligence we know is earthly intelligence in earthly bodies.

Spiritualists repudiate all claims and arguments in favor of a personal God communicating to mankind through man. They say that is superstition, yet they claim a spirit person can freely converse through mediums.

Prof. J. S. Loveland, one of the most scholarly Spiritualists that ever lived, admits candidly that it is "impossible to know whether the utterances" of the mediums are from "spirits," or are "the creations of the medium's own mind," or even "the active energies of nature." All this has reference to honest-minded mediums, sincere, truth-loving Spiritualists; not to tricksters, or impostors. Truly, as Prof. Loveland contends, and as I have been saying for twenty years, "We do not yet comprehend the possibilities of our own unaided selfhood." Quite naturally our friend Loveland concludes that the "dreams of the subconscious self" are mistaken for "real spirit entities."

Prof. Dawbarn, another Spiritualist, considered one of the most philosophical writers of the age, confesses "that no spirit has really communicated."

A writer on "Logic" has said that "An admission from one whose opinions are not in our favor is the highest kind of evidence."

Therefore, all that has been credited to spirits come from the human mind in the human body; none of the intelligence is outside of the human brain and body. This is my theory, and is supported by a multitude of facts and not one against it, as far as I can discover.

The Progressive Thinker quotes an eminent scientist in favor of Spiritualism, "Dr. Elliott Coues, the famous ornithologist, and member of the National Academy of Science, declared himself to be a born ghost-seeker. He brought to the investigation of phantoms the same methods of passionless analysis applicable to any other matter.

Now, what does this "born ghost-seer" see?

He says, "The spiritual body may be of more rarefied and tenuous substance. I have no notion of the nature of the substance that makes a ghost, but I suppose that when a man dies it separates itself from the grosser particles that compose his physical organism."

That is made up of "may be" and "suppose." That is not science. It is not even scientific theory. It is merely the guessing of a scientific man; but he is the Spiritualist's witness. Now what did he see? He says:

"There is no essential difference between the spectre of a living human being and the apparition of a dead person."

If living human beings have "spectres," very much like the apparitions of dead persons, who can distinguish the difference? May they not all be from earthly bodies? But I will reserve further remark concerning Dr. Coues; and, to illustrate a whole class, will now give you an account of a wonderful medium who lived in Liberal, Missouri, Dr. J. B. Bouton. In 1885 he began to hold circles with a few of his neighbors, some of whom were Spiritualists. A little pine table tipped in answer to questions, three tips meaning "yes;" two, "I don't know;" one, "no." Names and messages were spelled out by going over the alphabet.

Says Dr. Bouton, "I would often ask them if they really believed it to be the work of spirits. The answer would be 'Yes, it must be spirits. If it is not spirits, what is it? There is intelligence, and it cannot be accounted for in any other way." Half the number of investigators at those circles were Materialists when the investigations began and became firm believers in Spiritualism through the mediumship of Dr. Bouton.

An old Indian came from the "Happy Hunting Ground," calling for whiskey and tobacco. Dr. Bouton said he knew an old Snake Indian in Montana who was drunk when he was killed.

Some one of the party brought a flower from a garden, laid it on the table and told the Indian to get another and lay it beside the one on the slate. The light was turned down and the medium passed the slate under the table. Soon raps were heard. The light was turned up, but instead of a flower there was this writing from that bad Indian: "Go to hell with your posey! Me want whiskey." So characteristic! Now Spiritualists reason, "If it was not an Indian, what was it?"

This brought the exclamation from all present: "It is wonderful! If we just keep up our circles we will soon get materializations."

News of the wonderful manifestations spread through the town and surrounding country like wildfire.

The next evening a circle was formed of unbelievers at the hotel, except the landlord, who was a Spiritualist. Mr. Thayer, the landlord, said, "If there are any spirits present, please rap three times on the table."

Three soft, yet distinct, raps were heard. A former landlady was supposed to be the spirit that rapped. She promised to materialize. A small bed-room adjoining the parlor was used for the cabinet. Dr. Bouton was requested to enter the bed-room cabinet. He did not know what to do. He had never been a materializing medium. The light was turned down, as usual, to give a benighted world more light. The most wonderful sight was that landlady's spirit. Some could see her features plainly; one of the party saw that she wore the same dress she had before she died, and even the pleats of the dress. This seance created greater excitement than ever. The hired girls of the hotel were alarmed and could never be induced to go to that room unattended.

And yet greater manifestations were in store. Dr. Bouton's own house was selected for the seances. There were some so skeptical that they would not believe "though one rose from the dead." "Some doubted" that the spirits did the writing when Dr. Bouton held the slate under the table. The spirits seemed to be offended because of such unreasoning skepticism. Mrs. Weems deluged them with a flood of questions, but the spirit, Dr. Bouton says, refused to answer her, and she was inconsolable. Dr. Bouton was then implored to talk to them, so he began, "Well, friends, we are anxious to know what you desire in order to get the necessary conditions. Shall I lay the slate on the table?"

"No."

"Are there conditions under which you will write for us?"

"Yes."

Dr. Bouton said to the company, "I have an impression. Let us see if it is correct."

Said he, "I addressed the spirits as follows: If I place a slate and pencil in that closet and lock the door, will our spirit friends write on the slate?"

"Yes."

Mrs. Weems exclaimed, "My God! Will they do that?"

Dr. Bouton said, "We will try and find out. 'Prove the spirits.' "

A shelf was soon prepared, a slate placed on it and the door locked. The medium sat with his head against the locked door, not on the inside, as many mediums have to sit; but on the outside in plain view of that whole company until the light was extinguished. They sang, loud and lively, "Sweet By and By."

In about five minutes raps were heard, plainly heard by all in the room. In a moment there prevailed a deathlike silence. Writing on a slate under such strict conditions would eclipse anything in that line ever known in the history of the world. The door was unlocked, the slate was taken from the shelf, and, to the unutterable surprise of all present, there was a message covering nearly one side of the slate, addressed to one of the party who readily recognized the perfect handwriting of a dead relative. Such a time of rejoicing was never witnessed outside of a happy Methodist revival. It gave, that message did, a brief description of their beautiful home in the Summerland, a more glorious climate than California. Some of the company would have been willing to sell out and go at once. Three or four times messages were written on slates on that memorable night. The slates were carefully wrapped up, afterwards covered with glass and hung in parlors where friends could see them; but the unbelieving world outside doubted. They were invited to make a close examination of the closet, but found no possible chance for deception. Was there ever a materializing seance-room more critically investigated?

Next day Dr. Bouton's house was crowded from morning until night. Committees of Materialists came to examine the house for some trap, trick or machinery by which the writing was done, but could find no chance for fraud or deception. Have any mediums been more closely tested than this man? Greater works were being done at Liberal than ever occurred in Bethlehem, according to the Spiritualists. The excitement brought many Spiritualists to Liberal. Spiritualism had triumphed over every opposition. Believers and unbelievers came from all parts of the country. Spies were lying around Dr. Bouton's house whenever it was known that the seances were to be held, watching to catch some one going in or coming out.

All of the old Spiritualists who went to Dr. Bouton's circles said they had attended the seances of some of the best mediums in the world, and they had never seen anything as satisfactory as that obtained through Dr. Bouton's mediumship. There were nearly a score of as good mediums in Liberal as could be found anywhere, and their spirit controls said Dr. Bouton was as good a medium as the best, and that the manifestations at his home were really genuine spirit manifestations. The mediums would often become entranced, and their "spirit controls" said still greater manifestations were going to take place in Liberal.

When the door was opened at one time, before the writing was finished, one said, "I saw a spirit hand, the most beautiful I ever saw."

"Yes," said another, "I saw it!"

Still another said, "Oh, it was grand!" "In the mouth of two or three witnesses."

On another occasion a sealed letter was laid on the slate and placed in the closet for the spirits to read and answer. The reply was written on the slate in good style and the slate returned to its place but the letter was invisible. When the slate was taken out for examination, several exclaimed, "Why! where is the letter?"

At first this was as great a mystery to Dr. Bouton as to any of them. He said he "guessed the spirit must have take nthe letter."

"Of course," said one, "I have known spirits to do the same thing often."

"Yes," said another, "I have, too; and sometimes they never bring them back."

"Perhaps," said the owner of the slate, "if you would place it on the shelf again, the spirit would bring back the letter."

This was a severe test, and looked like dictating "conditions" to the spirit world. The circle was formed again, "John Brown" was sung, and then raps were heard. The door was opened, the slate taken from the shelf, and, sure enough! there was the letter in perfect condition, unopened, exactly as when placed in the closet. All agreed that the spirits intended this unexpected proof of their presence as a test of their powers. "I tell you," said one, "We are going to get more wonderful things than that."

Spirit faces was another phase of Dr. Bouton's mediumship. Music was essential for this manifestation. A curtain about four feet high was placed at the door, and Dr. Bouton sat behind the curtain. Sometimes when there were many persons present, some sat near the door at one side. When the spirit faces came full into the door they would remark "What a thin face that spirit has!"

But well-posted Spiritualists were always ready with an explanation. They could account for the thinness of the spirits. They said, "In order for a spirit to materialize, it must have matter of which to form itself, and that it was not always possible to gather from surroundings sufficient material substance to form a fully-developed spirit."

This was the reason those poor spirits were so thin. Spiritualists are great on philosophizing, and it does not matter with them whether or not they have facts to fit their philosophy. They philosophize any way. Another thing was noticeable. Those thin spirits never talked. Would that not be purgatory? Women, don't you go! Heaven knows what will become of me when I become a spirit. But the thin spirits answered questions by bowing their thin heads.

"Is that father?" inquires one. If the spirit nodded his head, the inquirer would say, "Yes, that is father. I recognized you as soon as you came to the door. I am so glad you have come. Can't you come again sometime and materialize more fully?"

Another nod from the spirit.

"Thank you; do come again."

The spirit would bow its way back into the darkness whence it came. The witnesses would say, "How can any one doubt Spiritualism after seeing the like of that?"

"Oh, well!" another would say, "such folks haven't good sense."

Some of the scoffing kind dared to insinuate that Dr. Bouton was a trickster, but the mediums when asked, "Are all the wonderful manifestations produced through Bouton the work of spirits?"

The spirits through the other mediums would invariably answer, "They are; there is no better medium."

A more highly endorsed medium probably never lived than Dr. Bouton, endorsed by old Spiritualists, good judges of phenomena; endorsed by the "spirits" through other mediums. What I have related of him is true of scores of test and materializing mediums—endorsed by Spiritualists and "spirits" as long as they practice mediumship; condemned as frauds, counterfeits, when detected, or self-confessed. Even then many believers insist that they are genuine mediums.

This is not a question of the sincerity of mediums. It does not follow that because a medium believes he is inspired that his sincerity proves he is. Do messages really come from a spirit world? That is the point. You claim you have phenomena to prove it. What are the phenomena of Spiritualism?

First. Rappings.

Second. Table movings, or the movements of ponderable bodies in general.

Third. Trance and inspirational speaking.

Fourth. Clairvoyance, or clear seeing.

Fifth. Slate-writing.

Sixth. Sealed letters answered by the spirits of departed human beings.

Seventh. Materializing mediums of all grades, classes and conditions.

Eighth. Magnetic, and other kinds of healing, including "laying on of hands."

All these classes include many subdivisions, such as cabinet manifestations, paraffine molds, planchette, dark circles, bell-ringing, automatic writing, etc. In this cumbersome, indirect, roundabout way, it is confidently believed by Spiritualists that the inhabitants of the spirit world, who once lived in human bodies, communicate with the people of this world.

In what does Spiritualism fail? In this: It appears to be impossible for men and women after death to communicate directly, face to face, with the people here, as was their former habit; but interpose a medium, and it is easy. The theory of mediumship is the open door which admits the long procession of trickery. Why should a human being, a medium, be needed? Why should not the intelligent beings of another world converse as easily and directly to the people of this world as we talk and dispute with each other, if Spiritualism were true?

The Progressive Thinker one year and the eight Divine Plan books, $3.50.

In order to assist in forming a Spiritual and Occult Library in every Spiritualist's home, these eight valuable books, substantially and elegantly bound in cloth, are furnished to our subscribers for $2.50. We are able to do this, from the fact that the authors make no charge for the vast amount of labor bestowed on these works, and which extended over many years. That is why you are getting these intensely interesting books for the price you do. We are only carrying out the Divine Plan, inaugurated only by The Progressive Thinker. There are thousands of our subscribers who have no Spiritualist or Occult library, and this inducement is offered in order that they may commence forming one at once, and thus keep in line with the advancing procession. The postage on the above books and expense of mailing is about 95 cents, hence you are receiving them at an exceedingly low price—simply the result of modern enterprise combined with a desire to do good.

"After Her Death. The Story of a Summer." By Lilian Whiting. No mind that loves spiritual thought can fail to be fed and delighted with this book. Beautiful spiritual thought, combining advanced ideas on the finer and ethereal phases of Spiritualism, leading the mind onward into the purer atmosphere of exalted spiritual truth. A book for the higher life. For sale at this office. Price, cloth $1.

"Right Living." By Susan H. Wixon. The author shows a wise practicality in her method of teaching the principle of ethics. She illustrates her subject with many brief narratives and anecdotes, which render the book more interesting and more easily comprehended. It is especially adapted for use in Children's Lyceum. In the hands of mothers and teachers it may be made very useful. Young and old will be benefited by it. Cloth $1 For sale at this office.

"Poems of Progress." By Lizzie Doten. In this volume, this peerless poet of Spiritualism may be read in her varied moods, "from grave to gay, from lively to severe." It is a book to be treasured and richly enjoyed by all who love genuine poetry, and especially Spiritualists. The volume is tastefully printed and bound. Price $1.

"The World Beautiful." By Lilian Whiting. Most excellent in their high and elevating spirituality of thought. Series 1, 2, and 3, each complete in itself, Price, cloth, $1 per volume. For sale at this office.

"The Bridge Between Two Worlds." By Abby A. Judson. This book is dedicated to all earnest souls who desire, by harmonizing their physical and their psychical bodies with universal nature, and their souls with the higher intelligences, to come into closer connection with the purer realms of the spirit world. It is written in the sweet spiritual tone that characterizes all of Miss Judson's literary works. Price, cloth, $1; paper, 75 cents. For sale at this office.

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

LIGHT, LONDON, ENGLAND.

UPLIFTMENT OF DARK SPIRITS.

In a short paper contributed to Light in December last I spoke of a circle formed for the express purpose of affording help to excarnate men and women who came for the assistance that can be so easily given by mortals who sympathize with God's children in darkness.

Many and varied have been our experiences, and looking through the notes I have taken of what has occurred, one is fully persuaded that our labor has not been in vain, and our strength spent for naught.

The commencement of our sittings for the winter, on Wednesday, October 30, was signalled by a very remarkable incident, a sequel to what took place at my own "service" on the preceding Sunday afternoon, when I found myself dragging some poor creatures out of a cesspool—a noisome experience I have no wish to dilate upon. I classed it as just one more of my strange and varied visions, and dismissed it from my mind as readily as I have done many before. Mark the sequel.

I attended the circle on the following Wednesday in the full expectation that the reassembling of the members after an interval of some twelve or thirteen weeks would be the occasion of some sort of retrospective and prospective references to our work from those who, in the unseen, guide our proceedings. But a very different condition of things was apparent to us all. A darkness that might be felt was over us, exercising a most disturbing influence and delaying the opening of the circle. It was of no use struggling against it; there it was, and we could only begin and await developments. Soon the table moved; a name was spelled out, and the cause of all this weight and oppression was clear. I need not give that name. It will suggest itself to all who remember the terrible society scandal of a few years back, and the untimely end, in a foreign land, of the brilliant man of letters who subordinated his high endowments to the baser passions of his nature. We resisted his efforts to entrance one of the sitters, and in response to a request that he would communicate through the table, a message commenced p-r— "Pray for me!" I exclaimed. "Yes, we will pray for you and with you." A touching scene followed. The poor fellow came to me, and, with my hands firmly grasped by two of my companions, we poured out our souls in prayer for help.

I think my experience in these matters justifies me in claiming the discrimination necessary to estimate correctly the state of mind that would be present with the awakened soul of the man who had so grievously sinned against the laws of God as this one, but it is beyond my powers to describe such a state. I can only say it was just what I might have expected it to be, and I have not the slightest doubt as to its genuine nature.

Although the form was distinctly seen and recognized by one of our sitters, who was fully competent to judge as to his identity, I am not greatly concerned in contending that our visitor was actually the man whose name he gave. Since I received, some years ago, a lot of senseless twaddle and idiotic drivel (comparatively speaking) signed "David Livingstone," from a medium who claimed to get automatic writing from that great and noble soul, I have felt it incumbent upon me to place little or no reliance upon names. But I have not a shadow of a doubt that our help was given to a man who sinned fully as deeply, and in the same way, as the one whose name may have been given as an indication of the terrible offenses committed. In the absence of positive proof of identity such a supposition is perfectly reasonable, nor would I consider the use of the name to be fraudulent, seeing what it was intended to convey to our minds. "What's in a name?" Much! Picture to yourself the associations connected with such names as Nero, Cæsar Borgia, and a host of others infamous in history, and reflect upon the impressions such names convey to the mind.

I would like to add a few words as to the effect of this upliftment work upon those engaged in it. After a full twelve-months' experience those associated with me can testify not only that no lowering of the mental or moral nature has been caused, but that, on the contrary, a great development of the finer forces has resulted. More of these circles are urgently needed, and I shall be heartily glad if those willing to help in their establishment will communicate with me. Mrs. William Paulet and the experienced contributor to Light, who thinly veils his identity under the signature "Medicus" (and others), can furnish testimony as to good recently achieved in a double sense—a man and woman placed in charge of those ministering spirits who are ever ready to seek and save the "lost;" a house— the scene of their crimes—relieved of the baleful influence cast upon its occupants by the presence of these earth-bound discarnate entities commonly called "spirits."

The work is unsuited to the craven soul, anxious only to guard itself against the obsession that fear or nervous dread contributes to bring. To the courageous, manly soul who is not afraid of a rough and tumble fight with any evil influences that may attach to those who come for help, and who is imbued with a sincere desire to assist his fallen brother or sister, such work is only productive of blessing.

"I speak that I do know. I testify that I have seen."

An eminent Church of England divine, in writing to me on the subject of our circle for upliftment, says: "Your purpose is noble—your ideal is high—your aspirations are Christ-like, If there is mistake the Lord will overrule it for good."

THE TWO WORLDS, MANCHESTER, ENGLAND.

ACCORDING TO THEIR VIBRATIONS.

"If we could see the objects around us as they actually are," said a scientific writer, "we should find them quivering, vibrating, like the hot air over a furnace. All the atoms of even the most solid objects, iron or granite, are in motion, everything having its own rate of vibration.

"Although this has long been known to science, it is only of late that advanced thinkers have begun to realize what these vibrations mean in the case of human beings.

"Quite lately an eminent French scientist has shown that in hypnotism the influence of the hypnotist over the subject is obtained by inducing the vibrations of the two persons to harmonize, like the strings of two musical instruments.

"It may be said, indeed, that similarity of vibration accounts for the liking of one person for another, so that the poetical idea of 'two hearts that beat as one' has a foundation of scientific truth. It is even said by some scientists that the states of health or disease in the human being are purely questions of vibration."

WITH DEADLY EFFECT.

"A malign passion may be the effect of a disease; if not, it will tend directly to produce that disease," remarks a physician.

"Avarice, long indulged, destroys the normal balance of the brain, and at length shrivels it up by concentrating nourishment on the part which is concerned with getting and holding.

"Outbursts of anger strike at the heart. Many a man has dropped dead in the heat of rage.

"Moroseness is very effectual in producing disease. It acts specially upon the liver and the digestive organs.

"The seat of the affections is in the brain. This suffers first; afterwards, in course of time, the organs which it controls."

DIVINATION FOR DOLLARS WILL CURSE SPIRITUALISM.

The letter of Mr. Tetlow raises the following questions: (1) Is the revelation of the past fact or fiction? (2) Is the revelation of to-day something new, separate and independent?; (3) or is it a part of a universal revelation that under varied names and conditions has existed in all lands and times? If the latter, what is the relation of Modern Spiritualism to the older revelation; does it seek to destroy, or to continue, explain and fulfill?

The Christian church was founded by spirit revelation, taught by inspiration, and guided by communion through the angels of the churches. Is that not identical with modern Spiritualism, i. e., a spirit guide selects a man; others are attracted to him; they form the church, and the communion confirms their faith? Is the one destructive of the other, or does it continue and fulfill?

Men became Christians then by reason of the exercise of the spiritual gifts (or senses). So men become Spiritualists to-day. They had the real presence in their communion. So have we. Christianity brought a knowledge of spirit life. So does Spiritualism. The former fell from its real estate when it gave up its spiritual communion and guidance for temporal gain and earthly power. So the latter is falling from its right position by devoting its spiritual gifts to fortune-telling and divination for dollars. Let us remember divination is not spirit communion.

If Christians and Spiritualists fall from their ideal church or communion, should we judge them by the object and purpose of their revelations, or by their present-day practice? Their object and purpose were to establish the communion of saints for the upliftment of sinners, and unfold the spiritual gifts of humanity that men might live in the sure and certain knowledge of immortal life.

This, I claim, is Christian Spiritualism, and I would that we had in every town a church of the spirit, where the saddened souls could find comfort and weary ones peace through that communion which gives the blessed assurance of real life to all. Instead the inquirer hears from one platform of the eternal revelation which declares that Jesus and all men live in spirit to-day, and from another that Jesus is a solar myth, and the apostolic communion with him a legend of priestly invention.

Which to-day shall we follow? Either we must declare for the eternal revelation, which has ever been the witness of THEN spirit life to the world, or that all revelation other than Modern Spiritualism is a fallacy or a fraud.

THE KING'S FUTURE.

A clairvoyant of repute was recently asked by a member of the nobility to diagnose His Majesty's real state, and to determine what the future holds in promise for him. A medium between the exalted subject and the clairvoyant was established by certain articles which had passed through His Majesty's hands. She was not told to whom the things belonged, and she had, she says, no suspicion of the identity of the personage until she discovered it during "diagnosis." The conclusion arrived at, which this clairvoyant states "with temerity and confidence," is that the King is not suffering from any fatal disease whatever, and that His Majesty will be crowned in 1902, and under the most auspicious circumstances. Beside this, it is predicted that His Majesty will live to an old age. Other clairvoyants say the same thing, and clairvoyants are not the most optimistic of mortals. The astrologers—and there are some very active ones even in these days— are more guarded in their oracular utterances. At present, they will tell you, the horoscope of the King is not altogether favorable. But the more beneficent of the planetary influences must shortly obtain the ascendency, with increased happiness for the King.

SPIRITUALIST SIDE SHOWS.

Sir:—The reason why there is such great difficulty in meeting the expenses of our spiritual meeting-rooms is because "ever since I went to a Spiritualist meeting the medium (that is the spirit control) has waged a war against ministers of all denominations being paid, instead of doing their work for nothing, like Jesus." The result of such teaching is that people will not give even an average of 1d. each. They are, as a medium said to me one day, two for 1½d. Members of other denominations can support their churches and ministers because they think that their souls are worth something to save. Spiritualists, however do not value their souls. If they do value them they put a small price on them. The spiritual world is itself to blame for preaching such a thoughtless doctrine. Our mediums have swept away everything belonging to the sect they have left, and collections must follow as a matter of course, and a great pleasure it is to the members to allow their mediums to preach for nothing like their elder brother Jesus. Yours, etc.

"The Life Booklets." By Ralph Waldo Trine. Three daintily beautiful little books, finely adapted for holiday presents. The titles are, "Character Building by Thought Power," "Every Living Creature," and "The Greatest Thing ever known." The matter is of high-toned spiritual character and of helpful purpose. OCCULT MYSTERIES MAGAZINE

... OF ...

OCCULT MYSTERIES.

AN UNSEEN FORCE.

It Is Connected With Hypnotic Experiments.

Hypnotism is the word doctors use to designate an induced sleep-like condition, more or less profound, by means of certain suggestions of words or acts on the part of the operator or hypnotist. In this word we would include all that is or formerly was comprehended by the terms "animal magnetism," "mesmerism," "trance," and, I might add, Spiritualism and Christian Science.

I presume hypnotism is as old as Adam; at least Eve succumbed to the suggestive influence and scintillating eyes of the serpent, as Adam did later to her. No man is so old but he remembers in his childhood how mother passed her gentle hand over the place of pain and, kissing away the tears, said: "There, dear, it doesn't hurt any more, the pain is all gone." And it was. Every day there are thousands of such domestic examples of hypnotism.

The methods of hypnotizing are many and simple, but all aim at overcoming the special senses which culminate in a effect called the mind. To hypnotize a person one should learn how to do it from some experienced person who is a skilled physician, for there are many persons who would be injured by the process, and in fact many persons have not only become insane, but have passed into an eternal sleep at the hands of mountebanks who go through the country lecturing and giving silly exhibitions in public. Fortunately most of the performers are only hired actors. Children from six to sixteen, and persons from forty-five to fifty-five years of age are the best subjects. In America only about twenty in one hundred can be so influenced; in Great Britain about sixty, and on the continent nearly 80 per cent. The ignorant, the superstitious, and those persons who are from birth trained to submissiveness to religious or other authority, are the most easily acted upon, and that is perhaps the cause of the difference in various countries.

The diseases for which hypnotism is of value in treatment are not numerous; they are almost all of the variety known as neuroses, or nervous diseases. Among them I may mention certain forms of insomnia, pains like neuralgia, and nervous irritability; occasionally dipsomania, but in no organic diseases have I ever observed the slightest benefit, nor have I read of success in such cases from any good authority. Insane persons cannot be brought under the influence of hypnotism ,because no one can be hypnotized who will not consent to it, except where one has been so frequently under hypnotic control as to become feeble-minded, in which case the operator may influence them in a great degree against the weakened will. I have known several persons who have given hypnotism as an excuse for their peculiar, embarrassing or disgraceful conduct—that they were hypnotized by "So and So," and could not resist the look or command to follow, or to act, as desired. Such cases are likely auto-hypnotics.

If I thought a certain case would be benefited by hypnotic treatment I would proceed by first asking the consent of the patient. Next, it is desirable that the room be perfectly quiet, for talking, the slamming of doors, bells, whistles, etc., frequently prevent the desired result—quiet, peaceful sleep. Then in a quiet, soothing manner, I would ask the patient to fix the eye upon some small, bright object held or suspended between the eye-brows an inch or two removed; or to look steadily at a small, bright coin in the palm of the hand. As soon as the attention is fixed, if the patient has become perfectly calm, I would pass the palms of the hands with gentle stroke and slow from the center of the forehead outward and down the temples, cheeks, shoulders and arms to the hands and finger tips, saying in slow monotone, "Sleep, sleep, sleep." This I would continue until a slight pallor spreads from about the lips over the cheeks, the eyelids drop, and the patient sleeps.

The patient thus hypnotized is ready for suggestive treatment. Suppose it be a case of nervous spasm of the lowest portion of the throat (which we have found is not from organic disease), not infrequent in hysterical persons. The question, "Are you hungry?" is asked, and answered, "Yes, but I cannot swallow."

"Open your mouth wide that I may see the obstruction."

"Yes, I see it (placing an instrument down to touch the part); now it is removed; here is oyster soup; now eat it; you are very hungry; eat this dry bread," etc., etc.

The patient may thus take a good meal with apparent relish, and in some cases may not require other treatment.

There are various stages of hypnotism, but for medical treatment it rarely occurs that other, than that of being responsive to suggestion is required. In a few cases I have seen surgical operations performed where a little alcohol had been sprinkled upon a handkerchief from a bottle labeled "chloroform" and held over the mouth and nose of the patient while the operator, feeling the pulse, says: "Give but a little more. Now insensibility to pain is reached. Stop!" producing a mild hypnosis sufficient to produce sleep, while considerable cutting and sewing were done without the patient's cognition. The fact is, that the number of susceptible patients is so small that its general use is impossible.

Hypnosis is a two-edged sword. In cases of hysteria, and persons with slight manifestations of the disease, many have come from under the influence only to go into hysterical convulsions; or, in others, we have been able to get rid of one delusion, only to have it replaced by another more serious in character. The oft-repeated hypnosis upon the most healthy subject tends to destroy self-reliance and to render the individual feeble-minded.

One curious thing about hypnotic influence is its contagiousness. Mesmer, who first introduced this treatment in Paris over one hundred years ago, finding his inability to treat each patient separately by making passes and holding his bright wand before them, hit upon the plan of hypnotizing them en masse. He lined a tub half way to the top with bright metals, broken glass, rock crystal, etc., which he filled with water; around this were gathered the lame, the halt and even the blind who came to be mesmerized, and as those who could see gazed upon the sunlit objects in the water, they were asleep in a few moments and were placed by the attendants around the spacious room on chairs, couches, or the floor; the blind and other persons coming later, entering this room, required but the passing of the hand or pointing of the finger of an attendant, and they likewise slept.

Though it was fifty-five years ago, I remember well the first seance I ever witnessed of mesmerism, the fame of which had then reached Indianapolis. A young man, a native of Noblesville, who had been a medical student at Cleveland, gave out that he would lecture on mesmerism at the log school house (the only one on the South Side), which stood on South street, between Virginia avenue and New Jersey street. The house was full, about fifty, the lecture short, and the experiments successful, for after the first three or four were asleep from looking at a silver five-cent piece, then called a "dip," about thirty others followed by merely having their eyelids gently closed by the young lecturer. I recall now that one of the subjects was rather a delicate boy, who could not be awakened for eighteen hours, and then was ill for several weeks. This boy never fully recovered, and later in life, died at the Central Hospital for the Insane. I do not think at this day that anyone could enter a room where a number of working men and women—say fifty—of average intelligence were assembled and be able to hypnotize half a dozen of them.

Many physicians regard hypnotism in practice a "humbug." It certainly is not. It should be used in the treatment of disease as we use chloroform for narcosis—know that the patient can take it, and have it administered by one well skilled in its effects.

In one of the stages of hypnotism there is produced an exhausted condition of the special senses known as clairvoyance, which is very injurious and never used in the treatment of disease, but rather as a psychical curiosity to attract the attention of gullible crowds. In reality, the public lecturer on hypnotism never intentionally permits one of his subjects to reach that stage, but employs some good actor to fill the role. As to the clairvoyant state, while it does, in some instances, put the subject into condition where mentality seems to reach a superhuman degree of penetration, that it is a purely psychical act, is shown by the subsequent exhaustion, and the waste of tissue that always follows, in some instances ending in death. That there can be in some persons a self-induced clairvoyant state (autohypnosis), there is no doubt, as exemplified by certain oriental sects who gaze with unflinching eyelids upon the sun for hours, or repeat the word "om" 12,000 times, or maintain the same attitude for hours with eyes fixed upon the ground or some objective point, as Socrates, Sir Isaac Newton, and hundreds of philosophers, both ancient and modern, do, or did. Meditation is what it is generally called. Some poets—for example, Dante, Petrarch, Milton, and others—might be mentioned. The prophecies of the Bible and revelations of the New Testament seem to have been induced by the same method.

The boast that some hypnotists or public mesmerists make that they can bring any or every person under their control is sheer nonsense. I have frequently offered such persons ten dollars for every maniacial or melancholic case they could bring under control, and while many of them made the attempt, not one case was successful. The clairvoyant of commerce, if I may use the term, is but a street fakir, a sharp actor.

There is a medico-legal aspect of hypnotism that has been carefully studied in France. I refer to the connection of crime and hypnotism. So far, the plea of having been hypnotized when the crime was committed has had little effect upon the judicial mind in Europe. I read some years ago that some petty judge in Indiana did permit some amateur hypnotist to "pinch" two juvenile offenders for the purpose of obtaining a confession to some petty offense. I do not remember the result, if any, or if the judge in reality accepted the word of the fakir.

Hypnotism has passed through the superstitious and "fad" stages, and is at this day being carefully studied by physicians as to its application as a remedial agent.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

THE OCCULT IN HUNTING.

The Supernatural in India.

It had been my fate to wander for many years in the jungles and waste places of Northern India where also the "fakir," or religious mendicant, resorts to avoid the temptations of the world, and perhaps to pass years in silent introspection. My life was spent in carrying out the duties of a forest officer, and in hunting big game; his in the mortification of the flesh with a view to rising to a higher plane of existence; and I confess to a feeling of sympathy and respect for one who, unarmed and alone, could complacently camp out in forests infested with wild beasts, trusting to his divinities for his life and to the rare passer-by for his subsistence. I had long known that some of these wanderers claimed the power of calling to a given spot any of the denizens of the jungle, but I had never put their powers to the test, for they invariably insisted on extorting a promise that the animal should not suffer for its obedience.

It was my good fortune in the month of April, some fifteen months ago, to meet with an individual who undoubtedly possessed a certain power over the wild animals in his vicinity, and who did not scruple to use it to his own profit. I had organized a small shooting party in Nepal in that year. We did not expect much sport in that land of swamp and forest; we anticipated a week's tour in a new country with a little shooting to enliven the marches; and crossing the border we encamped near a village about eight miles in Nepal. My orderlies visited the village and returned with the usual news that the villagers knew of no tigers in the vicinity; they added, however, that they had discovered an old man who made his living by selling charms to protect the cattle against any tiger they might chance to meet in their pasture grounds. The two statements did not agree, but I knew that the villagers would give no information as to the whereabouts of a tiger, because, in the first place, they believed that the tiger would learn their treachery and make matters extremely disagreeable in the future; whilst, secondly, they did not desire any strangers to camp near their village.

The charm vender readily appeared when sent for, and proved to be a wizened, emaciated, feeble old person who made no promise save that he would join the hunt on the morrow, and asked for nothing but a goat and a bottle of rum to sacrifice to his deities. Both these delicacies were supplied; I am unaware how he disposed of them, but next morning his bleary eyes and shaking hand were evidences of a night passed in vigils, either festive or prayerful. He first begged to be placed on the largest elephant, as he remarked that the tigers would specially resent his appearance as their enemy, and next drawing from his girdle a small copper bell he suspended it tinkling from finger to thumb, muttering at the same time some unintelligible sentences; then after apparently receiving whispered instructions he silently led the way through the forest, followed by the sportsmen, whose feelings varied between shamefacedness and contempt.

I must explain that at this season of the year the forest has already been devastated by jungle fires, and only here and there are patches of unburnt grass left either by accident or on account of the dampness of the locality. As a male tiger stands some three and a half feet high and weighs about six hundred pounds, I was both astonished and angry when the tiger charmer stopped at the edge of a small patch of grass which might have concealed a pig or deer, but certainly could not, in my opinion, afford suitable cover for a tiger. When I represented this to the old man he merely replied: "The tiger is there," and we, traversing the grass, passed out on the other side without discovering any living creature. We again appealed to our leader to cease his fooling and take us to a more suitable spot, but were met by the same stolid reply.

There was nothing to be done but to try again, and this time we discovered an immense tiger lying crouched between two elephants. He arose on being discovered, and walked slowly in front of the howdah to the edge of the patch of grass, there turning in a dazed way, he calmly regarded us, and fell at once with a bullet behind the shoulder. The extraordinary behavior of this tiger impressed me more as a sportsman than the proceedings of the old man; but we acknowledged that the incident was in every way uncanny. It was yet early in the day, and the bell again sounding, we were led in a bee line to another tiger, which suffered itself to be slaughtered in a similar manner. In five days we bagged six tigers, and only desisted because the old man explained that if we killed all the tigers his trade in charms would be ruined.

The effects of the cyclone in September, 1880, penetrated far into the Himalayas; for three days, at an elevation of twelve thousand feet, we, a few natives and myself, lived in peril of our lives amidst torrents of rain, sleet and snow, hearing the thunder of landslips and avalanches around us and deafened by the furious rush of water in the valley below. To light a fire was impossible; we waited wearily for annihilation, and subsisted on what tinned meat we still possessed at the conclusion of a hunting trip. On the fourth day the skies cleared, and we eagerly scanned the opposite hillside, to ascertain if the village was still standing. As the sun broke through the heavy banks of clouds we saw some forlorn individuals on their house roofs, apparently similarly engaged, and my companions at once opened a conversation with them, in spite of the distance, which could not be less than a mile and a half, and in spite also of the fact that the river which flowed between almost drowned our voices when in conversation with each other. There was no apparent effort on our side, and no reply was intelligible to my untrained ear. Yet we asked for assistance, and we received it when, a few days later, the water had subsided sufficiently to permit a chain of fifteen strong men to ford the river and rescue us from starvation.

When one lives amongst a people who are absolutely convinced of the existence of ghosts and the bodily presence of evil spirits; when one finds as a matter of daily routine offerings displayed for the one and dwelling-places erected for the other, one wishes to be in the confidence of one's neighbors, and to learn the reason for the faith that is in them. Up to the present time men and animals are "overlooked" in India, and it is unlucky to compliment your native friend on his personal appearance, on the beauty of his children, or on the superiority of his cattle; for it is an accepted fact that by doing so you may injure that which has excited your admiration. What we call coincidence, the native considers result; he is content to communicate disease or trouble to man or beast in the belief that it will leave his household, if, by exposing food or coin on the highway he can tempt the ignorant or unwary to accept it; he is a firm believer in a thousand unlucky acts, dates or marks, and he exhibits a childish dread of unusual sights or sounds after sunset.

We find, in old-fashioned houses still standing as evidence of the first attempts of white men to establish home comforts, belated ghosts appearing in proof of long-forgotten tragedies. Such an ancient building was occupied by C., a government official holding a high appointment, and moreover a student with a well-balanced mind. To him appeared one day as he sat at his writing-table a pair of twinkling feet that whirled round the room in a giddy dance. No sane person could resist a feeling of astonishment at such a sight; in C.'s case great interest was also aroused, and after careful scrutiny he came to the conclusion that the feet were those of a native dancing-girl. The next step was to convince himself that this was no hallucination, and he called for his native servant and watched the man's demeanor when he entered the room. Surprise was succeeded by horror on the man's face, and he flung up his arms, shrieking that he had seen the dancing-girl and must die. Which he did next day.

I have twice lived in haunted houses and twice pitched my camp on the site occupied by a spirit. My first haunted house was in a small hill station, and the haunt consisted in the perambulation of the stone flagged veranda by heavy footsteps. I was indignant when I heard some one walking in the veranda at night, some one who would not reply to my challenge; and it was not until I was investigating matters with a lantern, thinking chiefly of burglars, that the peculiarities of the house flashed into my mind. I felt certain then that I should meet that ghost. I spent hours in waylaying the footsteps; I concealed myself in sight of the veranda in and outside the house; I spread flour on the flags to obtain the imprint of his footsteps, but all in vain; I discovered nothing, the walking continued, and my servants would only enter the house after nightfall by the backdoor. That these footfalls were not caused by human agency both the natives and I were agreed; and no explanation of them has yet been offered.

My second haunted house was in a deserted village in a dense forest. I desired to utilize it as a shooting-box in the winter, or a protection against the heat of the summer months. But I reckoned without my host, for each night was a time of danger and unrest on account of the volleys of stones which descended from all sides. This I was aware was a favorite trick of the Hindustani servant to express disapproval of his master's actions or surroundings, but I took the precaution to have all my servants in the house at night, whilst I knew that no villagers would dare to cross the forest at that hour to play a trick on an official. Moreover the uneasiness of my servants acquitted them of all connivance in the matter, and I was compelled to accept the verdict that my presence was disfasteful to the shadowy tenant, and to leave him in undisturbed enjoyment of his own, lest he should proceed to further violence.—Current Literature.

PSYCHIC FORCES.

Defense Made Anent Psychic Development.

In sending to the Record-Herald of December 8 a plain statement of facts concerning my experience with psychic development, I had no thought of entering into an argument concerning the merits of the spiritist theory, for which I am in no sense prepared. However, if the facts stated proved to be of general interest, as I have reason to believe they did, perhaps that interest will extend to a more detailed explanation in reply to Mr. Frederic's criticism in the issue of December 15.

Hudson, in his "Law of Psychic Phenomena," deals at length with the theory that all supposed spirit messages emanate from the "subjective mind" of the medium for the deception of those who may consult him. He asserts that the subjective mind, or dual consciousness is ever alert to promote the material interests of the medium, warn him of all possible dangers and serve him in every way. Nowhere does he advance the thought that the subjective mind is anything but amenable to the ideas and wishes of the medium.

HER CLERICAL "CONTROL."

My personal experience is quite to the contrary. At the beginning of my acquaintance with the Catholic priest referred to in my first article he exhibited a most autocratic disposition and did not hesitate to criticise me severely when my line of thought or action did not agree with his own ideas. His temper was violent at times if I rebelled at his commands, and it was only after several heated arguments that he seemed to realize that my Scotch Presbyterian personality was of different fiber from that with which he had been accustomed to deal.

The friendship has since developed into a real pleasure. He is most considerate and courteous in his demands upon my time, and I am amply repaid by the association with an accomplished scholar and student. An item of interest may be the fact that in our general reading, when I happen upon a French or Italian sentence—languages with which I have no acquaintance—he will immediately translate it for me. He evinced the greatest interest in the consecration ceremonies of Bishop Muldoon, and I patiently waded through the columns of space devoted to that event in the daily papers. He also made interesting comments on the disturbance caused in Catholic circles by Father Crowley. These things, of course, held not the slightest personal interest for me.

NOTABLE CLAIM MADE.

I cite these facts as proof that the dual consciousness, if such it be, is by no means the servant or any of the medium.

Hudson asserts that the visions seen by a clairvoyant are drawn by the suggestions in the mind of the sitter. The incident I related as to the appearance of my clerical friend was incomplete to this extent: When the clairvoyant said, "Here comes a minister," my mind was immediately filled with a mental picture of a dearly loved pastor long since passed over. I asked eagerly: "What does he look like?" and was much disappointed that the description was exactly the reverse of what I wished and expected to hear. The theory of suggestion does not therefore hold good in this case.

I must refute the statement that my first acquaintance with psychic phenomena came through a "medium," unless I am entitled to lay claim to the same distinction, which I do not. The young woman who secured for me the first letter from my mother is a most gifted automatic writer since she not only duplicates the hand writing of every person who dictates a letter to her, but she is also controlled to play on the piano music that was never written.

FEARS THE SPIRITS.

In spite of these facts she will not admit that it is spirit influence, because her own supernatural fears are so great that she is nervous at the thought of an invisible companion. She simply says she does not know. Neither did I, but I determined that I would know, and I have succeeded to my own satisfaction at least.

Mr. Frederic's criticism is very fair, and I must confess that if I had seen the very development I describe in another person I should be as great a doubter as he. For that reason I urge the individual development of the psychic power, for in no other way can knowledge of the next existence become universal.

In admitting that I am a member of the so-called weaker sex, I may be permitted to say in reply to Mr. Frederic that for five years I have filled a position requiring perfect physical and mental strength, and that during that time I have been absent from my desk but two weeks by reason of illness. I question if the average man can show a better "bill of health."

Within the past week a mouse took refuge in my waste basket and I killed it with my foot. Can I offer greater evidence of the fact that my nerves are in good order?

YEARNS FOR TRUTH.

I entered upon an investigation of this line of thought with but a single motive, and that a most sincere desire to learn the truth. A normal woman with good social standing could certainly find no pleasure in allying herself with a cult that rests under a stigma, much less desire to become an object of curiosity to the public and one of solicitude on the part of her friends. I did not wish to delude myself, much less delude others, for life certainly holds enough of interest to a wholesome intellect without adding a chase after a chimera. My development has taken place in my own room, under a brilliant light, since the first evening, and if my own mind, subjective or objective, has evolved all the material I have turned out, I can only say that it is a most prolific romancer and ought to bring me a respectable income as a writer of fiction.

I make no plea for the public medium, though I believe that many of them are as honest as I am and therefore entitled to a respectful consideration. The whole difficulty lies in the misconception of the world of men concerning the condition of those who have left it. I find that my friends have not changed in the least. They have the same characteristics, good and bad, and their advice is of no more value to me than that of an intelligent person here, less, perhaps, because they cannot place quite the same value upon material necessities, since they are removed from that special need.

Sympathy, love, family counsel and companionship they can and do give, but if I wanted valuable advice upon, say, a legal matter, I would go to a first-class attorney and pay his fee for the same. We have no more right to expect our friends in the next world to be objects of convenience to us than we would if they were here. They have the power to read the human mind, and when a sitter goes to a public medium the spirit "guide" reads all his hopes and plans and repeats them to the medium, who immediately astonishes him by telling him a great many things he already knew.

Within the memory of the present generation the art of writing was an unusual accomplishment, and the village schoolmaster was the confidant of every swain that wished his services in inditing epistles to the favored lass. How many mistresses have not at various times given their services to the faithful maid in writing her letters home? To secure a message from a loved one who is absent and who can be reached in no other way is within the power of the psychic; to extend this power to all humanity should be his privilege. That, and that only, in my opinion, is the legitimate province of the professional medium.—Mrs. C., in Chicago Record-Herald.

Christmas Wedding Bells.

The home of Mr. and Mrs. Steve Johnson, at 11437 Harvard avenue, Chicago, was alive with humanity of assorted ages and sizes and both sexes, on the afternoon of Christmas Day. Neighbors, friends, relatives and well-known Spiritualists gathered there to witness the marriage of the eldest daughter, Ella May Johnson, secretary of the Illinois State Spiritualists' Association, to Albert H. Bloom, only son of those staunch North Side Spiritualists, Mr. and Mrs. A. W. Bloom, of 613 Otto street.

Promptly at four o'clock the bride, arrayed in white, leaning on her father's arm, and accompanied by her sister, Miss Bertha Johnson, and Miss Lula McCurdy, in white, was conducted to the parlor where the bridegroom, attended by Edgar G. Hallenbeck and Fred I. Nelson, awaited her coming. Standing beneath evergreen and mistletoe, climbing ivy forming a background, and fronting a bank of faces every one of which beamed a smiling approval of their step, these long-time lovers joined hands for their life journey, while Mrs. Emma Nickerson Warne, with fitting ceremonial pronounced them husband and wife.

Congratulations untainted by stately formality, but ringing with genuine good will reigned for a time. The spirit of enjoyment was given added impulse by two very appropriate and much appreciated recitations rendered by Mrs. R. S. McCann, M. D. Then the company was told off into details and marched to the dining-room where banquet tables groaned under an abundance and variety of tempting ly prepared viands. In as much as the newly-married couple remained at the table until all had eaten, there is no harm in mentioning the fact that the handsomest members of the company sat at the last table. It is also noteworthy that the only symptom of frustration manifested on the occasion was when the bridegroom's mother forgot to put the pickles on the table until too late.

As the squads fell back they again gathered in parlor and sitting room. Here Mrs. Warne gave eager hearts messages of remembrance from many on the spirit side of life, that were numbered among the recipients' choicest Christmas treasures. Then came five-year-old May Dalloz, with recitations, song and dance, proving herself a coming queen in the art of entertaining.

Before the formal breaking up, President Warne of the State Association, spoke words of caution and counsel to the pair just wedded.

There was eager watchfulness among the younger guests about nine o'clock for the arrival of the carriage in which young Mr. and Mrs. Bloom were to start for their newly-furnished flat at 971 South Homan avenue. This was explained by the showers of rice and wealth of old shoes that greeted their setting forth. It was found that a sign carefully prepared for the carriage explaining their new relations and asking pity of the observer had strangely dematerialized at the moment of its need.

I should not fail to notice that the presents to the bride were many, rich and useful, among them a handsome china set of 103 pieces, from the State Association and its friends. Married and mated is the verdict of the young couple's legion of friends. Pleasant memories of December 25, 1901, will remain with them and with all who accepted Mr. and Mrs. Johnson's invitation to their home on that day.

Mr. Bloom holds a clerical position of responsibility in the offices of the Fraser-Chalmers Co., of Chicago.

THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH,

Or the Future Life According to Science. By Louis Figuier. Translated from the French by S. R. Crockee. A very fascinating work. This fine volume might well have been entitled Spiritualism Demonstrated by Science. It is written in that peculiar interesting style in which French writers excel when they would popularize scientific subjects in adaptation to the needs of the general reader. The author says: "There is a true and respectable idea in Spiritualism," and regards as proved "the fact of communication between superhumans and the inhabitants of earth." Price, $1.50.

"THE DREAM CHILD,"

A Fascinating Romance of Two Worlds. By Florence Huntley. Price, cloth, 75 cents. Books like "The Dream Child" spur humanity on to make more and more demands of this nature, and will open up new heights and depths of spiritual knowledge.—Ella Wheeler Wilcox. Will, I believe, take its place beside Bulwer's "Zanoni" and the "Seraphita" of Balzac.—Daily Capital, Topeka, Kansas. Although simple and unvarnished with any inflammable descriptions, enthralls the mind to the exclusion of other thoughts, until reluctantly the reader closes the last page.—Minneapolis Sunday Times.

HELIOCENTRIC ASTROLOGY,

Or Essentials of Astronomy and Solar Mentality, with Tables of Ephemeris to 1910. By Yarmo Vedra. With 64 illustrations, 35 of which are original drawings by Holmes W. Merton, author of "Descriptive Mentality." A new system of personally determining the primary fund of Mental and Physical forces and their results in mental aptitudes that dominate the nature of the individual as based upon date of birth. Price, cloth, $1.50.

ASTRAL WORSHIP

By J. H. Hill, M.D. A valuable contribution to the current discussion of religious problems. The author by illustrations and a planisphere (a representation of the celestial sphere upon a plane with adjustable circles), traces most of the myths which lie at the base of Christianity to their origin in sun and star worship. The astronomical facts given possess great value, the illustrations rare and curious. The book is bound in only one style—heavy boards. Price $1.

Father Tom and the Pope,

Or a Night at the Vatican. Written probably by Sir Samuel Ferguson. From Blackwood's Edinburg Magazine. This is a humorous account of a rollicksome visit to the Pope of Rome by Father Tom, an Irish priest, armed with a superabundance of Irish wit, two imperial quart bottles of Irish "poteen," and an Irish recipe for "convounding" the same. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

MOLLIE FANCHER,

The Brooklyn Enigma.

An authentic statement of facts in the life of Mary J. Fancher, the psychological marvel of the nineteenth century. Unimpeachable testimony of many witnesses. By Abram H. Dailey. With illustrations. Price, cloth, $1.50.

The Blue Laws of Connecticut.

Taken from the Code of 1650, and the public records of the colony of Connecticut previous to 1665, as printed in a compilation of the earliest laws and orders of the general court of Connecticut; also an account of the persecution of witches and Quakers in New England. Some extracts from the Blue Laws of Virginia. Price 25 cents.

THE GOD IDEA OF THE ANCIENTS,

Or Sex in Religion. By Eliza Burt Gamble. "It is a sensible, quiet, logical statement of opinion, deduced at times curiously from statistics which might be open to doubt; and never for a moment sensational or revolutionary.—Chicago Herald. 329 pages, large type, cloth bound. Three Journeys Around the World

—OR—

Travels in the Pacific Islands,

New Zealand, Australia, Ceylon, India, and other Oriental countries. By J. M. Peebles, A. M., M. D., Ph. D. In this splendid large book Dr. Peebles has concentrated a vast amount of valuable information. It is exceedingly entertaining and readable, and Spiritualism as he found it everywhere in his travels receives due attention, making the book of special value and interest to Spiritualists. 454 large pages, finely bound, at the price of $1.50.

SPIRITUAL SONGSTER.

By Mattie E. Hull. Thirty-eight of Mrs. Hull's sweetest songs, adapted to popular music, for the use of congregations, circles and families. Price, 10 cents, or $7 per hundred.

JOYS BEYOND THE THRESHOLD

A Sequel to The To-morrow of Death.

By Louis Figuier. Translated from the French. The To-morrow of death was written to develop the idea of the principle of the permanence of the human soul after death, and its reincarnation in a chain of new beings, whose successive links are unrolled to the bosom of ethereal space. "Beyond the Threshold" continues on the same lines, enlarging and expanding the idea by reasons and considerations drawn from science and philosophy, claiming that the certainty of a new birth beyond our earthly end is the best means of arming ourselves against all weakness in the presence of death, and that the help offered by science and philosophy to that end is far superior to that of any of the existing religions. From beginning to end it is interesting, entertaining, instructive and fascinating, and whether one accepts it all or not, much will have been learned and much pleasure enjoyed in its perusal. Price, $1.25.

The Spiritual Wreath.

A collection of words and music for the choir, congregation and social circle. By S. W. Tucker. Comprises sixty or more gems of song. Price, 15 cents.

THE GOSPEL OF BUDDHA,

According to Old Records. By Dr. Paul Carus. A translation made from Japanese, under the auspices of the Rev. Shaku Soyer, delegate to the Parliament of Religions. Was published in Japan. Price, $1.

KAREZZA

Ethics of Marriage. By Alice B. Stockham, M. D. Karezza makes a plea for a better birthright for children, and aims to lead individuals to seek a higher development of themselves through most sacred relations. It is pure in tone and aim, and should be widely circulated. Price, cloth, $1.

THE GOSPEL OF NATURE

Is a most excellent work by Dr. M. L. Sherman, assisted by Prof. W. F. Lyon. Heretofore it has been sold for $2, but the price now has been reduced to $1. It is a book that will interest and instruct. It contains 280 pages, and is full of suggestive thoughts. Dr. Sherman was a medium of rare qualities, and his work is a reflection from the celestial spheres.

OLD AND NEW PSYCHOLOGY

By W. J. Colville. Reports of twenty-four distinct lectures, recently delivered in New York, Brooklyn, Boston, Philadelphia and other prominent cities of the United States, have contributed the basis of this volume. Price, $1.00.

Out of the Depths Into the Light.

By Samuel Bowles; Mrs. Carrie E. S. Twing, medium. This is a very interesting little book, and will be appreciated from start to finish by all who wish to gain spiritual information. Price, 25 cents.

Why She Became a Spiritualist

Twelve Lectures by Abby A. Judson. This book should be read by every Spiritualist. Price, $1.00; postage 10 cents.

The Science of Spirit Return.

By Charles Dawbarn. A scientific rehearsal that is truly interesting. Price, 10 cents.

Why I Am a Vegetarian.

An address delivered before the Chicago Vegetarian Society. By J. Howard Moore. Price, 25 cents.

A. P. A. MANUAL

A complete expose of the principles and objects of the American Protective Association. A book for all patriotic American citizens. Price, 15 cents, or two for 25 cents.

HARMONICS OF EVOLUTION.

The Philosophy of Individual Life, Based Upon Natural Science

As taught by modern masters of law. By Florence Huntley. An exceedingly interesting and distinctly valuable contribution to the literature of evolution, unfolding its laws from the deeper and clearer spiritual aspect, and indicating the defects of the Darwinian theory. Spiritualists and Materialists alike can gain much from its perusal. Price, finely bound in cloth, $2.

A Few Words About the Devil,

SPIRITUAL HARP

A collection of Vocal Music for the Choir, Congregation and Social Circles. By J. M. Peebles and J. O. Barrett; E. H. Bailey, Musical Editor. New edition. Culled from a wide field of literature with the most critical care, free from all theological bias, throbbing with the soul of inspiration, embodying the principles and virtues of the spiritual philosophy, set to the most cheerful and popular music (nearly all original) and adapted to all occasions, it is doubtless the most attractive work of the kind ever published. Its beautiful songs, duets and quartets, with piano, organ or melodeon accompaniment, adapted both to public meetings and the social circles. Cloth, $1.25; postage, 14 cents.

A. SCHOPENHAUER ESSAYS.

Translated by T. B. Saunders. Cloth, 75 cents. "Schopenhauer is one of the few philosophers who can be generally understood without a commentary. All his theories claim to be drawn direct from facts, to be suggested by observation, and to interpret the world as it is; and whatever view he takes, he is constant in his appeal to the experience of common life. This characteristic endows his style with a freshness and vigor which would be difficult to match in the philosophic writing of any country, and impossible in that of Germany."—Translator.

THE SOUL OF THINGS;

Or Psychometric Researches and Discoveries. By Wm. and Elizabeth M. F. Denton. A marvelous work. Though concise as a text book it is as fascinating as a work of fiction. The reader will be amazed to see the curious facts here combined in support of this power of the human mind, which will resolve a thousand doubts and difficulties, make geology plain as day, and throw light on all subjects now obscured by time. A Little Sermon to Spiritualists.

Text: Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles? Mat. 7:16.

Do orthodox Sunday-Schools bring forth Spiritualists?

We might end our little sermon right here, leaving our readers to answer the query in accordance with their own common sense and judgment, and their knowledge of the training and impressions received in such Sunday-Schools.

Can anyone expect strength to accrue to the Spiritualist cause, by having the children of Spiritualists indoctrinated with the ideas and dogmas of orthodoxy?

If such children ever become Spiritualists, it will be in despite of the bias implanted and fostered by ordinary Sunday-School teachings.

To expect Spiritualism as a fruit of orthodox Sunday-School teachings, is equivalent to expecting to gather grapes from thorns, or figs from thistles.

There is a better and wiser way. It lies within the power of Spiritualists to do as much for Spiritualism as the Sunday-Schools are doing for the churches. We can gather wisdom from church methods, and apply the same to the benefit of our own Cause. We can make the Progressive Lyceum a feeder for our societies, as the Sunday-Schools are feeders to the churches.

Many of our older Spiritualists received an early religious training in Sunday-Schools. Many of them know by personal experience the strength of the early impressions thus received, and the extreme difficulty with which they are overcome, and the slowness with which the ideas and notions thus learned are outgrown. With some the experience has been painful indeed. The surrendering of their previously accepted beliefs, even for a larger, sweeter and more beautiful truth, has been like unto a painful death, preceding a resurrection to a higher and brighter life. The process has been painful, sometimes even into anguish.

Such should, by the memory of their own bitter experience, seek by all proper means to save others from a similar experience. This can be done by giving the children, the young people, and learners of any age, the benefits of such instruction as is imparted in a Progressive Lyceum.

Let them be taught correct ideas, let the knowledge, the ethics, the philosophy, the truths of Spiritualism be instilled into their minds, and they will never need to endure the pain, the mental anxiety and disquietude of breaking away from old beliefs and taking hold of the new knowledge, against which their prejudices had been enlisted.

Finally, brethren and sisters, remember, "of thorns men do not gather figs, nor of a bramble bush gather they grapes."

That Settles It.

A news dispatch from Rome says: "The Pope is very much interested in the report on parochial schools and Catholic colleges in America, for which Mgr. Antonini was sent to Washington to investigate them. His Holiness, after expressing admiration for the powerful organization having them in charge, added:

"It seems unfair that Catholics should pay school taxes when they support their own schools."

Instead of expressing himself that way his "Holiness" should betray extreme delight that parochial schools are tolerated in a free country. If Catholics have the privilege of educating the young in such manner as to advance the best interests of the church, instead of making good citizens of them, every other denomination should be allowed to exercise the same right; then, in another generation, the ignorance of the Middle Ages would be universal. The catechism would be universally known, and there education would end, save with the priesthood.

The free institutions of America recognize every citizen as a sovereign. To fit him for self-government his education must embrace something else than duties to a church, and obedience to the dictates of a priest.

The Pope has great reason to be pleased at the success of his hierarchy in undermining the principles of a free government. He expects his successors, through the influence of parochial schools, colonization, and Jesuit intermeddling with governmental affairs, will establish in the new world what they have lost in the old, and subordinate all other religions and governments to papal authority. The danger lies in over-confidence, and neglect to throttle the anaconda before his power is fully established.

How Is That?

The London Literary Guide says, in its November issue: "The Dresden edition of Col. Ingersoll's works is quite out of print, and a new edition is now being prepared for publication." The works appeared in twelve large volumes, at a cost of $20 for the set. Who was so extravagant as to suppose a very large edition of thousands of copies would be exhausted in a few months? The new edition in preparation, will be put on the market at $30. Does that indicate Ingersoll's labors were ephemeral?

A Sad Outlook.

"Can convicts be reformed?" Thus inquires the Chicago Journal, and goes on to say that Rabbi Hirsch in his Sunday afternoon address on the management of the Illinois charitable and penal institutions, said that "our penal institutions are failures. Once a convict and criminal, always a convict and a criminal—that is the rule we seem to be living up to."

It is a horrible rule to contemplate, and there are penologists and philanthropists who cling to the belief that many convicts can be reclaimed and restored to society. Col. Henry M. Boies in his recent admirable work on penology strongly holds to the doctrine of reclamation in a large class of cases, if prisoners are properly treated, but such is not the faith of prison wardens generally throughout the States. They invariably expect to see their unwilling guests back again after each discharge.

Over the door by which the prisoners are admitted they would inscribe the legend Dante saw over the gate of hell—"All ye who enter here abandon hope." Over the door through which the prisoners are conducted back to liberty they would write, "Once a convict and a criminal, always a convict and a criminal." Hopeless the convict enters; hopeless he leaves.

Is it any wonder we have cases like that reported in the New York Herald the other day?

A man named Albert T. Harris was convicted of forgery in the Court of General Sessions. He was an old man, 66 years of age, forlorn and hopeless, and as he stood up for sentence he begged for mercy.

"Half my life has been passed in a prison cell, and I am now on the verge of the grave. I have not long to live, and I had to do something like forging to get something to eat. I ask you to be as merciful to me as you can."

The man had been a notorious criminal, and the larger part of his life, all his mature years, had been passed within prison walls. Since he was 30 he had enjoyed but few intervals of freedom, for no sooner had he served one term of punishment than some crime brought him back to prison again. The longest period of liberty he seems to have had in more than thirty years was five months.

"Once a convict always a convict." Has society no responsibility for such men as these? There are thousands of men like Harris passing back and forth from prison to liberty, from liberty to prison. Can nothing be done to help these unfortunates, or must this mournful, dreadful ebb and flow go on while life endures?

One thing at least the people of this State can do, and that is they can remove all prison management from spoils politics and place men in charge of our penal institutions who have other maxims for prisoners than "once a convict always a convict." This was the object of the Sunday afternoon meeting upon which we have already commented. The good work then begun must go on to complete fruition. The conscience of the State must be aroused.

Truly the outlook for the criminal is pitiable, and demonstrates that there is, with all the civilized world's advance in practical humanitarianism, a painful lack of wisely ordered methods to aid criminals to arise to better lives, rather than crush them into hopeless lives of criminality.

It is a subject demanding most careful study and consideration at the hands of the world's reformers and philanthropists, how to rescue such unfortunates from evil courses and assist them to lead lives of honor and usefulness. And especially is this true in the case of such as truly desire to abandon the ways of evil and live upright and honorable lives. To crush such persons into criminality is nothing less than criminal injustice on the part of society.

Worshiping a Man as "The Living God."

A strange story has been recently told that illustrates the tendency in man to worship—especially under the influence of superstitious ignorance, and something akin to fetishism. The same feeling is observable in the more enlightened parts of the world—instance the millions of trinitarian Christians offering worship to a man as a deity. As given by a special correspondent of the Chicago Chronicle, an English traveler has just discovered in one of the most primitive regions of the Chinese empire, a human being who is worshiped as a deity by millions of people. Known far and wide as the "Living God," he is to the uncounted millions of Chinese and Mongolian Buddhists what the famous Lama of Thibet is to those of Central Asia.

This remarkable religious personality makes his home at Urga, the remote Mongolian town lying just on the fringe of civilization at the end of the old Asiatic highway across the Gobi desert, and it was while the English traveler was returning overland from China to Europe that he witnessed the strange rites connected with the worship of the "Living God." In a letter this description of him is given:

In the flesh he is a young man about thirty and lives in a house which is an exact replica of the Russian consulate general. His personification of a deity is chiefly confined to religious occasions and his public life. In private he is of the world worldly and has some amiable weaknesses.

One of these renders him an object of much importance in Urga itself apart from his religious circle. It is the not uncommon craving to possess a duplicate of anything which takes his fancy. In the exercise of this indulgence he has at various times become the possessor of some curious reproductions. To it he owes his present most incongruous habitation and at another time the possession of an elephant, said to have cost him 6,000 rubles.

He has also acquired many other curiosities, the procuring of which offers to the Russian merchants at Urga a not unprofitable means of livelihood. I was fortunate enough to see this extraordinary personage under conditions not easily forgotten. Outside one of the beautiful Buddhist temples, in a carefully guarded inclosure, was pitched a semi-circle of tents. The central one, resplendent with yellow silks and gold embroidery, with huge yellow silk umbrellas and cushions to match, contained the throne of the "Living God." On either hand and surrounding him were crowds of lamas, priests, Mongol princes and Ambans.

In front of the tents was an open space, sixty to eighty yards across, where hundreds of Mongols, standing, kneeling and sitting, all deeply interested, gazed upon the wrestling matches which were going on in pairs all over the ring. The combatants are picked champions from various tribes and families. They are stripped naked, with the exception of the leather riding boots and a garment rather more scanty than a man's bathing dress. Upon entering the ring each pair of wrestlers prance up with curious movements of the arms and legs to the immediate presence of the "Living God," before whom they kowtow, falling on their knees and striking the ground repeatedly with their foreheads. These obeisances over each man is placed in position by his own second, usually an elderly Mongol, one of whom gives the signal for the bout to begin. The wrestling itself was good. A fall is the signal for the opponents to stop. The winner at once begins prancing and dancing about in an even more wonderful manner than at first, again groveling obeisances.

After this he quits the ring to be received by a crowd of admiring friends, another pair being introduced. At one time there might have been from fifteen to twenty couples wrestling. These, with the cries of the on-lookers, the coloring of their bright clothes, the mass of gold and yellow in the magnificent tent and the quaint and picturesque roofs of the beautifully colored temples rising above it made up a scene to be long remembered.

Important New Postoffice Ruling.

Dear Sir:—The post office officials at Washington, D. C., have just ruled that a subscription to any publication, entered as second-class matter, must be discontinued, when the time for which it is paid in advance has expired.

This is such a radical ruling and directly opposite to all law and previous rulings, that it means a complete change and revolution in the publishing business. This ruling will greatly reduce the circulation of nearly all papers and cause the withdrawal of many advertisements until a lower rate is put into effect. This vitally affects you, for it prohibits extending credit to your subscribers, and reduces your circulation and value to advertisers. Any violation of this will deprive the publisher of his pound rate.

Immediate and concerted action is necessary:

1st—Write or wire the newly appointed Postmaster-General, Hon. Henry C. Payne, at Milwaukee, Wis., where he is at present.

2nd—Write your U. S. Senator, also Congressman.

3rd—Let us hear from you.

Address:

General C. H. Howard, Pres.,
National Publishers' Bureau,
500 Masonic Temple, Chicago, Ill.

Dec. 14, 1901.

We have no fault whatever to find with the above ruling. In our opinion it is just and to the point. We started The Progressive Thinker on the prepayment principle exclusively, and we have found that the plan works admirably with us. It is not well nor wise in a publisher to send his paper out after the time paid for has expired, and thus in a measure force it upon unwilling patrons. We have always been opposed to that plan, and are glad that the administration has at last seen fit to act in harmony with our views in this matter. Of course a paper to adopt the prepayment system must be in an extremely healthy condition, in other words, prosperous! There must be a demand for it, as indicated by The Progressive Thinker. To force a paper on an unwilling patron is an insult to common-sense business principles.

Pulpit Decline.

We have a semi-authoritative statement for the terrible falling away of candidates from the Christian ministry. It comes from Professor A. C. Zenos, of the McCormick Theological Seminary, of Chicago, as presented to the Baptist ministers, lately in session. The Professor gave those reasons, in words following:

Heresy trials.

Uncertainty of the Bible due to the higher criticisms.

The theological unrest manifested by society.

Enforcement of rule requiring candidates for the ministry to subscribe to the creed of the church.

The commercialism of the age.

The spirit of worldliness and self-indulgence.

Lack of spirituality in the churches.

The failure of ministers properly to present the claims of the church upon young men.

The hard times of 1893, which prevented a number of theological students from completing their education.

The recent commercial prosperity, which has created an unusual demand for young men in mercantile pursuits.

"I do not accept all these reasons because it is difficult to determine just what influences are responsible for present conditions," said Dr. Zenos. "During a certain period of our church's history we trained more young men for the pulpit than were needed and we are suffering now from a reaction. No matter what the causes may be, we are confronted with the fact that the number of candidates for God's ministry is decreasing at an alarming rate.

"Since 1895 the number of students attending our theological seminaries has declined steadily. There has been a falling off of 40 per cent in attendance during the last six years despite the steady increase in the number of new churches. Every other denomination, I believe, is just as much interested as we are."

The Professor could have stated with truth, and it would have embraced the principal reason for the falling off of candidates for the ministry: "The young men of to-day have been doing some thinking on their own account, and have outgrown the creeds of all the churches." Talk with them in private and they ridicule some of the most sacred teachings of the church. Indeed, but few of the features of those creeds will bear investigation by a reasoning mind. The church is in a transition state. A general breakup will follow, with reorganization along new and better lines. The old names will be retained, but devils and Junior Gods, Queen of Heaven, purgatorial and brimstone fires will all take their departure, and an age of reason will succeed an age of superstition. Hasten the good work!

Prayers and Damning of No Avail.

Somebody writes the Kansas City Star, from Arkansas, telling of the White river. He says it is navigable for 505 miles for steamboats, but it has a habit of shutting off its water supply so at times it is no more than a foot deep over the rapids. He says the boatmen tried damning the river, and followed the practice for years with no seeming benefit. Then the preachers and their victims tried the virtue of praying, with no better success than followed the cursing and damning of the pilots. Now they are about asking the government to introduce another kind of dam, with locks, and they hope to get relief from that quarter.

It must be conceded their prospects of continued navigation, will be greatly improved if the people leave off their imprecations, and appeals to Divinity for special favors, and set themselves to work to improve the water course, and prevent its great waste in flood time, reserving its flow in the mountains and uplands until it is needed during the drouth of summer.

There are other occasions in life when worthy actions will be better rewarded than will the curses of the impious, or the prayers of the devout.

Be Easy on the Inquisitors.

Beside heavy civil disabilities for blasphemy over there in "merrie England" the offender is subject to three years' imprisonment. The offense consists, according to Blackstone, in "denying the being or providence of God, contumelious reproaches of our Savior Christ, profane scoffing at the Holy Scripture, or exposing it to contempt and ridicule." In Roman Catholic countries, speaking disrespectfully of the Virgin Mary and of the saints is held to be blasphemy, which is an addition to the Protestant laws of England.

These laws succeeded the Inquisitorial methods of making Christians, and are still in force in nearly or quite all the original American states. Thus the savagery of uncultured ages is protracted into modern times, and employed to force an unworthy system of religion on a highly cultured and thinking world. While such laws remain on our statute books we ought not to be too severe on the old Inquisition.

The Nebular Theory Confirmed.

La Place, the great mathematical astronomer of a hundred years ago, maintained that space was originally full of what he called cosmic vapor; that nuclei were formed, which gaining a rotary motion, attracted other matter from vast areas; that bodies thus formed became solidified, and in process of ages became suns, planets or satellites.

This theory which La Place maintained with great learning, has of late years been controverted by some of the ablest astronomers; but Prof. G. W. Ritchey, of the Yerkes Observatory, near Chicago, has settled this question, for all time, by confirming the La Place theory. He took a photograph of nebulous matter on Sept. 20, and only a few days ago another, during which brief period he found it had changed shape, become more condensed, and already emitted light.

To gain some idea of the vastness of space Prof. Ritchey estimates the distance of this forming orb at 117,313,920,000,000 miles from the earth, and that 28 years are required for a ray of light to traverse the vast space before it can be seen by mortal vision, though traveling at the velocity of 185,000 miles a second.

Saladin on Prayer.

The Progressive Thinker's symposium on prayer is not complete without a skit from that brilliant Scotsman, Saladin, who always writes to be understood. He says:

"I apprehend that instead of our prayers, such as they are, bringing down a blessing on us, they simply entail condign punishment for our impudence. If Jehovah had half the self-respect Queen Elizabeth had, he would give us a snub that would forever put a stop to our fulsome caterwauling. Once on the occasion of Her Majesty passing through Coventry, the sycophantish corporation met her outside the town, where the Mayor addressed her in some laudatory twaddle prepared for the occasion, and which commenced:

"'We men of Coventrie
Are very, glad to see Your Royal Majestie.
Good Lord, how fair you be!'

"The Queen interrupted him by replying in the same tone:

"'My Royal Majestie
Is very glad to see Ye men of Coventrie.
Good Lord, what fools ye be!'

"Would that His Majesty of heaven had the self-respect which distinguished Her Majesty of England."

CLUBS! CLUBS! CLUBS!

A WOMAN'S ANSWER.

You ask why I, a woman, should stand before you to-night,
And raise my voice with yours for freedom, truth and right?
Why I should leave my fireside and join the noisy throng
That is demanding justice, the righting of all wrong?
Do I not forget my station, my place, my womanhood,
That God expected women to be exalted, pure and good?
Am I not afraid the rabble will soil my purity?
Can a woman mix with politics and still be womanly?

Can a woman know the wrongs of earth, its sin, its crime, its strife,
And still be fitted for motherhood, the holiest right of wife?
Will not the pitch of worldliness our pure white garments stain?
Can innocence and ignorance once lost be e'er regained?
Can we know the awful depth of our country's social hell,
And still believe in God, in his love and fear to dwell?
Can we come down among the rabble, can we know its depth of woe,
And go back to homes of plenty and perfect contentment know?

Your questions are hard, my brother, and they rend my heart with pain.
I can only answer by asking of you again,
Can a woman of soul and heart, a woman of mind and brain,
Look out on the world unheeding? see not the woe and pain?
See the awful struggle of humanity its rightful place to command,
And still not raise her voice, not even raise her hand
To help the downtrodden, the oppressed that she must meet?
Though they haunt her in her home and besiege her in the street?

Can a woman kiss her baby's face, its love and laughter heed
And not see the little ones murdered by Mammon's greed?
Can she know the blessedness of a mother's love so deep
And not understand the anguish when a mother does not weep
That her babe is taken? Because she knows that death is kind.
Darkness of the grave is as sunlight to the darkness left behind,
That the sting of death is bitter, but the sting of life is worse
Better death by far than life, when life has grown a curse.

Can a woman look around her, see the sin, the woe, the crime,
The poverty, the ignorance that surrounds us all the time?
Can she see the homes made wretched by the awful curse of want,
See the wolf there ever standing, blood-stained, grim and gaunt?
Can she see her sister staggering 'neath the crushing weight of woe
That bears her down. (Know her suffering as only women know)
And not raise her voice in protest 'gainst society's fearful crime?
Not watch and pray and work and toil for righteousness' own time?
Can I see my sister hurried along that downward road,
See her try to stop and struggle against the crushing load
Of sin she bears? See her frantic struggles to regain the path she's lost, Dare not stretch forth my hand to help her? Must stop to count the cost?
When of sin I know she bears the smaller share as reckoned with our nations?
That she's but the woeful product of our boasted civilization;
She had neither voice nor choice in shaping her life's pathway,
Environments she could not control, made but a castaway.

Must I see homes degraded, marriage debased and defiled?
The wrongs of greed and avarice 'gainst mother, home and child?
Must I see my daughter's purity put upon the marketplace,
And sell to the highest bidder her beauty of soul and face?
Love put in the background, wealth and position before,
Marriage only legalized sin, only this, and nothing more?
Homes where love ne'er enters, where peace ne'er folds her wings,
Only the corroding sorrow that gnaws at a woman's heart-strings?

Must I see the wrongs around me? these wrongs that cry for redress?
That racks my soul and brings to my pillow sleeplessness?
And yet not ask for Justice? not stretch forth my shackled hands?
And ask in truth and justice you strike from them their bands?
Give me the right to speak. Aye! the right to act as well,
That a woman's heart and a woman's brains may this mighty movement swell,
And when we've fought our battle and gained our righteous end
Ye need not blush that ye were helped by a woman's heart and hand.

—Kate Richards.

HEAVEN AND HELL.

A Lecturette by Hudson Tuttle.

What a cruel doctrine that of heaven and hell, to the sensitive soul, which is filled with a great love for mankind, and delights in joy and is repelled with acute pain from suffering! In what nightmare of ignorance was it gestated, to live, stalking like a horrible spectre, down the ages to the present?

Were this belief not existing in the minds of men, would anyone conceive it in the present age of intelligence, or dare promulgate it? How glad we are that it is not as strongly advocated as formerly; that it is kept in the background, and that our children do not tremble with fear at this terrific belief. Changed, toned down to the humanity of the time, yet lingering as an essential element of the Christian religion.

How free, how glad is the mind when liberated from this incubus, which blasts the face of the fairest prospect! Those who have been educated in and by the church, when they escape, and understand the science of spirit and the spirit world alone can comprehend this joy in fullest measure. The agony and suspense of a sensitive person who believes in the tenets of religion and is in doubt as to the future of those who are loved, words cannot express. Why do not all who believe this doctrine of eternal punishment become insane, knowing as they must that many dearest to them, will inevitably suffer eternal torment? They do not—cannot believe.

At the beautiful grounds of a spiritual camp-meeting, where nature smiled with gratitude in the brilliant sunlight, and all was joy, I met a man who had escaped the prison of beliefs. The children of the lyceum were marching before us, as happy as the birds singing in the branches and as thoughtless of the theology which has tormented untold generations. "What demon ever suggested to man," he said bitterly, "that such were born depraved, and unless regenerated by confessing sins they never committed, are eternally lost? I once believed this; my wife believed it, and because our darling child died unconfessed, her reason fled, and she is hopelessly insane! Constantly she accuses herself of having neglected her duty, and wails over the tortures she believes our child is enduring. All that I possess, even my life would I give, if she could believe as I now do, in the true life of the spirit!"

Do the teachers of Christianity believe this doctrine? Not as the past believed. It is no longer an active tenet of faith, appealed to, and replying in a symposium on a recent occasion, a Rabbi said that the Old Testament has nothing definite about the subject, and hence all that can be said must be vague speculation, and all that is in the New is ecstatic extravagance.

Strange as it may appear, in that book given expressly to throw light on the great problem of futurity, the most learned students of its pages find nothing giving the least knowledge, and a great many passages which favor annihilation.

A Presbyterian minister thought all depended on belief in Christ, and the unbeliever is sure of eternal punishment. Hell is where God is not. Yet is not God everywhere, even in "the depths of hell," as much as on the throne of heaven?

A Baptist minister thought that the Bible is not a geography of the future world, and all that it says is typical, and has no objective reality. In other words, there are no such places as heaven and hell. Another minister of that denomination said that he has no more reason to doubt the existence of a place of punishment that that of heaven. He delights to think that the dead are living somewhere; and that death eternally fixes their condition, and that "no hope" will be the one wail of the lost! Yet he does not believe that they suffer in a hell of fire. Why does he pause here? The Bible teaches that as certainly as it teaches the existence of hell. That an infinite, all-wise, all-powerful being created the races of mankind and then shows justice and mercy by damning the larger portion for being as he made them, and doing exactly what he foreknew they would, can only be believed by a mind dwarfed and blighted by the study of theology.

A Congregationalist was sure that heaven and hell are conditions and not places, yet he exults in the thought of "outer darkness," outside the material universe, where no starbeam pierces the cimmerian darkness, and the soul dwells alone with remorse and memory through the ages of eternity.

He does not know; he has no evidence, yet he does not believe in a literal hell or devil, and he knows of no minister who does. Henry Ward Beecher was assailed for heresy for utterance no more radical. It is little more than a century since Jonathan Edwards, founder of the orthodox creed, put forth that terrible doctrine that hell was paved with the skulls of infants not a span long! And when his wife in tears, held their infant before him, and asked if that, too, was already damned, replied coldly that it was a "reprobate, viper of vengeance, which Jehovah will hold ever hell in the tongs of his wrath till they turn and spit venom in his face."

Then it was the saints sang such delightful songs as this:

"There is a never dying hell,
And never ending pains,
Where children will with demons dwell
In darkness, fire and chains.
Have faith the same in endless shame,
For all the human race,
For hell is crammed with infants damned
Without a day of grace."

To believers in this demoniac scheme of creation, the brightest sunlight became a gloom, and nature was draped with the weeds of despair which saw not a single star of hope.

The world moves, and even the adamantine creeds are being broken. What has wrought this wonderful change, which really having begun, must reach perfect mental freedom? What has dispelled the fear which our fathers instilled in our minds and made us, as children, shiver when the wind howled in the darkness of the night, at the thoughts of a horned devil, of death and the judgment day? The Bible has remained the same, it has added nothing; suppressed nothing. For generations belief in these dogmas was made a test of Christian faith It is the spirit of the age.

The world moves! We rejoice that the gospel ministry dare not reiterate the old belief; that they have courage to tell the people how far they have drifted, in spite of Bible anchor and the cables of creeds and dogmas. These cables, once strong as steel, have rusted into dust and bind no soul who dares claim its birthright to think.

Let us rejoice at this advance, the more when we compare with the patched and pettifogging views of the future life entertained by the most liberal church members, the beauties of that life as presented by Spiritualism.

That life is a continuance of this, simply its extension into a higher plane of activity. The spirit realizes in that life, all it idealizes here.

There is no punishment for its own sake, no arbitrary decree of judgment; no forgiveness or pardon; no savior but the salvation by growth out of false conditions. The spirit at birth sets out for perfection, not for perdition, and it will reach its goal.

The worst use to which an immortal being could be put would be eternal torture. If a single soul was thus condemned creation would be a failure, and the spasms of hell would eclipse the joy of heaven.

Having the heritage of immortality, and endless progress, the burdens, scars, the stains, the earthward inclinations the fever of passions, all, all, one by one, will be cast aside in the journey. If you gain a resting-place for thought by calling suffering, physical or mental, hell, and happiness, heaven, it is well. It is one step onward from believing them to be places, but if you look closer, you will see that however used, these terms lead to misconception. The whole scheme of thought which they represent has passed away. The existence of the God who gave out rewards and punishments, like an omnipotent pedagogue or Oriental tyrant, has no place in our consciousness. We are not to save our souls by vindicating God, nor cringe like slaves for fear of offending him.

Ours is to be true to the laws of our being, and not offend ourselves by setting them at defiance.

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Worth Remembering.

They are mistaken who suppose the Buddhists worship their founder. Gautama, the Buddha, alias "the wise," is never worshiped as a God, but is venerated because he taught how to gain Nirvana without passing through the numerous forms of humbler life requisite to fit the soul for eternal rest. It will be well to remember this.

The same is true of Mohammed. He was the prophet of Allah, and is respected as such, but is worshiped never.

It is only the son of a Judean peasant who is worshiped by orthodox Christians as an equal, yea, the veritable Almighty God himself. Such blasphemy commands our pity, rather than denunciation.

A Request to Iowa Spfritualists.

Kind Friends:—I shall close my engagements in Wisconsin, January 12, and shall then proceed at once to Oskaloosa to attend the Iowa State Spiritualist Convention, to be held in that city, January 16, 17, 18 and 19. From the nineteenth of the month I shall have open dates and will be pleased to fill them in any part of the state upon reasonable terms. I should be pleased to hear from any and all Spiritualists who are desirous of having meetings held in their respective communities at their earliest possible convenience. I shall be at liberty to put in six weeks' work in Iowa if my services are desired and would like to fill every weekday-evening and Sunday from January 19 to February 28. Address me at once at Beloit, Wis., from which point all mail will be forwarded. Please write at once, friends, and oblige.

HARRISON D. BARRETT.

Outlived Their Usefulness.

The press reports the City Missions in London in a deplorable condition. Life among the masses, it says, is appalling in a moral point of view. With the vast multitude there is no desire to worship God. Drunkenness is in the way of progress, and the manufacture of inebriates proceeds more rapidly than their reclamation. Gambling and betting are fearfully prevalent even among children. The churches are neglected, and infidelity is on the increase among all classes.

Cannot the City Missions see at a glance their creeds have outlived their usefulness? They should discard the fallacious teachings of the past, and build anew along common-sense lines. The errors of an ignorant age, should give place to the wisdom of modern science. Then all would be well.

Peace on Earth.

"Think not that I am come to send peace on earth; I came not to send peace, but a sword."—Jesus, Mat. 10:34.

Over there in Jerusalem at this time the words of the master are being verified. "The church of the Holy Sepulchre, surmounting Christ's tomb," says the associated press dispatch, "was the scene of a sanguinary affray on the 4th inst., between Franciscans and Greeks, during which there were a number of casualties on both sides." The bloody contest grew out of the question, which sect of Christians had the right to sweep the church. Troops had to be posted in the vicinity by the Moslem authorities for several days, to prevent these followers of our Lord from cutting each other's throats. That is the kind of "peace on earth" the dear Savior brought. But for Mohammedans a war of extermination would have ensued.

Man's Aural Self. By Charles Dawbarn.

CHAPTER THIRTEEN.

Man's Shapeless Aura.

The hour of disintegration comes sooner or later to the form of mortal Homo. The units, whose blendings have given him size and shape, are experiencing a marvelous change. Suppose a form to be placed upon a scale before death, and to remain there until what is called "the spark of life" has fled, most assuredly there would be no perceptible difference in weight. The muscle, the bone, the blood, are there after death as they were before. Still something has happened. The units have no longer that expression of intelligence called sense, so we say life has departed. There is energy, intelligence, substance present, but the power they once wielded to hold that form together is now devoted to taking it apart, and we know that, whatever the art of the embalmer, there will never again be a manifestation of the old life. Something that was lord and master, guide and director of that form has, like the Arab, folded its tent and stolen silently away. But we notice that with all its power, that "something" had no weight. In other words, the earth had no claim upon it. The form weighs precisely the same without it. Yet that something was really all of the personality we loved. It was dictator to the form, and perhaps had exhibited intellectual brilliancy. As soon as it fled, the form itself commenced to change, and became dangerous to the well being of the survivors. It must be buried or cremated lest those left behind become sick and die.

We perceive that the something that fled was the real man, and necessarily composed of units, because Cosmos has nothing else by which to express form and intelligence. Mingling with other units in the old form, that "something" was the cause of the sensation and consciousness which we call Homo. It was manhood, pervading the form we see, and hear, and handle, and was compelled to manifest according to the shape of certain organs, which are now all left behind, but absolutely helpless.

So manhood was always without weight. There was nothing to it for us save its appearance through form. Every sense by which we knew it belonged to form; but the sense organ is left behind—useless. But manhood without its memories and experiences would be a nonentity. We behold something of their expression through form in earth life. But memory and experience are without weight. The physicist cannot handle them, or the chemist analyze them. So we perceive that, like the intellectual brilliancy, their manifestation to us depended upon certain form organs. Therefore we count them as included in the something which has fled. The materialist would say "subsided" instead of fled. He says life is a pervading principle of mortal form. Like the power from coal, he tells us it changes its expression, leaving ashes and nothing more. This difference of opinion is thus reduced to a question of fact, and therefore in itself becomes a proper question for scientific investigation. The question to be settled is, can the existence of the "something" after death be proved?

Throughout the ages the immortality of man has always been a matter of faith. Can we now make it a matter of knowledge? If so proved, it is not every one can learn the lesson. We cannot make the blind see, or the deaf hear. The evidence we would present demands organs capable of receiving it. We notice that scientists are, from time to time, inventing new instruments. The instruments of to-day—we will call them normal—will not answer their purposes. Instruments more delicate must be invented—progress would cease. The ordinary telegraph sounder would be useless to Marconi when he strives to talk, man to man, without a wire.

Intercourse between mortals has been dependent upon certain vibrations expressed through atmosphere and metal. By thought power we excite sense organs. By thought we create and receive certain vibrations. Their interpretation constitutes intelligent intercourse between man and man. When "something" fled the old form, he left his instruments behind. We may wield them as we choose, but they are silent. We weep because we can no longer reach the "something" we loved. Then to intelligent man comes the question, can we invent or discover new and more delicate instruments? Is wireless communication possible between the "something" which has fled and the form which remains behind? The quest is the most important that concerns humanity, for presently the "something" in each of us will also disappear.

It is true that when man invents an instrument that will respond to thought he will have rendered intercourse possible between the living and the dead. That instrument has yet to be invented. Yet further, when we would seek communication with a "something," which has fled, we have to enter the realm of our own "something," that is to say, of our own aural existence outside or inside the form life of to-day. Therein is the realm of the subconsciousness with all that it implies, and unfortunately with all that it suggests. We have no other instrument by which communication between "now" and "then" becomes possible.

Our friend has passed into his own hereafter. Certain mortals are so constituted that their own "hereafter," which we call subconsciousness, is nearer to the surface than in normal life. It makes contact with daily life. It must be hereafter to hereafter, or if we please, subconsciousness to subconsciousness every time. In other words, that "something" which will leave my form when I die is at this very time a marvelously delicate instrument by which communication between spirit and mortal is possible.

Like psychometric sensitiveness only a few of us have this power of touch with the unseen. But as there is no other possible contact, the instrument must be found, or mortal and spirit will remain silent to each other. So when the critic of "spirit return" offers subconsciousness as a refutation of such phenomena, he is like the man who would deny a message from a friend at a distance because it required a wire, and a battery and a sounder before the thought could travel. But when the critic proceeds to show us, and proves the weakness of the subconscious faculty, he is doing us good service, for therein is the cloud which rests upon spirit return. He is simply pointing out the difficulties which constitute so much of a barrier between our own aural intelligence and that manifesting through our mortal brain.

We need to realize that the "something" within our personality, which will one day leave the mortal form, is in actual existence now. It is in contact now with the "somethings" that have broken loose from earth. It is having experiences now, and recording memories at this moment in that inner life. But when we call upon it to report to mortal brain, we discover that echo between the two centers of intelligence is confused and indistinct.

This must be so. In earth life the apparatus for communications between mortal and mortal must be alike at both ends. Subconsciousness wields an instrument whose form and construction are unknown to us. It is claimed that that instrument is woefully subject to suggestion. That only means that the mortal does not yet know how to use it. It is all right if he would let it alone, or run it just as it is. Take the interesting case of spirit return through Mrs. Piper, as reported by S. P. R. The spirit visitor gives a name which is correct. He is, however, told by the mortal that the name given is wrong, and should have been a different one. This is at once accepted by the spirit, who thereafter uses the wrong name. The suggestion and the error was at the mortal end of that wire, but it shows the delicacy of the intercourse, and the vast difference between the instruments used by a mortal and a spirit.

It seems as if only spirits very close to earth life could reach any mortal form directly; and even then such a form must be much more sensitive than that of the average mortal. The carefully recorded experiments through Mrs. Piper, by the experienced officers of the S. P. R., give an insight into the difficulty experienced by a returning spirit who has not become familiarized to the use of the mortal instrument.

The form of the sensitive mortal appears to the spirit as a hollow shell, with light spots here and there. To use a peculiar but apparently correct expression, the spirit visitor thinks at these spots. He does not know at first whether he has succeeded in hitting one of them; and has no idea whether his thought is expressing itself through hand, or eye or tongue, or by some still grosser physical entrance into earth life. Several such spirit visitors may thus be using very different portions of a sensitive mortal organism, and at the same time be unconscious of each other's presence. This is, apparently, without any mental interference one with the other. This seems to prove that neither of the controls is making use of the medium's brain, at least in their experiences through Mrs. Piper, as recorded so faithfully in the published proceedings of the S. P. R. It is the exact report, the minutiae of these details, which constitutes their value to the student, who will learn from them many a lesson that has passed unnoted by the enthusiastic Spiritualist. But these careful studies in spirit return prove above all else that there remains an "awful gap" between spirit and mortal. Both are personalities built up of blended units, but their thoughts flash amid such different vibrations that transmitter and receiver can do little but suggest a message.

Let us keep to facts, and remain independent of all sentiment in our study of this intercourse. We have noted in previous chapters the marked effect of suggestion upon mortal mind; and we have just recorded its equally marked effect upon spirit. We have seen that the intelligence of every mortal man is expressed outward into aura during his earth life. But the shape of aura is unknown, save that it cannot be that of the mortal Homo. Further, when Homo leaves his mortal form to disintegrate, it is his aura which then represents his manhood. Yet, at the present time, he is also occupying this aura, of whose shape we know nothing at all save that it is not in the form of mortal man. If the spirit who was a mortal yesterday comes back to-morrow he must wear his aura, for his old form has passed from his use forever.

So far we are confining ourselves to facts that are logical, and can hardly be disputed. That spirit expressing itself in aura may be, and most likely is in easy contact with the aura of the mortal, but that is not much help to the exchange of intelligence we are seeking, for very few mortals seem to realize they possess an aura, and none but the very sensitive ever utilize it in earth life.

Now let us watch the effect of the fact that a returning spirit can only come back as an aura. The word "spirit" or "ghost" would do just as well, but both words have so long been used to express form that, for our present study we prefer the term aura. The first effort of the visitor is to produce an effect upon mortal sense. He can only succeed by vibration. There is no other way. And unless that very vibration has been experienced before, and recorded as memory in the mortal's brain, it cannot be interpreted. We are receiving vibrations from all over the universe every moment. We pass them unrecognized until once interpreted. The student of Nature is perpetually interpreting sights, sounds and sensations of which the average man does not dream. But that is because he has learned to interpret them by his own experience, and as an echo of his own past. Therefore if spirit aura succeed in impressing any mortal sufficiently sensitive it will assume the accustomed form to his mind. The customary shape of Homo will be pictured as that of his visitor. As soon as intelligence becomes manifested, however feebly, this innate suggestion becomes still more powerful. If a word or two suggests an echo of a loved friend, the form of that friend is pictured as he remembers it, and therefore by no two mortals exactly alike.

The student perceives that whatever may be the existing form of the aural visitor it must take shape as Homo to mortal mind. It will thus be pictured as in childhood or old age, as in vigor or feebleness, and be remembered in sex so fast as anything is said or done by the visitor to arouse the suggestion. We are supposing now that the visitor is really the one suggested to Homo. Our query is as to how much the mortal can really know about him; and we have already discovered that if his form be changed after death no expression of such a fact would reach the mind of mortal Homo.

Our visitor was a citizen of our life yesterday. He is a citizen of another life a few hours later. That he retains his old affections is reasonably certain, or he would not attempt to come back. We have often sad proof that he retains also his passions, and would willingly indulge them by first suggesting them to mortal mind and then experiencing the effect. But something higher and nobler seems suggested when we find returning spirits, with apparently vast experience of the inner life, coming back with no apparent motive save to bless their earth brethren. Whatever the instrument they use, and however imperfect or contradictory the interpretation of their teachings, the general fact is apparent that they are unselfishly attempting to lift mortals to a higher level. And in doing this they have to accept all the consequences of imperfect suggestions, and erroneous interpretation of the vibrations along which their thoughts are flashed to mortal sense. But it is most rational to suppose that such spirits can very rarely approach directly the mortal form of Homo. They must be too far removed from the possibility of any direct interchange of thought. It is here that the aural center of Homo's intelligence comes into play, as nearest to the center of intelligence of the spirit visitor.

We here face serious complications. If the spirit visitor has passed on from one aural experience to another, through, perhaps, many aural forms, he may be as far from possible direct exchange of thought with aural Homo as aural Homo is from mortal brain. That being so his thought must be flashed to intermediates, and by them suggested down into aural Homo. There we meet our same old difficulty which is that mortal Homo is, at best, but in very imperfect communication with his own inner manhood.

When the visitor is himself in direct relation with aural Homo there is no necessity for any go-between. But the difficulty of direct interpretation remains the same as ever.

Yet again, when the visitor is nearly on the level of the mortal, and comes in direct contact with mortal sense, there is, as we have seen, no other inlet to communication save by vibration, induced by thought, which will be interpreted according to the experience of the recipient.

It is now evident we must study many details of the phenomena by which spirit return is assumed to be proved and the possible identity of the visitor reasonably established. Until this is done we shall remain uncertain as to the extent and verity of communication possible between the two worlds.

BEWARE OF BLINDNESS

Failing Eyesight, Cataracts and All Imperfections of the Eyes Should Have Immediate Attention.

Dr. F. Geo. Curts, America's greatest scientist, has perfected a method whereby Cataracts, Granulated Lids, Blindness, or any other imperfection of the eye can be cured at home, as his Mild Medicine Method is self administered by the patient. The sixteen year old daughter of S. T. Robinson, of Cornlog, Iowa, was born with cataracts on both eyes; was at school for the blind. Cured in four months. Joseph Wilson, a prominent citizen of Leavenworth, Kansas, was cross eyed for forty years. His eyes were straightened by Dr. Curts in one minute's time. Wm. M. McDowell, Hill City, Graham County, Kansas, was cured of blindness. Geo. Sheln, Wauken, Iowa, cured of cataracts. If you are in any way afflicted with eye trouble, or have a friend afflicted, do not delay, write to-day and receive absolutely free, Dr. Curts' treatise on the eye. It tells you how life many wonderful cures are made; also much valuable information.

THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE.

A VERY IMPORTANT WORK.

The Spiritual Significance is by Lilian Whiting, author of "The World Beautiful," "After Her Death," "Kate Field, A Record," "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning," Cloth, $1.00.

Miss Whiting finds the title of her new book in these lines from "Aurora Leigh:"

"If a man could feel
Not one, but every day, feast, fast, and working-day,
The spiritual significance burn through
The hieroglyphic of material shows,
Henceforward he would paint the globe with wings."

The aim of this book is to reveal the curiously close correspondence between the developments of modern science and spiritual laws; to note that new forces, as discovered and applied in wireless telegraphy, are simply laws of an unseen realm into which humanity is rapidly advancing and thus gaining a new environment. From this evolutionary progress, as illustrated by physical science the author of "The World Beautiful" continues the same argument presented in those volumes in a plea that the future life is the continuation and development of our present life in all its faculties and powers, and that the present may be ennobled by the constant sense of the Divine Presence, and a truer knowledge of the nature of man and his relations to God tend to a higher morality and increasing happiness. The book is characterized by the same essential style and qualities that have insured for "The World Beautiful" volumes an almost world-wide popularity.

THE GODLESS AND DEVILLESS CLUB.

If there had never been a God so thoroughly engrafted into human nature, there would never have been any persecution for opinion's sake.

If there never had been a God registered in the multifarious religions of ages, there never would have been the cruel, remorseless, hateful Inquisition instituted by the Romish church.

If there had never been a God at the head of the various religious sects, there would never have been a St. Bartholomew's massacre.

If God had not been a dominant feature of the Puritan Fathers, there would have been no hanging of witches at Salem.

If God had been banished from the minds of men, the pestiferous Blue Laws of Connecticut would never have been enacted.

If no God to bolster up iniquity, there never would have been any religious wars to deluge the world with blood, devastation and ruin.

If no God to bow down to in servile submission, Galileo would never have had to recant an axiomatic truth, and thus for a long time make a consummate dunce of himself.

If no God, the war of the Crusades would never have polluted history.

If no God located somewhere on an imaginary throne giving his edicts to semi-idiots, there never would have been any burning of heretics.

If no God to ordain this or that, Roger Williams would never have been banished, and a man would not have been fined for kissing his wife on Sunday.

If no fictitious God to beget an illy-ballanced Jesus, such a foolish act as cursing a fig tree would never have been enacted.

If there had been no God-fearing Guiteau, President Garfield would never have been assassinated. If no God-loving Catholic Booth, President Lincoln would never have been cruelly murdered.

If no partisan God, the Catholics would not try to destroy our present grand school system. France to-day is pinioned by the God-loving, but merciless Catholics who would strangle liberty.

If no God sitting on a mythical throne, with ignorant fishermen and others to furnish a Bible authority for poor mortals, there never would have been millions of colored people reduced to cruel, abject slavery in this country, resulting in a civil war that shook, as it were, the very foundation of the earth.

If there had been no God there would not have been Sixteen Crucified Saviors, so graphically depicted by Kersey Graves.

If there had been an honest God, Col. R. G. Ingersoll would have been elected Governor of Illinois and afterwards made President of the United States.

To rely upon a God causes one to lose self-reliance, self-exertion becomes weakened, and respect for manhood diminishes.

If God made a single thing on this earth, whether a flea or a man, then he made ALL things, or another Creator steps to the front. If he made all things, what part do poisonous reptiles and insects, and disease-bearing germs play in the economy of creation? If God made all things, why not praise him for creating rats that bear within them the seeds of the Bubonic plague in the infected districts of India? If afflictions emanate from him, why not rejoice and be exceedingly glad when they come.

These were some of the thoughts presented by the prominent members of the Godless and Devilless Club at its session on last Thursday evening. It was then that Col. Holliday, a retired lawyer, asked to be heard. He is one of the original members who conceived the idea of organizing the Godless and Devilless Club. As a Christian he believed in the existence of a God and a cloven-footed Devil, and his prayers were beautiful specimens—classical, poetical, pathetic, logical, and vibrant with the tender emotions of love that can only emanate from an honest heart. His wife, beautiful and accomplished, passed to the realms of soul in spite of his tender entreaties to heaven, and after that sorrowful event he never uttered a single prayer, but conceived the idea of a Godless and Devilless Club which is now bursting forth in full fruition, and is bound to succeed in all reformatory work. The Colonel then led a little girl to the President, saying, "Here is a beloved offering dedicated to the Godless and Devilless Club—a beautiful orphan, scintillating with all that is lovely, a gem on the infinite ocean of life, to be polished with careful training and made as nearly possible the perfect woman." The President folded her affectionately in his arms, kissed her and caressed her, saying, "Here is a specimen of the grand work being accomplished by the Godless and Devilless Club. All the members of the Club who are worth $5,000 each are compelled by our constitution and by-laws to adopt some homeless waif—a boy or a girl—and so educate them that they develop into useful men and women. In some sense this lovely little girl becomes a sacred charge of the Club, all feeling a deep and abiding interest in her present and future welfare. Church members rarely adopt, educate and care for a homeless child. They will utter fervent prayers for them, they will pray to their God in stentorian words, to care for them while they will let them starve, or huddle them together in orphan asylums where they do not receive the home care they are entitled to. If the aristocratic churches were as far advanced in humanitarianism as the Godless and Devilless Club is, there would not be a homeless waif in the whole United States. Instead of being herded together like sheep in the various orphan asylums, each one would have a father's care and a mother's tender love, developing all the graces of life in the home circles. It is incumbent on all our members who are worth $5,000 each to do as Col. Holliday has done—adopt, educate and tenderly rear a homeless child. Every child born, whether it be in a palatial residence, in the palace of a President, King, Emperor, or Queen, or in the home of the poorest peasant on earth—whether begotten in love or lust, is the result of the working of law—of the law of the Infinite—the Infinite that never had a beginning—the cosmic forces of the universe in all their multifarious actions! The Godless and Devilless Club, having no God to worship, and no Devil to fear, requires its members to act the part of good Samaritans every day. They do not worship any Savior, for they are all Saviors themselves, doing for others some act of kindness, speaking a word that cheers, and pointing out the true pathway of life that leads to a golden harvest, to realms of perennial peace, happiness and joy. Col. Holliday, the grand old veteran, whose heart is a bubbling spring of Goodness that flows out as sweet and melodious as the lullaby of a mother crooning her child to sleep, is the Savior of this darling little girl who comes among the denizens of earth in accordance with immutable law, and is entitled to a place and home among them. Christian Scientists worth $5,000 each were too busy in proving the existence of a God, and in trying to demonstrate that there is no such thing as disease or matter, to take in their homes an orphan child, hence it was left for the Godless and Devilless Club to do what others had failed in doing. Col. Holliday stands forth like a magnificent tree bearing rich fruitage all the time, and the world will be the better for his having lived in it. In the name of Truth, Justice, Right, Virtue, Honesty, and Love, we christen this lovely child as the daughter of the Club."

Thus you will see that the Godless and Devilless Club is moving along new lines, and if its methods could be enforced among the people there would not be a homeless orphan in all this broad land, and sin and misery would be banished from the earth, and the Godless and Devilless Club would shape the destinies of the world.

HIGH SCRIBE.

LISBETH.

An Interesting Story of Two Worlds.

Elevating, Fascinating, Instructive Throughout.

This work by Carrie E. S. Twing is exceptionally interesting. She well says: "These characters which have brought out the highest and lowest in different religious beliefs, have moved me, not I them." The whole book is interesting, fascinating, and instructive. Price $1.00.

Self Contradictions of the Bible.
One hundred and forty-four propositions, theological, moral, historical and speculative; each proved affirmatively and negatively by quotations from Scripture, without comment. Price, 15 cents.

LIFE OF THOMAS PAINE.
By the Editor of the National, with Preface and Notes by Peter Eckler. Illustrated with views of the old Paine Homestead and Paine Monument, at New Rochelle; also portraits of Thomas Clio Rickman, Joel Barlow, Mary Wolstonecraft, Madame Roland, Condorce, Brissot, and the most prominent of Paine's friends in Europe and America. Cloth, 75 cents.

VEDANTA PHILOSOPHY.

Lectures by the Swami Vivekananda, on Raja Yoga; or Conquering the Internal Nature, and other subjects; also, Patanjali's Yoga Aphorisms, with commentaries and a copious glossary of Sanskrit terms. Revised and enlarged. 12mo., Cloth. $1.50. Raja Yoga is an ancient system of Indian Philosophy, and one of the four chief methods that the Vedanta Philosophy offers to obtain freedom and perfection. Swami Vivekananda became a familiar figure in several American cities during the three years following the Parliament of Religions at Chicago; he was cordially received in America, where the breadth and depth of his teachings were soon recognized. His teachings are universal in their application. The book is cheap at $1.50. For sale at this office.

Discovery of a Lost Trail

BY CHARLES B. NEWCOMB,

Author of "All's Right with the World." Cloth 270 pages. Mr. Newcomb made a distinct success with "All's Right with the World," which continues in the front rank of the Metaphysical books that are now so popular. The great number who have been cheered and strengthened by him will welcome another book by the wise teacher whose words of help are doing so much to make the world better by making men and women better able to understand and enjoy it.

"Discovery of a Lost Trail"

is a simple study of that strange and beautiful thing called life, but grand in its supremely simplicity. It will be in demand by many who have not previously read metaphysical writings. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

A STRANGE EXPERIENCE.

How a Family Was Made Happy.

It was Christmas eve, clear and cold, with a keen, cutting wind blowing that made the bare old oaks at the side of the house "wring their hands" in the icy air and cast weird, fantastic shadows on the frozen ground. It was a night to make one appreciate his own fireside, a night for cozy comfort and joyous anticipations for the happy; a night for brooding and retrospection for the lonely.

I sat alone in front of a glowing grate fire in the back parlor which served as library and sitting-room for my two brothers and myself. The family had long since retired for the night, my brothers to their respective chambers, and our only servant, a tidy and respectful young woman, whom our mother had taken some years before her death, a poor waif from the street, and made of her a model of household thrift and neatness, and who after the careful, painstaking mother had laid down her cares and her burdens, had proved a friend and comforter as well as servant to us in the darkest days our lives had ever known; for our mother, although frail and delicate-loking, had been to us a tower of strength.

Deprived by sudden death in our infancy of a loving father, of whom I, the oldest, had only a dim recollection, we had been so tenderly nurtured, the thorns had been so carefully removed from our pathway, we had met with such loving sympathy in the small crosses of childhood, such patient help in our youthful endeavors; with such proud and affectionate appreciation in our successes, that we had never missed the strong arm, the clear head, the warm heart, the self-reliant and genial nature of the parent of whose virtues we only knew from the lips of our mother.

I, as the oldest child and only daughter, was my mother's constant companion and her loss was to me like the loss of the better half of my being. Only for the charge, solemn and oft-repeated, that my mother had given me, even in the days before her health began to fail, to be, should it be our fates to be bereft of her care, both mother and sister to my younger brothers, I think I should have died from sheer inability to make an effort to live. On the eve of this anniversary, which is, perhaps, the saddest in all the year to those who sit and listen to the chimes of memory's bells, "sending down through the silent corridors of many years their solemn voices," I sat looking backward through the dim vista of days that were dead. The Christmas festivities of childhood came vividly before me. The days of preparation by the loving mother's hands, assisted by Susan, the maid; the mystery of the closed room, which held in silence and darkness the tree which was to burst on our childish vision, refulgent with light, brilliant with glittering ornaments and gifts simple, but satisfying to our childish desires.

Then the little feast which came later in the evening, to which we sat down with a few dear and true friends, and never was a banquet more enjoyed than our Christmas eve festival. Never during my mother's life had I fully realized her devotion to us, nor the extent of her sacrifice; the plainness of her attire, the absence of all ornament from her dress the strictness of her personal economies that we might make as fair an appearance as our young companions, every incident of our free and happy life in the dear old home, which we had left a few years since, came before me this evening with such vividness that I could scarcely realize my surroundings.

The leaving of our old home was a severe blow to my mother. It had seemed that every fibre of her being had clung to its walls, and like the vine which we tore down and bore away with us, she, too, pined and died. Here the deepest experiences of life had come to her. The mysteries of birth and of death had hallowed its rooms. Associations of the purest joy and deepest sorrow clustered around its hearth-stone; but ties were broken, farewells said, and our household gods were set up in a new place.

An unjust and cruel will had given our beloved home into other hands. Our grandfather, a stern and eccentric old man, had in consequence of an old feud between the two families, been displeased with my father's marriage to my mother. He had threatened to disinherit his son, but had finally left the homestead to him during his life, at his death to go to a distant cousin, the nearest of kin, then living abroad. For years after my father's death the heir was not heard from, but, to our sorrow and despair, he at length came forward and claimed the homestead. My father had always been positive that there had been a later will, and had searched every nook and corner, of which there were many in the stately old mansion, in vain.

As I sat pondering over these events and sadly contrasting the present with the past, I heard the clock in the hall strike one. I rose hastily, startled by the lateness of the hour. As I was about turning to leave the room, some invisible and indescribable power took possession of my whole being. I was entirely conscious of all around me, yet I moved by the volition of another. I saw with another's eyes. I spoke with another's voice, and that other, my mother!

"My child, oh, my child," she said, "I am here. I still live. I still love you." Then walking through the parlors, I, or she, with my organs, looked at familiar objects, drew aside the curtains and looked into the street below. Such a strange sensation of one's body being taken possession of! I cannot describe it. "It is, it is," she said in a plaintive voice, "it is home, see, all the same;" then gliding quietly up the stairs, she—I—which shall I say?—went to my brothers' beds, first one, then the other, touched them gently, imprinted soft, light kisses on their brows, clasped her hands, seemed loth to leave them, looked longingly, lovingly at every object in the room, at last turned and swiftly glided down the stairs.

Seated again in my chair by the expiring fire, my mother with my hands patted my face, my head, my neck. I felt an ineffable love embracing my whole being.

"My child, my child," she said, "you have been faithful and true; look on Christmas morning for the gift which I bring to you and my dear boys."

The influence left me as suddenly as it came. I was alone, feeling chilled and slightly dazed and weak. I went quickly to my room, threw myself without undressing, on the bed, drew a blanket over me and almost instantly fell asleep.

I awoke to find the bright sunlight streaming through my curtains. I was at first astonished to find myself dressed, then the thought of the singular experience of the night before came to me. I sprang up, went to my bureau to begin my morning toilet; there before me lay a large, legal-looking paper, rather yellow and stained. I opened it. It was the will our father had so long vainly sought, and which gave to him and his heirs forever the old homestead and the surrounding acres. My brothers and I were as happy on that morning as it was possible to be without the dear presence that had been the guiding star of our lives.

My tale is ended. Reader, I wish you as merry a Christmas as was ours on that eventful morn.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

Bear in mind that all notices for this page are cut down to suit the space we have to occupy when received.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Henry Lynch writes from Toledo, Ohio: "It gives me pleasure to announce that the cause of Spiritualism is prospering to a high degree in this city. During December the rostrum of the Independent Association of Spiritualists was occupied by the prominent trance speaker, Mr. Oscar A. Edgerly. This is the third time that he has served our society for one month, and it is the unanimous opinion of our people that we never have had more eloquent instruction and inspiring discourses delivered from our platform than are those given by his guide. His test work is also highly appreciated. Mr. Edgerly goes from us to Toronto, Canada, where he is engaged for the month of January. We congratulate the Toronto society in having secured so able an exponent of our philosophy."

Lecture course by Mr. John W Ring, speaker of the Spiritualist Society, 1921 Market street, Galveston, Texas. Wednesday, December 25, 1901, at 7:45 p. m., "Jesus—Man, Medium, Christ." Friday, January 17, 1902, at 7:45 p. m., "The True Spiritual Basis of the Religion of Jesus Christ is Identical with the Fundamental Teachings of Modern Spiritualism."

"Unity" writes from Milwaukee, Wis.: "Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley, who was under engagement of the Unity for three months, has been engaged to remain with us for the month of January. We have learned to become more fond of her the longer she remains with us, and the readings that have been given through her have been of the most interesting nature and very instructive. It is not often that we have had a person that could not only give satisfactory lectures, but tests, which in my opinion is the stepping-stone to this wonderful revelation, and new faces are constantly appearing and we hope in time to have a church. On Sunday evening, the 22d of December, we listened to a most interesting lecture from the father of Mr. Cooley, giving his experience for the five years past, and to be told that 'Mars was inhabited,' to say nothing of what might follow regarding other planets, was wonderful to the writer, who is only one year old in the search for truth."

Mrs. E. Blake is serving the society at Grand Rapids, Mich. She can be addressed for engagements at 369 S. Division street.

On account of the serious illness of her daughter, whose transition is expected, Mrs. Steelman Nichols has closed her meetings at the Atheneum.

Henry H. Warner may be addressed at Eagle Grove, Iowa, until January 15. Would like engagements in Iowa and Nebraska, and en route to the Pacific Coast.

Max Hoffmann, of Chicago, is serving the Society of Spiritual Truth in Lincoln, Neb., as speaker and test medium, and is open for camp-meeting engagements for 1902, also societies in Iowa wishing engagements, please address until March 1, 231 S. 11th street, Lincoln, Neb.

In a lecture before the Medico-Legal society on Thursday night, Dr. Quackenbos, who is one of the leading hypnotists of the world, said he had actresses and clergymen as regular clients, and that one of the leading actresses of the country to-day, a young woman who bounded into fame at a jump, owes her success to the suggestions given her while under hypnotic influence, which caused her to forget her stage fright, and put all her genius into her play.—Chicago Tribune.

The Inter Ocean has the following special dispatch from Los Angeles, Cal.: "In the case of J. J. Bohn, a wealthy merchant of Chicago, who is suing to obtain possession of his minor children now held by his wife in the Point Loma Theosophical Home, Mme. Katherine Tingley, who is connected with the home, was the chief witness to-day. Mme. Tingley told of the evil influence of Bohn and his mother over the wife and children. She declared that behind Bohn's suit was a widespread conspiracy against her institution, and she added: 'I believe the thread traces back into the heart of the Catholic church, and if it takes thousands of dollars and years to accomplish it, I shall ferret out this conspiracy.' Bohn on Saturday said that his home was broken up and his wife alienated by her devotion to theosophy. He had brought her to San Diego for her health, he said, and did not want her to enter the Theosophical institute with the children. Now he claimed his desire is simply to gain possession of the children, as he did not think the Point Loma institution was a fit place for them."

An attempt is being made by the National Spiritualists' Association to establish a society or branch in this city. In furtherance of this plan G. W. Kates, one of the association's trustees and a missionary medium, is here. President H. D. Barrett was to have come, but other business prevented. Last night Mr. Kates addressed a fair sized gathering in the Masonic building. He explained the views of the association. To-night he will give a public address in Room 5, of the same building. His subject will be "Soul of Things." As there are quite a number of Spiritualists in New Haven, it is probable that a society will be formed. —New Haven (Ct.) Palladium.

Andrew Scott writes: "I enjoy The Progressive Thinker very much; it never flags, but ever grows in interest. I hope you will give a symposium sometime on Christmas, its origin, antiquity and significance. It seems to me that that would be a very interesting subject for a symposium."

Frank T. Ripley has closed his engagement at Kalamazoo, Mich., and for the month of January he goes to the West Side Spiritual Church of Columbus, Ohio. He can be engaged for week evening lectures and to attend funerals. Address him in care of general delivery, Columbus, Ohio.

Several woodsmen employed at one of Charles Hebard & Son's camps on Traverse Bay, Mich., firmly believe the place to be haunted by a ghost, which is said to pay regular visits. Recently the apparition appeared and so frightened two of the men that they took to their heels through the woods and have not been seen at the camp since. Several of the more superstitious have refused to work longer at the place and have been transferred to another of the company's camps.

S. T. K. writes from Worcester, Mass.: "I wish to say a few words in regard to the ability of Mrs. Carrie F. Tabee. The People's Spiritualist Society found her a very bright medium. She spoke to a well filled house, and everyone was pleased with her and recognized her tests. Mrs. Ida Whitlock was our speaker last Sunday, and she also pleased a large audience with her very instructive lecture on Jesus the Christ."

The Chicago Inter Ocean says: "The story of Mrs. Dobson's first meeting with Dr. Beckwith's spirit embodies the discovery by her that she possessed the powers of a medium. While she was living in Kansas she fell and sustained a severe injury to one of her legs. The wound became inflamed and for a time it was feared that amputation would be necessary. 'The doctor who was attending me,' she says, 'was worried as to what to do, and while he was in this quandary there suddenly came to me, like a flash of lightning, a message that some one was going to talk to me. I seemed to lose consciousness, and while I was in this state Dr. Beckwith appeared. He said the spirit of my departed mother had seen my dangerous condition, and had pleaded with him to help me. He told me to give certain instructions to the attending physician, and when I recovered my outer consciousness I did so. He followed my instructions and I began recovering.' After this Mrs. Dobson says the spirit of Dr. Beckwith revealed itself to her almost constantly, and told her it had a most important communication to transmit. When she came to Chicago the spirit told her to summon Mr. Heafford."

W. F. Bellman, secretary of the S. S. A. of K., writes from 215 East Seventh street, Topeka, Kan.: "We would like to correspond with all active workers in the cause of Spiritualism in this State. There is much work for willing hands to do in advancing our grand and glorious cause. We must organize and work hand in hand to accomplish our purpose. We would like to hear from the secretaries of the different local societies and circles throughout the State of Kansas. To all who are interested in organization, we will help you in every possible way."

Max Hoffmann writes from 231 S. 11th street, Lincoln, Neb.: "I expect after the holidays I will be working east again in Iowa and Illinois. Any societies in those states wishing to engage a speaker and test medium, I would be pleased to hear from them. I am also open for engagements for camp-meetings for 1902, and can be addressed at Lincoln, Neb., 231 So 11th street, during the months of January, February and March. Our church, the Society of Spiritual Truth, of which I am the pastor at present, is doing good work and the interest in Spiritualism is increasing with each meeting."

Andrew Gee writes critically on the God Question. In the conclusion of his views he says: "Let us bury priestcraft, churchianity and creedism, its dogmas of superstition and prejudice, and cultivate the God within, and try to live up to the glorious teachings of the beautiful Nazarene by loving one another, and doing unto others as we would that others should do unto us, which is all the religion we need."

The students of Syracuse (N. Y.) university have taken up the fad of hypnotism, and several have become expert in making their fellow students do all sorts of funny "stunts." The experimenting was started by J. Richard Street, professor of psychology, who is a firm believer that hypnotism will come to be used legitimately in many useful ways. He taught his students how to hypnotize, and encouraged them in their experiments. At the Phi Kappa Psi fraternity house the boys perform in a manner highly amusing to spectators. The star hypnotist there is A. S. Hurrell, of the class of 1904, who is an expert hypnotist. He gave an exhibition before several people and succeeded in hypnotizing E. A. Lowther, 1902, and has his fellow student completely at his mercy. Hurrell says he can hypnotize anyone, but he does not dare to use his power on every one, as he is not sure of being able to awaken them from the hypnotic sleep. Prof. Street of the university thinks the art will be used in medicine and in other useful ways, and favors experimenting with it. Others of the students will not be experimented on, they say, for $10,000.

Mary A. Ingalls writes from 177 John street, Toronto, Canada: "A few words about the beautiful city of Toronto, situated in Canada, near the western extremity of Lake Ontario, may be of interest to some of your readers. Spiritualist meetings are held in four localities of this city each Sunday. One society secured the services of Prof. Lockwood during the months of October and November; this month, December, J. Clegg Wright is our speaker, and he is to be followed in January by Oscar Edgerly. Toronto has a population of 220,000. This city is noted for its colleges, universities, and other institutions of learning. We extend greetings of the New Year to The Progressive Thinker and its many readers, and feel confident that J. R. Francis will be blessed in 'basket and store,' for his untiring efforts in the upliftment of humanity."

A. C. Armstrong writes as follows to the Chicago Herald of the mediumship of his sister: "One control, a friend of mine when living, and a teacher of penmanship, so far excelled anything my sister could do that it helped to assure me of his identity. Others wrote with the left hand, and frequently while my sister would be conversing or reading aloud the writing would go on. Only her arm from the elbow down seemed to be affected by the controlling intelligence. She was also entranced, as was Mrs. Piper, and I could fill a Sunday edition of the Record-Herald with instances and evidences obtained in the privacy of our family circle during the year 1888 of the existence of conscious, invisible intelligences. They claimed to be the dead friends we had known and loved, and never failed to give any reasonable proof of their identity demanded. I would add in closing that my sister never made merchandise of her gifts; no amount of money would ever tempt her to do so, but owing to the separation of the family she has not been controlled even to write, for several years. But my experience with the unfolding of other psychic powers leads me to the same conclusions as your correspondent; 'That the power of communication only awaits development in every human being, and that the time must come when such power will be universally recognized.'"

Mrs. A. B. Whitney writes from Marshalltown, Iowa: "In Marshalltown we are now an organized body, and have obtained a charter of the State Association; and have started out under very auspicious conditions. Spiritualism in this city is no longer a homeless orphan, but has a home. The old Universalist church on Second street and Church, now shelters us, and we have for our pastor Mrs. H. C. Westlake, of the Pacific Coast. This lady is indeed an army in herself, being a splendid vocalist as well as an artist in instrumental music. Mrs. Westlake's generous nature and her marked devotion to the cause of Spiritualism has endeared her to her people; and we bespeak for her a successful and bounteous harvest."

By his declarations that he had exerted a hypnotic influence upon an ambitious young actress, with the result that she attained a high rank in her profession, Dr. John Duncan Quackenbos, professor emeritus at Columbia University has brought upon himself a deluge of criticism, much of it favorable and some of it of an unpleasant nature. To this Dr. Quackenbos says that he has become accustomed as a result of past experiences. He asserts that in most instances criticism is passed without a full understanding of the case. Dr. Quackenbos was discussing the nature of the communications received by Professor James H. Hyslop of Columbia University from Mrs. Leonora A. Piper when he related his experience with the actress who submitted herself to his hypnotic influence. In a statement Mrs. Piper confessed her ignorance of the influences that were at work upon her when she entered what appeared to be a trance state, but she expressed the opinion that that spirits were in no manner connected with the phenomenon. Dr. Quackenbos said that he spoke from experience derived from 2,000 hypnotic patients. "These subjects," said Dr. Quackenbos, explaining his methods, "sought my aid for almost every conceivable malady, mental and moral, some for ethico-spiritual, many for literary or dramatic inspiration. I have thus been brought into closest touch with the human soul, practically liberated in the hypnotic slumber from its entanglement with a perishable body. No injury has come to my mental or physical health as a result of unremitting work as a suggestionist, because I get something back from my patients, otherwise I would be a nervous bankrupt. The time has come when souls may know of each other without the intermediary of senses. I do not hesitate to say that we have within us an immedial principle entirely independent of sense organs. This fact cast light upon the principles of telepathic communication. Minds brought into hypnotic contact can exchange thoughts, ideas, convictions and feelings, which suggest the possibility that such minds may communicate without reference to space limitations. Absolute experiments have demonstrated that insects are capable of thought transference so far reaching as to impress their fellows miles away."—Chicago Record Herald.

J. Andy Wertz, advertising manager of the Indiana Spiritualist association, says that the camp-meeting at Camp Chesterfield the coming season will be conducted on entirely different lines from former meetings. There will be an attempt to retrench upon expenses and the luxury of a band for every day in the week will be dispensed with. The music last season cost the association nearly $1,000. The association has also learned that there is more money in letting privileges to the highest bidder than in attempting to run a dining-hall, ice cream parlors and supply store themselves, and they will dispose of all such privileges the coming season to the highest responsible bidders. At a recent meeting it was decided to build a new and commodious auditorium. The cost of the building is estimated at $6,000. The contract will be let the 2nd day of January. A committee appointed by President G. N. Hilligoss has recently been canvassing for donations for the new building and has received $1,000.—Muncie (Ind.) Star.

A. F. Hill writes from Boston, Mass.: "We need evidence of return of the dead as much now as ever in our powerful organization. Spiritualists should not set their mediums as targets for the ignorant. The mediums should be furnished with work, with an income so they may use their mediumship freely and be free to educate the masses. We need mediums for the more clear manifestations. Those who have the gift of speaking should not despise those who sing. The medium for raps should be honored as much as a college graduate who tells more about old theology than Spiritualism."

J. M. Holliday writes from Council Bluffs, Iowa: "The recently organized First Spiritualist Church of this city is holding public meetings regularly on Sunday evenings at Justice Reuben Bryant's office, and, on Tuesday evenings at Madam Kirsten Russell's residence. Mrs. Russell conducts the Sunday evening meetings. She gives fine satisfaction, both as a speaker and test medium. The Twentieth street and Avenue B meetings are well attended, with Mr. Witty, Mrs. Mary Bridges and Mrs. Fritz as mdiums."

Prof. Joseph J. Bartcher writes that the First Church of the Spiritual Science Union at 77 Thirty-first street, Dr. J. Q. Adams, president, held a very enjoyable sociable at No. 3111 Rhodes avenue, on the evening of Dec. 26. Several mediums as well as others participated in the proceedings, making the occasion one long to be remembered. The next sociable will be held on Thursday evening, Jan. 2, at the residence of Mrs. Dr. Ady De Lascau, 3031 Cottage Grove Ave.

G. W. Kates and wife, as missionaries of the N. S. A., want to hear from localities in Missouri for the month of April. They also ask for calls in Arkansas for last of March and possibly in May. Little Rock and Hot Springs should apply. Other places en route to and from Texas will be considered. Apply to them 600 Pennsylvania avenue S. E., Washington, D. C.

C. W. McCoy writes from Jackson, Mich.: "Mr. Knowles, of Grand Rapids, Mich., just closed a successful engagement for the Jackson Progressive Association."

Dr. George Dutton, secretary of the American Health University and Dutton Medical College of Chicago, is now located at the Oakland Hotel, Drexel Boulevard.

Dr. Juliet H. Severance will lecture for the Anthropological society at their Hall, Masonic Temple, on Sunday, January 5. Her subject will be "Dangers to American Liberty." The meetings of this society are free, as are the discussions following the lectures. The hall is pleasant, and meetings commence at 3 p. m.

G. W. Kates and wife will serve in Wheeling, W. Va., January 5 to 12. Address them accordingly, or at any time, 600 Pennsylvania avenue S. E., Washington, D. C.

A. M. G. Wheeler writes from Minneapolis, Minn.: "The People's Church of this city, over which I preside, is progressing nicely, and during the past two months we have made many converts to Spiritualism. Our meetings consist of lectures, tests and phenomena. I have been ably assisted by my sister, Miss Lillian Wheeler, also by local talent. We would like to hear from good mediums and speakers who would like engagements with our church. I would also like to hear from other societies desiring my services. Communications may be addressed to me at No. 74 Seventh street So."

Georgia Gladys Cooley has been re-engaged by Unity Society of Milwaukee, Wis., for the month of January, 1902. She will be in Peoria, Ill., for February, and Pittsburg, Pa., for March. Her address is 526 Milwaukee street, Milwaukee, Wis.

Alex Caird, M. D., of Lynn, Mass., has something to say of interest on our 8th page. For a long time the Doctor was a resident of this city. His wife, an excellent medium, was widely and favorably known here.

J. Q. Adams, president, writes: "The Spiritual Science Church, 77 Thirty-first street, near Cottage Grove avenue, has every comfort and convenience. Conference and tests, 3 to 5 p. m. Free Lunch and social, 5 to 7 p. m., at which time those from a distance, or who desire, can have a private reading from their choice of the mediums present. Lecture and psychic demonstrations, 7:45 p. m. We take subscriptions for The Progressive Thinker."

Mrs. Elizabeth J. Demorest, inspirational speaker and test medium, can be addressed for a short time at St. Charles Hotel, Williamsport, Pa.

E. W. Sprague and wife, the N. S. A. missionaries will be in Philadelphia, Pa., during the month of January. Parties within two hundred miles of that place can secure their services to organize societies, and to give lectures followed with tests and messages, by addressing them at 605 N. 7th street, Philadelphia, Pa. They are engaged to serve the Michigan State Association at their convention to be held in Battle Creek, Mich., Feb. 7, 8, and 9. Parties in Michigan wishing our services to organize societies immediately after this convention should correspond with them at once as they will return to Indiana and Ohio after the Michigan meeting. Mail will be forwarded to them addressed to Rochester, Ind., Alliance, Ohio; or Jamestown, N. Y.

G. W. Kates and wife have had a very successful month during December, in Pittsburgh, Pa. Their lectures have been of much interest. The spirit messages and descriptions by Mrs. Kates have been clear and accurate.

A Seance in Leadville, Col.

The writer had the pleasure of sitting in a Spiritualistic circle at the home of Mr. Martin Turpin, the president of the Occult Society here, last Monday evening. He went to the seance for the purpose of really finding out for himself whether or not there was anything in Spiritualism.

The medium is a Mrs. M. Bartel, of Cripple Creek, Colo. There were quite a number of friends in the circle, very few of whom were Spiritualists. It was the intention of this writer to thoroughly investigate and if he found it a fraud, to expose it to the public. We went there believing that it was sleight-of-hand performance, watched every movement closely, and we want to say that the proceedings at this seance are beyond our comprehension. The medium stretched a dark piece of calico across one corner of the room enclosing a small triangular space. In this space a chair and on this chair was placed a tambourine, two small bells and a music box. The party formed a circle and joined hands, the medium sitting in the center in front of the curtain, and on one side the writer and on the other sat one of Leadville's representative business men, the medium having hold of the right and left hand of each gentleman respectively, the hands of these three being placed through the slits in the curtain. No sooner was this done than hands appeared through other slits in the curtain gently touching those in front of the curtain. There is no doubt about this—all the time the hands of the medium were firmly clasped over the hands of the gentlemen on either side. One of the party sat where he could see behind the curtain at all times, and he asserts that positively no one was behind that curtain. At one time the writer handed his handkerchief through the curtain and immediately stuck his head through the curtain to see what was on the other end of the hand, and it was gone—it had disappeared entirely.

A violin was handed through the curtain and delightful music was the result, still no one was there, neither could the violin be seen by those who could see every inch of space behind the curtain. The music box was wound up repeatedly, the noise of the winding being heard distinctly in all parts of the room, yet those who were not Spiritualists could see the music box while it was being wound and not a person behind the curtain. These things can not be explained. These are all facts and are supported by at least one dozen of Leadville's best citizens. The writer is now looking into Spiritualism, and will say that Mrs. M. Bartel is centainly a wonder of the age. Mrs. Bartel comes well recommended from other places where her work has given satisfaction.

FAITHFUL WORDS.

Officials of Spiritualist Societies.

I have lately noticed some statements from officials of Spiritualist societies, decrying fraud, dissipation and crudity. These should be not only deplored, but prevented by every Spiritualist organization to find expression in any platform worker. We should have clean, pure, true and cultured speakers and mediums. For one I would agree to a rule to bar out any one of us who occupy the platform, should we dissipate, commit fraud or be grossly ignorant and crude.

We need a censorship in this direction. But our societies welcome sensationalists, no matter what their character. Our Spiritualists patronize "mediums" and do not question their personal morals.

The Spiritualists too often seek for "the wonderful" rather than the spiritually cultured. We need a reform in society and official recognition and public offerings. We need ideals that will create a spiritual fraternity, rather than a society of wonder-mongers.

The illegitimate person is presenting Spiritualism in many localities rather than a legitimate worker who is known and can be endorsed. A letter at hand says their city is all torn up by a pair of mediums (well known for both the genuine and fraud manifestations) who are usually in a drunken condition.

The Spiritualists have flocked to the meetings and seances of these crude phenomenalists, and forsaken their organized society and its less sensational meetings. Thus are many Spiritualists crying aloud for honor and paying premiums unto dishonor.

And worse than all, is the fact that many officers of societies are immoral in their habits—but cry aloud against any medium or speaker who shall dare slightly err.

I plead for honorable living of our spiritual philosophy by every Spiritualist. And I say to these officials who dare rush in print with exactions and demands, set a watch upon your actions lest you shall be an official example of depravity.

We who occupy the platform are incessantly being told that certain officials of our societies are morally depraved, and our best friends will not ally with our cause until we place more representative people at the head of local effort.

Whilst the cleansing process is going on to relieve the platform of speakers and mediums who shall err against themselves, let the same kind of Sapolio be used upon our local, state and National officers, one and all, until we can stand before the world bearing the cynosure of all eyes in every department of our public life. Our first duty is unto ourself, before we condemn or criticize our fellow-Spiritualist.

We have many who are clean and true. Let these hold the front of effort, if possible—and refrain from any effort at all until we can secure honor and integrity. Kindly and hopefully,

GEORGE W. KATES.

LAKE HELEN CAMP, FLA.

Fifth and Sixth (Last) Excursions.

Many of the tourists who visit Lake Helen have already arrived. The hotel is filling up.

Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Bond have taken the Keenan cottage.

Mr. and Mrs. A. A. Butler and Mrs. Van Lieu are in the Apartment House.

The store has been moved to join the bakery.

Mrs. Dr. Brigham is now quite well.

The meeting begins Feb. 2. The speakers engaged thus far are J. Clegg Wright, W. F. Peck, Carrie E. S. Twing and Thomas C. Budington. Nellie Mosier has been engaged as platform test medium.

My fifth excursion by water will leave New York City, January 10.

My sixth and last excursion will leave New York City, January 24. I shall personally conduct this last excursion, and will render special assistance to any invalid who may wish to join this excursion.

We expect to arrive in Lake Helen, January 28. Write me for special low rates and information, enclosing four cents in postage stamps for postage on circulars, booklets, etc.

H. A. BUDINGTON.

Iowa State Spiritualists' Association.

The annual convention of the State Spiritualists' Association of Iowa will occur January 16-19, 1902, at Oskaloosa, Iowa. Every arrangement possible has been made that this meeting may be a success. Since our programs were printed, and some of them sent out, we have assurances that H. D. Barrett will be present during the entire convention. This announcement will of itself encourage our people to come and take part in the work. The Western Passenger Association has granted a rate for this meeting of a fare and a third for the round trip on the certificate plan. Tickets may be purchased three days before the opening of the meeting and will be good to return three days after its close. Each one should ask their agent for a certificate when they purchase their ticket. Mrs. McCoy and Mrs. Westlake are both with us and will present the phenomena in their usual faithful way.

Let all those who have the cause at heart make a special effort to be present; there is work to be done that will affect the future of Spiritualism throughout the entire state.

STELLA A. FISK,
Secretary S. S. A. of Iowa.

Southern Cassadaga.

Lake Helen, Florida, has had the following arrivals during last week: Mr. W. R. Alger, from Flint, Mich., Mrs. Dr. James Rhodes Buchanan, from Denver, Colo., and Mr. and Mrs. Bartholomew, from Buffalo, N. Y. (the well-known trumpet mediums).

Last Sunday we had quite a treat from the guides of Mrs. Grenameyer, from Cincinnati, O., who delivered a splendid lecture, invoking the higher powers to help all present in higher development, and urging all Spiritualists to invite the higher powers by building cabinets at home and spending there some time every day in prayer or silence, assuring them that what is prayed for, will be given as promised in the Bible.

Every Monday evening a progressive euclire party is arranged.

Christmas will be celebrated at Hotel Cassadaga and Hotel Webster.

Mr. Budington, agent of the Mallory Line, has sent word that quite a number are booked for Lake Helen for his excursion of December 27.

HYPNOTIC SCHOOL INVESTIGATED.

Mysteries of Personal Magnetism Laid Bare—Does Danger Lurk in Hypnotism?—Can These Sciences Be Taught by Mail?

Opinions of 81 Prominent Business Men and Scientists Who Have Taken a Course of Instructions—Some Astonishing Revelations.

EVERYBODY MAY NOW LEARN.

Owing to the widespread interest which has lately been manifested in schools of Personal Magnetism, Hypnotism, Magnetic Healing, etc., a reporter was assigned to investigate the New York Institute of Science of Rochester, N. Y., the largest school of its kind in the world, and to ascertain what practical benefits, if any, the students receive.

This Institute made a remarkable showing. That it actually teaches Scientific Hypnotism, Personal Magnetism, Magnetic Healing, etc., there can be no doubt. In a few days' study at home any intelligent person can, through its course, acquire the secret powers of the occult sciences and use them on his friends and associates entirely without their knowledge. Its course of instruction, prepared under the supervision of the noted hypnotist X. La Motte Sage, A. M., Ph. D., LL. D., was found to be exactly as represented—easy to learn and marvelously clear and complete. Over 50,000 students were enrolled last year.

From the letter files of the Institute one hundred names were taken at random. Letters were addressed to these persons, asking them to tell freely what they thought of the Institute and the benefits they had derived from the instruction. The replies received were a revelation. All had achieved success to a greater or less degree, and in many instances the results were simply astounding, almost beyond belief.

Extracts from the replies of six of the students are given herein without comment:—

Mr. Frank Muehl, Fairwater, Wis., writes: "I have thoroughly tested the practical value of Personal Magnetism and Hypnotism as expounded by the New York Institute of Science, and I am agreeably surprised at the results. This information is invaluable. I see life anew. Wonderful possibilities have been opened up to me."

M. B. Furry, No. 417 East 2d St., Wilmington, Del., writes: "I hypnotized a young man within three hours after receiving my first instruction. He could neither sing nor dance. I made him sing three coon songs and dance a regular buck dance—he thinking he was a stage performer."

Dr. Abbie Heath, 71 Dover St., Boston, Mass., writes: "By the information received from the New York Institute of Science I cured a Mr. Scott of the tobacco habit in two treatments. It is now six months since, and he cannot touch tobacco. I have used Hypnotism several times to control the excruciating pain of cancer and to eradicate pernicious habits in children."

Professor J. Ernest Trudel, Hedleyville, Quebec, Canada, writes: "Dr. Sage's wonderful course in Personal Magnetism and Hypnotism is the only work of its kind containing information that any person can readily learn and apply. It certainly reveals the secrets of personal influence; it develops in one a power, a force of character that I did not think it possible to acquire."

The New York Institute of Science has just issued one of the most remarkable books of the century, which treats in an intensely interesting manner of personal magnetism, hypnotism, magnetic healing, etc. During the next 30 days 10,000 copies of this book are to be given away. This great work contains the reported opinions of eighty-one persons who have tested these sciences. Among the number are fourteen College Presidents and Professors, eight Doctors, three Dentists, four Judges and Lawyers, four Society Leaders, twenty-eight Business Men, City Officials, Bank Presidents, besides twenty persons prominent in other walks of life. Altogether, we consider it to be the most valuable and wonderful work of the kind ever produced. This book has been the means of starting thousands of persons on the road to success. It may prove the turning point in your career. A copy of this book will be sent absolutely free to any one addressing the New York Instituto of Science, Department M K 9, Rochester, N. Y.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

Mrs. Melita W. Harrington passed to spirit life, from her home in Milford, Mass., Dec. 18, aged 80 years. She and her husband, Richard P. Harrington, who preceded her to spirit life, became acquainted with Spiritualism at the dawn of the movement, and were Spiritualists to the close of mortal life. Mrs. Harrington was a faithful wife, devoted mother, loving sister and true friend. Funeral services were held at the residence. The remains were taken taken to Mount Auburn, Cambridge, for cremation.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

Prophet: Q. I do not understand how spirits could so wickedly deceive Dr. Buchanan as they did in the prophecies he made about war and pestilence, earth convulsions, etc., not a single particular of which was fulfilled. There has been a constant repetition of similar prophecies from the earliest Bible times. Have any of such prophecies been fulfilled?

A. It would be vain to search for such fulfillment, yet it is not correct to infer that spirits deceived Dr. Buchanan. They were themselves deceived, for the Jeremiahs, who have wailed disaster in this life are not at once convinced that ruin will not take the place of order.

Nine years ago this very question of dolorous prophecy came up, and the following message was received in reply from Prof. William Denton:

Perhaps mankind has been caused more keen suffering from fear, induced by prophecies of evil than from any other source. The wails of Isaiah and Jeremiah have been repeated ever since their day, and the cheapest road to notoriety has been that of calamity prophet. For two thousand years the "end of the world" has been the stock in trade of the senseless ravens who have sat on the blasted tree of ignorance and cawed ominously of war, pestilence and famine. Trained by religious teachers in the pessimistic views of nature and impending judgment, the soil has been fruitful and the growth has been rank and overshadowing. There has been a periodical scare that has sent countless victims to the mad-house. The Millerite excitement is yet in memory. The speculations on the Bible prophecies were reduced to the cold figures of mathematics, and the date fixed to the year, day, and hour of the second advent of Christ. The figures were all right, but alas, the data on which they rested were inchoate utterances of mysticism, and did not admit of that kind of treatment.

Lieutenant Totten now occupies the unenviable position of calamity prophet, and his wails call attention because of the position he occupies. But were he a major-general instead of a lieutenant, when he predicts the end of the world from Biblical data, he is no greater authority than the most uncultured boor.

We say it understandingly and with emphasis that the publication of such calamity prophecies is not only injurious, but little short of a crime. And this brings us to the comet, whose coming was heralded by the newspapers with startling headlines and the usual accompaniment of the imminent danger that awaited the earth from a collision with the fiery messenger. The publication of such ideas is a disgrace to journalism. The evidence leads to the inference that the cosmic stuff of which comets are formed is incomparably attenuated, and were a collision possible no harm would come to the earth. But admitting that comets are solid bodies, they are governed by laws as unchangeable as those controlling the planets. They go out from the sun, it is true, in orbits so elliptical that they traverse almost straight lines into space at great angles to the planes of the planetary orbits, yet however far they go into the trackless expense they are held by the arm of law, and drawn back again at an appointed time. There is no blunder, no patching, or afterthought, and the perturbations and oscillations which appear at times as disturbing causes are the balancing of forces which thereby gain an adjustment and equilibrium.

The timid may enjoy the sublime spectacle of the strangely luminous mass with its streaming tail, sweeping on to the sun until it is lost in its rays, and they even may feel certain that it will emerge therefrom and depart on its journey of incomprehensible millions of miles.

Spiritualists may well have faith in the order of the world, as in the unalterable rising and setting of the sun. And gaze upon the sublime pageant of forces with the pleasure of knowledge that knows no fear.

John Smith, Donaldsonville: Q. What is the condition of a man in spirit life who was for many years before death insane? Would a child born three years previous to the decided appearance of insanity inherit a tendency to the same malady?

A. For a time, longer or shorter, the spirit would feel the impress of the body it had left, as is always true of all diseased conditions, but it will not be insane, and it will outgrow this impress or earthly shadow.

There are a multitude of causes of insanity. Sunstroke, a blow on the head, overwhelming grief or disappointment may obscure the mind, yet the physical condition immediately previous, would not be affected. Children born previously would not have any taint from conditions not active at their birth.

Heredity as applied to disease means organic weakness in certain directions. Thus it is not entertained that a child inherits consumption from its father or mother. But if the lungs of either or both, are weak, then their child will have weak lungs, and on exposure, as the weakest organs are first to fail, there will be congestion, and the soil prepared for the growth of the germs everywhere present, of that dread disease.

In like manner a child does not inherit insanity, but its heritage is a defective nervous system; a brain which receives too little or too much blood; an over-excitable disposition, and when an occasion comes, of physical stress, or mental shock, the blood may leave the brain in a state of collapse, or with every vein bursting and incoherence of madness take the place of that co-ordination of thoughts known as reason.

If such hereditary constitutional peculiarities exist, they would be transmitted before their presence was known as surely as afterwards. They may be transmitted and yet not appear, as an occasion to awaken them may not come in the lifetime. It is of frequent occurrence that the most strongly marked heredity appearance or characteristic passes over a generation, appearing in the next. A grandson usually resembles his grandfather more than his father, and where different races of mankind mingle, after several generations, when the blood on one side or the other appears weakened beyond recognition, a child will be born strongly reverting to the original type.

The most marked and irradicable hereditary insanity in both man and woman is along the line of passion. Its recurrence is at about the same age in life; it is the most difficult to treat, and the most hopeless. Children born to parents thus affected, may not be insane in the common meaning of that word, but they will prove uncertain in character; liable to fall when most depends on them; be erratic, flighty, and disappointing to their friends. In other words, they are constantly on the danger line, liable to be overwhelmed at any time.

Her Half-Century Mark.

A merry party assembled on Christmas evening at the home of the well-known psychic, Mrs. G. Partridge, 2576 Fulton street, the occasion being the celebration of her fiftieth birthday. A mere pleasant party could not well be imagined. The evening was passed in happy social converse and pleasant games, after which a dainty and most bountiful collation was served, and all went merry as a marriage-bell.

One novel feature of the evening was the serving of a "Scripture Cake," the recipe for which Mrs. Partridge read to the company. Here is the recipe:

4½ Cups of 1st Kings 4:22.
1½ Cups of Judges 5:25, last clause.
2 Cups of Jeremiah 6:20.
2 Cups of 1st Samuel 30:12.
2 Cups of Nahum 3:12.
1 Cup of Numbers 17:8.
½ Cup of Judges 4:19, last clause.
6 of Jeremiah 17:11.
2 Tablespoonfuls of 1st Sam. 14:25.
2 Teaspoonfuls of Amos 4:5.
Season to taste, 2nd Chronicles 9:9.
A pinch of Leviticus 2. 13.

Follow Solomon's prescription for making a good boy, Proverbs 23:11, and you will have a good cake.

In behalf of the guests, Dr. Wilkins surprised the hostess by reading the following original apropos poem:

Let us look around for others who were born on Christmas day,
For we may find many Saviors in a good and quiet way.
There can be no better Savior of a race of people here
Than a mother from whose spirit echo thoughts of love and cheer.

Were the thoughts of all the races
tinctured with a mother's love
There would be no use for Saviors in this world or spheres above.
There would be no wars of nations,
naught but peace and harmony;
As one family of people earth's inhabitants would be.

When a mother heart is tensioned to the welfare of her child,
All the world of hearts must vibrate till her heart is reconciled,
Tho', 'tis true, we may not notice just from whence love's motions came,
They are Saviors of all peoples of the universe the same.

There are mothers who at fifty seem afraid to tell their age
Lest the world should turn them over as a blank and useless page,
But we find one here among us who is at the fifty post,
And to her on Merry Christmas let us
all propose this toast:

"Here's to Jesus and this mother who on Christmas day were born;
Here's to all their deeds of kindness that were oft received with scorn.
True, this world without a Savior might have been a better plane,
But a world without a mother would have been but made in vain.

"Here's to her who now is fifty, young in spirit as of yore;
Here's to all her future pleasure should she live just fifty more;
Here's to her whose past has made her that which time will not unmake:
Just a mother to her children—let us
try her Scripture Cake."

The hours passed all too quickly as we were admonished that elevated trains have their schedule and the walking being bad, the company bid their pleasant hostess good night, with the earnest wish that she might be spared to round out another half century. W. C. HODGE.

OUR MID-WINTER CLIME.

Wondrous bright, green and fair
Is our mid-winter's perfumed air,
And the whisper of gentle breeze
Steals softly through the pepper trees;
Arching branches bend to meet
Mossy beds and violets sweet;
Emerald-gemmed lies the sod
Upward gazing unto God.

Azure depths' mirrored sheen,
Reflecting jets of twinkling green;
All the stars in their place,
Hold the mystery of Time and Space,
While the mountains lift their crests,
Like a dream their shadow rests,
And the ocean's blue waves of light
Radiant gleams at morn and night.

'Tis our summer, alway sweet,
Where earth and sky in wedlock meet,
And the roses red and white
Greet the lilies with delight;
All around on every side
The air proclaims the summer's tide
And from heaven's bending sky
Angel watchers hover nigh.

Dear Decemver, who shall say
You have lost your earth pathway,
And dropped upon us unawares
Wearing false and fickle airs?
In the beauty of thy face,
Artless innocence we can trace,
And our land now abloom
Has been rescued from winter's gloom,
And from out your plenteous hands
Comes the harvest of many lands.

Around about us in every place,
Show forms of beauty and tender
grace,
Where countless buds are gently nursed,
And by nature's jeweled hand disbursed,
And gives to our mid-winter clime
A look that seems one long summer time.
So comes her flower-wreathed smiling face,
Our sceptered queen in winter's place.

DEFENCE OF MEDIUMSHIP

And the Progress of Spiritualism.

For several years we have observed a class of people calling themselves Spiritualists who advocate "the exclusion of all forms of phenomena from the public platform." That is like playing Hamlet with Hamlet left out. What do they mean? Have they turned over to the enemy? or have they fundamentally changed and become converted to a new theory? How will they reconcile their present attitude with their former professions, in which they based their belief of a future life on knowledge derived from phenomena?

Modern Spiritualism was born in mediumship. Phenomena are its chief bulwark. We cannot consent to have them disappear, nor even become secondary. Mediumship cannot be regulated by human authority, but it may be limited in public exercise. Fraud may appear at times, but true mediumship can take care of itself if left upon its merits, and the truth will ever come uppermost.

The phenomena, philosophy, ethics can never be divorced from each other. Spiritualism without phenomena of the public platform will simply be on a par with other religious systems.

It is my opinion that one cause of the decadence in public meetings is the unpleasant and uninteresting things that are said in the meetings. It is the policy of some speakers to scold, or lament, underrate, belittle, abuse, discourage and use other hard language. People do not like to hear that kind of talk, and so stay away.

From that class of speakers we hear such expressions as "old Spiritualists wanting tests—test hunters—the show—craze for sights and wonders—fraud—morbid craving for spiritual tests." Such language is misleading. It is not always tests that all people are seeking. It may be spirit union and communion, the central idea of Spiritualism, interesting and important to the old, the middle-aged and the young. You may sneer, ridicule, abuse, yet spirit communion will always be interesting and acceptable to all classes, except such as the growlers and calamity howlers.

The mystery of the unknown and of the future life has been the most fascinating subject that ever engaged the human mind. Spirit communion is a part of religion, which we appreciate more than anything else, and it is a misnomer to call it "tests." We love to hear from our spirit friends; to contemplate the "sweet bye and bye" and the sweet now, and in all this we are not ready to admit that we are "the victims of delusion." If it is delusion, let us be deluded all the days of our mortal lives. No harm will come of it.

Mediums have got something pleasant and important to say. A good medium will draw a crowd of interested people in any community, while other speakers cannot, and this excites the jealousy or at least disapproval of the kickers. Why do they want mediums ruled out of the public meetings? Because, they say: "The old teachings with their wearisome reiteration have become stale." Like the "dog in the manger" these graduates are "tired of the show," and don't want anybody else to enjoy it. Why don't they stay out of "the show?"

Mediums are as true and honest as any other class of people, yet nearly every honest medium is under suspicion and many innocent ones are accused. It is high time to call a halt. This fault-finding, fraud-hunting, accusing and condemning is driving some of our finest mediums from the field. Enlightened Spiritualists have become educated to distinguish between the true and the false, so the trickster can make no headway among them. Much that has been said of mediums is slander and falsehood; for every public medium has been called a fraud by somebody. Mediumship is a thing to be highly prized, while fraud is a thing of short duration that will wear itself out. Good mediums never enter the fraud arena. I doubt if so much as ten per cent of public mediums in America are frauds. All honor to the torch-bearers of truth who hold high the lamp of inspiration and try to live the truth their inspired lips utter.

The outcry against fraud has done more harm than actual fraud. The declaimers against our cause would lead us to believe Spiritualism is going to ruin and disintegration. What has been said in the secular and religious press concerning frauds is but an echo of what has been said among Spiritualists. Many writers pass sentence of reproach, censure and even of infamy on many Spiritualists, and thereby do more harm than the things of which they complain. No frauds are worse than fraud-hunters who circulate slander, error and scandal. Thousands of true mediums have been discouraged by such vile imputations and have abandoned the fields of labor.

Spiritualists, enmasse, have been charged with aiding the practice of fraud in their ranks. The charge is false. No adverse criticism can ever shake the faith of the advanced Spiritualist. Those who are true will remain so, for they know they have the truth which can never perish.

Many people in the churches are Spiritualists, who have their own mediums, thousands of them, unknown to the world. A person is none the less a Spiritualist because she or he may be a church member. Many converts have been made through non-professional media in the quiet family circle in all classes of society; and thus the fact of spirit existence has been demonstrated to a great number. It is better to know the fact by spirit communication than rely on it by faith alone; for in this way faith and hope have a reasonable foundation to rest upon.

Old theology dies hard; but die it must, for Spiritualism has come to take its place to give the world an inspired religion of much greater value. It originated in the spirit world, and there are no gods or devils attached to it. The advanced thought it is proclaiming to the world is gaining strength all the time, and the clergy are appropriating its thunder.

Since spirits first announced their presence and proclaimed that all humanity shall have homes, attain happiness and live forever, the Devil began to lose his power and the gods have been rejected and abandoned. Theology teaches blood atonement and pardon of sin. Spirits teach self atonement, and no pardon except by paying the penalty in suffering.

Spiritualism is not declining—it is a living vital truth that can never be crushed. With its foundation in nature and truth it will continue its mission, giving light and hope to the sorrowing and dispelling the clouds of darkness which ancient errors have cast over humanity. Every day it grows stronger, penetrating its way into every walk in life. This is no special revelation—the door is open to all, and all may be convinced that the spirit world is near by and that communication with spirits is a fact.

Spiritualism means peace on earth, good will to man, and stands for a living evidence of future life. It will sing its silent song to every true heart and gladly come to every child of earth who is willing and ready to receive it. With the angelic powers which are its inspiration it will overcome opposition and enthrone itself in the hearts of humanity. It holds the living principles of ever-expansive philosophy and religion, and spreads the beautiful rainbow of hope in the clouds of sorrow that gather over the grave. People find in it that which they can find nowhere else on earth.

Spiritualism is spreading and increasing in its diffusive might and the world is being transformed and reconstructed by it—this great beacon light of this modern age permeates every phase of human life—forging its way to the front in the pulpit, press, stage and modern literature—winning its way in all lands, independent of organization. It possesses superior attractions in its philosophy, in its teachings concerning a future life, in accord with common sense and the longings of the human heart. It has taught us the art of right living—attracted the minds of true men of science who seek after facts with sincerity and impartiality it permeates every department of thought, moral, scientific, political, religious, and the world generally is turning to it and being gladdened and refreshed thereby.

A. H. NICHOLAS.

Summerland, Cal.

Rochester, Ind.

On my late visit to the friends in Rochester, Ind., whom I had not seen for more than two years, I found them as a society still striving to keep the banner of Spiritualism well to the front and with many tokens of success.

Like other local societies they have had their periods of exaltation and depression but by keeping the ball moving they now stand as an acknowledged factor for good in that community and are accorded the hand of fellowship by other denominations.

Here as elsewhere the work has largely been accomplished by a few earnest souls who would not give up the ship, in spite of adverse winds and tides. They are now under the leadership of Harry J. Moore, who is filling his second engagement of six months to the entire satisfaction of the society, and are finding that a more permanent engagement of speakers is beneficial to the best interests of themselves and the cause they represent. A lyceum, also presided over by Brother Moore, has been established and is becoming one of the features of the organization. It is a growing conviction in the mind of the writer that in order to secure the best results we must adopt more permanent methods than have obtained in the past. One and two months engagements of speakers must give way to six months or one year, if we desire to build societies that shall be lasting and be of any moral force or value in the community. Brother Moore is attracting a good audience of intelligent people, is a bright young man, a hard student and consequently growing, and while avoiding antagonizing the opinions of others and other organizations, still possesses the courage of his convictions, and will be heard from in the future as one of the best workers in the cause of truth.

THE HOPE PROPHECY.

Some Further Remarks Concerning It.

I have this day, December 5, received from Mr. Chas. W. Smiley a copy of his monthly magazine, "Occult Truths," dated November 22, 1900. His first article is headed "Possibilities of Astrology." Mr. Smiley says he has "not the slightest doubt that there are data in the heavens, and in our birth and other dates, for determining all important events, including the future." But he knows of no so-called astrologers who can be trusted to give reliable data, and he adds:

"Their disagreements are ludicrous. Some foretold Bryan's election, others McKinley's. * * In October, Dr. J. A Mead, who writes 'astrologer' after his name, wrote concerning Theodore Roosevelt: 'This man will have a close call of death before election by a shot through the heart. He must be very careful October 27, 1900. In October, 1902, by demise of the President, he will become President. Immediately following, in May [1903], we will have an earthquake that will smash crockery.' He hit it right in electing McKinley and Roosevelt, and says that 'the sign ruling the heart indicates that McKinley's death will occur July 26, 1902, disease of the heart.'"

Mr. Smiley then considers the prophecy of Sir William Hope, Deputy Governor of Edinburgh Castle, which was discussed by me in The Progressive Thinker of October 26, 1901. When I wrote the article, October 10, I was unaware of the existence of "Occult Truths." Mr. Smiley's interpretation of the prophecy was the same as mine, save that he was doubtful whether Benjamin Harrison or Grover Cleveland was indicated as the third great ruler. "Sixteen in half's" were the letters in his name; but in order to make sixteen letters in Cleveland's name Mr. Smiley interpolated an a, making it Grover Cleaveland. But even then it does not answer to "sixteen in half's."

Another surmise of Mr. Smiley was that there was a misprint in "six again with added six," and that it should be "with added ten," indicating the full name, "William MacKinley"—six letters in Kinley and ten in William MacI But I have a traced copy of the manuscript and the "added six" is there. So both he and I must acquiesce in the "six with added six" as indicating Will Mc Kinley.

Mr. Smiley finds a double prophecy in the last two lines of the Preface:

"Four, eight, seven, six, with added
ten,
The life line's mark of four gt. men."

Four, plus eight, plus seven, plus six, equals 25, which number "with added ten," i. e., a cipher, becomes 250, the exact ages of Washington, Lincoln, Harrison and McKinley at death. This result was undeterminable in November, 1900, because Harrison and McKinley were then both living.

A few days ago Mr. Smiley consulted A. R. Spofford, of the Congressional Library, concerning the Hope prophecy. Mr. Spofford would not listen to the idea of its being written by Sir William Hope; and he attributed it to "some wag in recent time." If most positive proof of the existence of the MS in the lifetime of Sir William Hope or shortly thereafter should be adduced, I would still expect such savants as Librarian Spofford to scout it. He declares that it was in the book in 1879, when it was obtained for the library. Can he deny the apparent age of the MS.? "Private library of Sir Wm. Hope" is inscribed opposite the title page, in the same handwriting as the prophecy, ending on the other side of the leaf. The two signatures of Wm. Hope are alike. The ink of the prophecy is tolerably well preserved, but not so that of the following lines below:

"The Honoured hand that writ these lines no more shall pen for me, yet voice shall speak and pulses beat for long posterity. His soul refined thro' love of kind bewailed life's labours spent, then found this truth, his search from youth—Greatness is God's accident. JAMES HOPE."

The latter handwriting is larger than that of the prophecy. The spelling of "Honoured" and "labours" is English you know. Some letters and parts of words have entirely faded, and I found it impossible to make a copy through tracing paper. I have little doubt that it was written more than a century ago. The prophecy is dated 1732. As Sir William's first publication was forty-one years earlier, we may infer that he was seventy years of age, or older, when he wrote it.

In the same issue of "Occult Truths," November 22, 1900, the editor makes the following prophecy:

"McKinley will die in the midst of his second term and Roosevelt will finish out the term. Four years hence Roosevelt will be elected President to succeed himself. During his Presidency the United States will become involved in a world-war and will be miraculously victorious over five allied European nations. Roosevelt's name will go down to posterity as equal to or greater than Washington's or Lincoln's."

The first part of this prophecy was fulfilled within ten months.

In regard to the Hope prophecy I repeat, that no probable doubt can be entertained that it was written by Sir William Hope in 1732.

WM. HENRY BURR, A. M.

Has Not Renounced Spiritualism.

A friend has sent me a portion of the Hull-Jamieson debate published in The Progressive Thinker December 7, from which it appears I am accused of having renounced Spiritualism, and also alluded to as having united with a church. I wish I could write my denial of both charges across the blue dome where all the world could see. As I cannot do that, I send my refutation to The Progressive Thinker, knowing it will there meet the eyes of thousands of Spiritualists.

I never united with a church, nor did I leave the public advocacy of Spiritualism because it failed to meet my expectation. As a philosophy and a religion I consider Spiritualism more effective in evolving the noblest attributes of humanity, more helpful and consoling than any other religion the world has ever had. So sincere is this conviction, that I am now arranging to re-enter the lecture field, and if not engaged in speaking for the Spiritualists of this city within a month, I shall be pleased to answer calls to lecture before any society in this State.

LIFE BEYOND DEATH

Being a Review of

The World's Beliefs on the Subject, a Consideration of Present Conditions of Thought and Feeling,

Leading to the Question as o Whether It Can Be Demonstrated as a Fact.—To Which Is Added an Appendix Containing Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

BY MINOT J. SAVAGE, D. D.

8vo, Cloth, 342 Pages.

After a review of the beliefs held in the past concerning life beyond death, Dr. Savage takes up the present conditions of belief and considers the agnostic reaction from the extreme "other-worldliness" which it replaced, which was in turn followed by the Spiritualistic reaction against agnosticism. He points out the doubts concerning the doctrine of immortality held by the churches and the weakness of the traditional creeds and the loosening of their hold upon the people. He then considers the probabilities of a future life, probabilities which, as he admits, fall short of demonstration. The volume includes a consideration of the work of the Society for Psychical Research and also an appendix giving some of the author's own personal experiences in this line. Dr. Savage holds, as a provisional hypothesis, that continued existence is demonstrated, and that there have been at least some well authenticated communications from persons in the other life. The chief contents of the volume are as follows:

Primitive Ideas—Ethnic Beliefs—The Old Testament and Immortality—Paul's Doctrine of Death and the Other Life—Jesus and Immortality—The Other World and the Middle Ages—Protestant Belief Concerning Death and the Life Beyond—The Agnostic Reaction—The Spiritualistic Reaction—The World's Condition and Needs as to Belief in Immortality—Probabilities Which Fall Short of Demonstration—The Society for Psychical Research and the Immortal Life—Possible Conditions of Another Life—Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

THE BEAUTIFUL SOUVENIR VOLUME,

By A. LEAH UNDERHILL,
(Of the Fox Family.)

The Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism.

Thirty-three chapters, 477 pages, superbly printed, and bound in colors and gold, 15 illustrations, 5 steel engraved portraits of the celebrated Fox Family, a full page engraving of the old house at Hydesville, which to this day, by the act of its wealthy and respected owner, Artemas Hyde, Esq., bears the inscription, "Here Spiritualism Originated in 1848."

A complete history of the initiation of the movement known as Modern Spiritualism, from the epochal period which dates from March 31, 1848. Since that day, starting from a small country village in western New York, Spiritualism has made its way against tremendous obstacles around the civilized globe.

Only a limited number of copies of this rare book, now out of print, are to be had, and these can be obtained only at this office. Those who remit at once will receive a copy, post paid, at the GREATLY REDUCED PRICE OF $1.

Note.—By failure in 1885 to complete contract with the author, a large portion of the edition was left unbound, and so remained for a number of years, when they were rescued and bound at additional cost, hence this valuable contribution to the cause of Spiritualism was not properly presented to the Spiritualistic public, and a host of investigators have not had the opportunity of securing a copy until the present time. The wonderful work in healing the sick that Dr. Watkins is accomplishing is indeed most astounding; his patients live to testify to his wonderful powers as a healer. For the last year his work has been most wonderful. He says himself that his cures this year have been more than ever before in numbers, as he confined himself to only 30 new patients a month. Dr. Watkins attends personally to each case, and therefore he can do better work than if he had a great many assistants; no staff of visible helpers are in his office to annoy and suggest this and that. He knows what is the trouble with each patient, and knows the right specific to give. He prepares and puts up all of his medicine, and has no help in his medical treatments that is visible help. Write him to-day, and by return mail you will receive the diagnose. No charge made for diagnosing your case. Send age, sex and leading sympton. C. E. BATH, M'gr.

COGENT COMMENTS.

The Spirituality of Spiritualists.

Being perfectly willing of running the gauntlet of all manner and mode of criticism as a "carping crank," and having all sorts of dire anathema marnanatha flung at my poor head from several directions of the compass in payment for some of my former remarks, I at the same time desire to thank those kind old mothers and fathers in "Israel" who have so heartily thanked me for what others found naught but sharp and sarcastic rhetoric; and therefore, after these preliminary words beg to offer a few thoughts from my correspondent in Cuba, Mr. J. H. Bickford, who, by the way, is a brother of Mrs. Addie C. Littlefield, who, I believe, is favorably known as a medium in the East, particularly in Boston:

"As to the decline of Spiritualism, I think it is as generally understood, but really, NO. In my researches the last five years, I have found more real Spiritualists who did not attend so-called Spiritualist meetings or belong to a society, than I have met in the societies. This may seem a broad statement, but I believe it true. You ask them why they do not belong to a society, and the answer is, 'I do not care to associate with people of such moral character as some who are the foremost in the societies here, for they are too well known as anything but spotless. Here, at home, we enjoy our religion.' And one old couple told me: 'Could we expect our daughter in spirit life to manifest in a crowd like there is in —— hall? We would not insult her by thinking of it.' So for years, this old couple have kept a cabinet, and although not rich, have had a medium in their own home, and they have been well repaid, for their parlor is hung with large paintings of their dear ones gone on; and when a sensitive enters the room, he can perceive the force. It is a temple kept sacred to the spirit friends. They are readers of at least two Spiritualist papers, and both are well wishers for the cause, but although they do a great deal of work for it, are not known in either of the two (or three) societies in that city, Lynn, Mass.

"This is only one case; there is another in the same city—one of the best mediums in the city is not known in public at all, but she has all the work she can do giving sittings. So you may see that the real Spiritualists are being slowly driven from the ranks of the Spiritists, for there is only one in a hundred, and the mass rules. So in time, I think, the so-called Spiritualists of today will become extinct, and true spiritual Spiritualism be elevated to its proper place—the head of all religions of the now if not the whole world."

To the Editor:—The above clipping is from your issue of December 7, over the signature of U. G. Figley, of Bryan, Ohio. My first impulse upon reading it was to take the author to task, but I thought it well to let our friends attend to that and confine myself to a statement of facts concerning our society and let your many readers judge for themselves as to whether Cadet Hall was a proper place for the real Spiritualists to attend, and if the old couple's daughter might not manifest through the mediums appearing upon our platform without being insulted, and if "who of the best mediums in the city" could not meet with us to her as well as our advantage. I have been unable as yet to find a person who has ever heard of Mr. J. H. Bickford, or who has any knowledge of who this wonderful private medium spoken of may be.

I have had the honor of being president of the Lynn Spiritualist Association since October 1, 1900, since which time we have held meetings every Sunday.

Last spring before closing our hall, we had leased and fitted up one of the most beautiful groves in this state, which we have named Camp Unity, where we have a covered auditorium with a seating capacity of 760, also an ample cook house and dining pavilion. We built a road and piped water into the grove, in fact fitted it in every detail and opened without one cent of debt. Our audiences ranged from 300 the most stormy day, to 1200, National Association Day. The first Sunday in October we opened in Cadet Hall with Miss Lizzie Harlow as speaker for the month. In November we had Dr. Geo. Fuller, president of the Massachusetts State Association, and chairman of Onset Camp; Hon Harrison D. Barrett, president of the National Association, and editor of the Banner of Light; Mrs. Dr. Caird, of Lynn, and Mrs. Hattie Webber, of Boston. For December we have had Mrs. May S. Pepper, of Providence, R. I.

The first Sunday in January we celebrate our eighth anniversary. The second Sunday we have Mr. Thos Cross, of England; remaining Sundays, Mrs. C. Fannie Allyn, of Stoneham, Mass. Later we have Mr. Thos. Cross for five Sundays.

I desire to mention these names to show the grade of talent we employ. We have had a fair and gypsy camp this winter at which we cleared $150. Wednesday, February 12, we shall hold a union meeting of the neighboring chartered societies, to encourage organization, when all visiting members will be entertained free. At our last union meeting we entertained over two hundred and fifty visitors at supper. I believe we are the only society which has done anything of this kind for the good of the cause. Our programme for that day will commence at 2 o'clock, with remarks by visitors on the best means to advance our cause; 4 to 5, social hour; supper at 5; smoke talk for gentlemen, 5:30 song service by congregation at 6; concert by Prof. Thomas' full orchestra at 6:30. Evening service at 7:30 by Hon. Harrison D. Barrett, Mrs. May S. Pepper and others. Music by the Unity Quartette. We have been flattering ourselves that the members of our society and our services were good enough for any Spiritualist "old or new," and if the writer of the statement at the head of this article knows of any society doing more for the cause than the Lynn Spiritualist Association, I would be pleased to hear from him.

PHENOMENA.

Proving Spirit Return and Communion.

If spiritual phenomena and manifestations of various kinds are possible; and if such phenomena transcend the power and possibilities of everything earthly and mortal so as to prove, logically, that they come from denizens of the spirit world, who can blame us for being phenomena hunters?

If, however, phenomena and spiritual communion are all chimerical, all wholly imaginary, then what is called "spiritual philosophy" is about like orthodox preaching, and just as worthless, there being no proof whatever that either is true.

Without offering further excuses for being a chronic phenomena hunter, I wish to report the following: Twenty-six years ago I attended a light seance in a large city of the West; it was about three o'clock; the sun was shining; the parlor was 20 feet square; had a half-dozen large windows, and was light and pleasant. About 20 persons were present, only one of whom I knew, and she stated, on introducing me, that I did not believe in Spiritualism. Being a physician and an unbeliever, I was immediately elected to take full charge of the conditions, which I did, and made the most strenuous efforts to avoid fraud of any kind.

The medium was a little girl of 12 or 13; was very thin and frail; had no apparent womanly development, mentally or physically, and was a slate-writer. I had seated all the people with their backs against the wall, where every one remained during the entire phenomena; the little girl was sitting by a small table in the centre of the room, and no one, save myself, was within eight feet of her. I had taken the table to a window and examined it thoroughly to see there were no wires nor machinery of any kind about it. With her right hand she passed a large slate under the table, and upon this slate many alleged messages were written to various persons present, while all the time she was swinging a fan with her left hand and manifesting no interest in what was being done. I could see her wrist and part of the hand that was holding the slate, and of course it was impossible for her to write with that hand, and yet the writing seemed insignificant compared with what followed:

Some one asked her control, "Johnnie," if he would wind a watch; the answer was yes, and I called for a large, heavy watch that would be hard to open. An engineer gave me a silver watch that had not been out of the shop more than two months; it was very heavy, and although I weigh 190 and am quite strong it was all I could do to open it. Upon the chain was a ring with five keys, only one of which would wind the watch, the others being worn out. Having shut it with a loud snap I laid the watch with its chain and keys upon the slate, and in a dreamy way, as if half asleep, the child medium slipped the slate under the table with her right hand, still fanning her face with the left, and in an instant the watch was lifted, the right key applied and it was wound. There was no hunting of keys in order to get the right one; no delay in finding the keyhole; and that watch was opened and wound in one-fifth of the time that I could have done it, even if there had been but one key to consider. All persons present were in their seats against the wall; all heard the watch and chain grabbed up as if by human fingers; all heard the sound of the click-spring while the watch was being wound; every one saw the open watch with the key still upon the pivot when it was passed to me on the slate; and as no one was within eight feet of the table except myself and the child that was holding the slate, fraud seemed impossible.

The force necessary to open the watch would have lifted a weight of 20 or 30 pounds; no living person could have opened it with one hand; many other things requiring great strength and the use of two hands were done, and the physical force was characterized by unerring intelligence, as no mistakes whatever were made during all the varied phenomena.

Do spirits who are so ethereal that we cannot see them; who are so delicate in their touch that we cannot be cognizant of their presence through our physical senses; and who are strong enough to lift heavy bodies, have thumb nails with which to open such a watch as this? If not, how did they open it?

About seven years ago the eminent slate-writer, "Alphabetical" Keeler, of Lily Dale, N. Y., was attracting a great deal of merited attention in Boston, and I called to see if I could get a sitting, taking with me three pairs of new slates. About ten hours before calling I had written the names of eight persons upon small papers, one name being on each paper, and had sealed them up. Mr. Keeler and I had never met before; I had had but little experience in slate-writing; had tied each pair of slates together securely, and took a seat at a table about three feet wide, Mr. Keeler being on the opposite side. I took the eight little folded and closed papers out of my pocket and put them in a bunch on my side of the table out of reach of the medium. He touched the papers with the end of his pencil, and said: "Do these papers all contain the names of people old enough to write?" I answered yes. He then took one of his own slates and wrote the names of six of the persons, saying we were going to get messages from them; and that the other two did not seem to be present. Although the names had all been written at my office and the papers had been sealed up and he had not even touched them, he did not miss the spelling of a single name. The names were as follows: Emma Goodwin, John Caulfield, J. B. Curtis, M. J. Wellslager, E. D. Barclay, and Jennie Daily. If this narrative ended here the conclusions of many would be that Mr. Keeler got the names and correct spelling from me through his ability as a "mind reader," but the following destroys that theory. The ballots had been put in a heap on the table and I did not know one from another, but when I would take up one and lay it upon a pair of slates a message would be written in five or six seconds, and the name at the bottom of the message always corresponded with the name in the paper that was on the slate.

I had many pleasant interviews with Mr. Keeler and he showed a constant desire to assist me in my efforts to understand slate-writing and other phenomena. I insisted on knowing how he obtained those names; he said he did not hear the names pronounced at all; that if he had obtained them by sound he could not have been correct in the spelling; but when he took up his slate and pencil the names came to him one after another, always with the correct spelling; and that when a single paper was laid upon the slate containing a name that I did not know at all, he got the name immediately, and if it was not a spiritual intelligence that gave him all the information he could not imagine what it was. The first message was signed by M. J. Wellslager, and contained 220 words. It was written in six seconds, the writing being very plain. The medium did not know my name, as he had just come to Boston and was not near my office. There was only one of the six related to me and she was my sister. She did not address me as brother, but signed her name, "Lovingly your sister," and with her message was a beautiful flowering tree that would take any person a half hour to draw.

MY THEORY.

I am inclined to the belief that mankind is immortal, and there is a basic truth in Spiritualism, but being imperfectly understood, entirely too much is expected of it.

Everything that affords a means of acquiring money, fame, or an easy living is permeated with fraud, more or less, and for this reason it is not strange that men and women, by thousands, have become pseudo mediums and filled the world with false ideas concerning the spiritual world.

Almost everything in this objective and tangible world has its antipode and analogue; cruelty is the antipode of mercy and the analogue of selfishness, while kindness and gentleness find their analogues in love and human sympathy. If there is a world of spirits some of the antipodes and analogies of this life exist there. There are true mediums here, though comparatively few, and such mediums can only communicate with their analogues on the other side—with mediums in the spirit world—and as none of my departed loved ones are such mediums I have tried in vain to hear from them.

Mr. Keeler must be a real medium because he has a control, George Christy, who is with him on all occasions, and without whom his wonderful phenomena would be impossible. It seems that Christy and all other real controls are the analogues in the spirit world of true mediums in this, and, like genuine mediums here, are few in number. If the power to hold communion with spirits is limited to a small number here, it seems logical to infer that the power of spirits to communicate with mortals on earth may be equally limited, and yet such communion proves the existence of a spiritual world and fosters our belief in eternal life.

Good News FOR THE AFFLICTED.

Dr. Peebles, with His Able Staff of Assistants, Has Originated a System of

PSYCHIC, HYGIENIC, AND MEDICAL

DR. J. M. PEEBLES.

Treatment that is Curing Thousands Who Have Been Pronounced Incurable.

This wonderful system of treatment has so revolutionized the healing of disease that it can almost be said there are no hopeless or incurable cases. Geo. H. Weeks, of Cleveland, Ohio, sends heartfelt thanks for restoration to health after suffering from nervous prostration and insomnia for years; he says he now enjoys excellent health and restful sleep every night. Mrs. J. A. Rust, of Ithaca, Minn., cured of uric acid poisoning in two months' treatment, writes: "I am better than in years and each day brings new strength and health. I will refer all ailing ones to you." Mary A. Earl, of Crawford, Mich., suffering from pronounced female difficulties and kidney disease, says: "I took your treatment three months, and it has been a success in my case. I am indeed grateful to you for my recovery." C. E. Davis, Woodman, N. H., who suffered all the miseries of a dyspeptic, writes that as a result of Dr. Peebles' treatment he has not missed a meal since last March.

If you are in poor health, no matter how long you have suffered or what your complaint is, just write the Doctors a plain letter about your condition and they will confidentially consider the same and send you FREE OF CHARGE a full diagnosis of your case, together with valuable Literature, explaining fully this grand science and their wonderful methods of treatment which gives hope to all the afflicted and special advice in your case, which in itself would be worth more to you than countless sums of money, for Health is above all price. If you are suffering, do not delay a moment, but write at once and receive, ABSOLUTELY FREE, their opinion on your case and the literature to acquaint you fully with their method of treatment.

Esoteric Lessons.

An Argument Against Physical Causation.

The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely physical health upon a purely psychical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom; insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief in which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

SPIRITUALISM—Progress, the Universal Law of Nature: Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.—SPIRITUALISM

VOL. 25. CHICAGO, ILL., JAN. 11, 1902. NO. 633.

THE PRESENT AGE.

How Is It Being Manifested?

Considering the ideas of mankind and their relation to the theological thought of the world, the force which at the present time is the most powerful in its operation is the one that is disintegrating, breaking down the forms of thought that have heretofore shackled the honest expression of the spiritual life and caused it to seemingly dissemble; to appear to give sanction and adherence to views pertaining to the religious life of man that truthfully it did not accept.

The inception and development of those forms of religious belief which are at present (to the close observer of the trend of development on lines of thought concerning religious belief) meeting their Waterloo, were evolved among races whose intellectual and spiritual development poorly fitted them to be able to decide what was needful for them on that line. And portions of it were transmitted to them as the heritage of a still more ignorant undeveloped past.

Those views on religious questions which at present are being set aside for something more adapted to the wants of the present age, have been retained because the belief was strong that the time had passed by for the manifestation of new forms of thought on those subjects. That whatever had been revealed was final, eternal in its duration and any attempt to reach out and utilize the newer manifestations that were being evolved because the necessities of the human soul were calling for something more in harmony with the age, was considered a non-recognition of the old forms of thought, and to the believers in the old systems who were then largely in the majority the new thought would not be accepted.

One very important fact that the present age has recognized is that if it expects to make further advancement it must, if it retains the power to utilize the portion of truth transmitted to it from the past, adopt a system of thoroughly sifting the false from the true, eliminating from all of its systems of belief whether on religious, social or political questions that which cannot be utilized in the development of life on any of the lines on which at present it is necessary for it to evolve.

It is a recognized truth that there are forms of belief which in one age would if accepted be helpful in its evolution toward a higher standard of life, which if it was retained after that phase of development had been reached would be detrimental, an obstacle in the path which it is seeking to pursue. There have always been manifestations of the truth which were eternal, adapted to the needs of any age or phase of development whether on religious, social or political lines, and between the believers in the perpetuity of the old systems, and those of the new, who maintain that however useful they may have been, in the passing of the age for which they were intended their usefulness ceased; and in the effort to assert and enforce the two opposing forms of thought there have been waged the great historic conflicts of the world.

The power and ability of the present age to assimilate the revelations of advance thought as it is made manifest to it is greater than in any preceding one. Those who are fearful that it is seeking to utilize the forces of the universe beyond the limit of practicability and consequently producing chaotic conditions, should calm their fears, for it will not receive them until it is capable of utilizing those forces in a practical way to help still further onward the advancing energies of life. The spirit of the present age must, even with all of its constructive forces in such active operation, be necessarily a large percentage iconoclastic; it yet being largely encumbered with those conditions that are the inheritance of the past age, and which it has for all practical purposes outgrown, and which must be removed, and they will be, there is no merely guess to be considered in the problem; and whoever is rash enough to think of impeding the efforts made to clear the way of obstacles so that the constructive forces can build better conditions will have opportunity to regret that they placed themselves in the way of forces that are irrepressible.

The present age has brought into subjection and utilized the forces of nature to an extent greater than all of the eras that had preceded it. Knowledge of the fact has been acquired and made of practical use in helping forward racial development that the only mystery which enshrouds those undiscovered forces which are waiting for human life to explore is its inability at present to comprehend their manifestations; and in proportion as that obstacle is removed, there is opened up an illimitable fountain of resources from which can be taken whatever the age needs to help it on its ever ascending journey.

The manifestations of the present age are proving false the assertion that taking the race as a whole retrogression is following, and is the legitimate successor of the manifestations of the progressive energies that have lifted the race to its present phase of development. We do not deny the fact that nations and sub-races have their birth, growth, and as distinct national entities decay; but that only proves that as new nations are evolved the law of the age in which they are being developed demands that those whose systems of life were evolved in an age more primitive and are unable to grasp and utilize the forces of the more modern world should retire from the arena, become absorbed into those whose foundations are laid down on lines more in accord with the expanding energies of life.

When the ancient civilizations of Egypt, Greece and Rome were swept into oblivion by the forces that were laying the foundation of the modern world, it was not evidence that human life was retrograding, but on the contrary proof that it was being fitted to manifest its energies on a plane superior to any that the preceding ages were capable of illustrating. And so with the nations composing our present civilization; they are working out their destiny not on lines of mere chance or happen so, but according to the law which controls their destiny and is using them as instruments to prepare the way for more advanced forms of life to be manifested, and when their mission is performed they will retire as their predecessors have done; and the indications which are visible to the casual observer are strong evidence that some of our modern nations have, under their present systems about reached their limit and are ready to retire, leaving their last will and testament for the coming ages to use as best they can. It has been by taking one step at a time that human life on its journey through the ages that have passed has attained unto its present position, and by the same method will it continue to advance, and in time will place in the museum of past antiquities those manifestations of life's forces which at present are the acme of development in the modern world.

The present age in comparison with those that have passed is manifesting its life more in accord with the principles of humanitarianism. The doctrine of the unity of human life and of according to all an equal opportunity for development, is slowly superseding the selfish instincts which in former ages were more dominant. This assertion may seem to some minds paradoxical, not based upon actual facts as they are presented. When we see what has been done in the development of the destructive weapons of war, and what efforts are being made to make their destructive power still more effective, it would seem when viewed from an external position that the assertion that expecting the coming brotherhood of the race, from appearances seems contradictory; but when rightfully understood they are seen to be forces which are working for a consummation of that much desired event.

The mission of the present age is to obliterate the provincialism and exclusiveness of the nations of the world which it inherited from the former ages, and was a necessary condition of their life, owing to their lack of methods by which cheap and rapid communication could be had with each other. Old prejudices die hard. The efforts of the advance thought of the age to clothe the truth in a garb that is more acceptable to the modern forms of thought, as well as to eliminate what is false, will be strenuously opposed by those who still cling to the old forms regardless of whether they are the expression of the truth or not.

There is yet opportunity in our modern life for reformers of the heroic type to make themselves manifest. Throughout all the ages of human development there has always been the forlorn hope that has led humanity in its advancement to higher planes of existence. The new is constantly improving upon the old, seeking to clothe it in garments better suited to the advancing age; and it will always be so; the prayer "give us this day our daily bread," is very appropriate in its presentation of the needs of the present age. The past has had its day, but it cannot now perform the mission that is devolving upon the present which is to broaden and make straight the highway upon which the coming ages will plant their standard.

That the present age is manifesting its life on a higher plane than any that has preceded it no rational being but will admit. But it is not satisfied with what has been attained. It is reaching out for better conditions than those which at present exist, in which human life can work out its destiny with better prospects of being successful; and it is to be congratulated because of that condition. We cannot endorse the program laid down by those thinkers who hold that while it is possible for human life to intellectually advance, and to bring to a high state of perfection the mechanical forces of the world, it can at the same time as far as their moral and spiritual life is concerned be retrograding. We hold that within certain lines they must move along together; and as the present age is ahead of any of its predecessors in the utilization of the mechanical forces, so it stands ahead in the evolution of its spiritual life.

We see many conditions existing in human life that cause a feeling of revulsion, and wonder if the beings that commit such crimes against the moral integrity of the race could be classed as human; but remember that these are the exceptions and not the rule. The battle that has been waged, and the active efforts that at present are being made to elevate the moral tone of society is being effective in a measure to accomplish its object.

Civilized society of the present age is a step ahead of what it was a few generations ago, when conditions existed which if not openly endorsed were silently accepted and which would now be met with very effective protests. Laws of civilized society are becoming more and more the external expression of the internal spirit with which it is guided, and those which are not as a rule are short-lived. The present age is manifesting its life on lines of mighty effort to eliminate the false from the true, and to be able to leave to the ages that will succeed it an inheritance of greater intrinsic value than any that have been transmitted from the former ages to the present one; and that it will accomplish its object is not only the hope, but judging from the forces at work and the influence they are exerting it will be successful in attaining that end.

To Whom It May Concern:

The undersigned will deposit one hundred dollars against twenty-five dollars, that the Bangs Sisters, of Chicago, perform their "independent slate writing" by a purely mechanical process, to prove which the undersigned is willing to risk the above mentioned sum. The only condition the undersigned requires is to be allowed to place his hands at both ends of the slate. If under the conditions above named any writing shall appear on the blank sheets in the slate, he shall forfeit his one hundred dollars; if however no writing is produced, the mediums or their friends who may accept this challenge shall forfeit the sum of twenty-five dollars. For further particulars address the undersigned.

The above presents an excellent opportunity for the Bangs Sisters to make $100. We candidly believe they can win; we have no doubt of it. Mr. Mangasarian stands high in this city. He is the regular lecturer for the Ethical Society, and to convince him that spirits can and do communicate with mortals would be a decided triumph for our cause. Let the contest be made.

RELIGIONS.

The New Religion and the Old.

For eighteen hundred years the orthodox church has been teaching that Heaven, God and the Christ are of some far-off sphere, and far from the habitation of man; utterly forgetful of the saying of the Grand Teacher of the first century that the Kingdom of Heaven is within you; thereby proving to any thinking mind that heaven is not a place far off, but that heaven must be within the heart and soul. Christ knew this, and tried to teach man the true religion, tried to teach him that if he would live right, do right, and think right, heaven would be in his being; but it seems that man did not want to understand the words of Christ, because it restricted him from coarse pleasures, sensual enjoyments, and from taking the advantage of his fellow beings; and then after he had committed his full share of evil-doing to and against his fellow beings, to ask God for forgiveness.

It is only in late years that men of all walks of life are beginning to understand and teach the true meaning of the teachings of that Grand Teacher, the highest, the humblest, the greatest, the meekest of all—the Christ; teaching that religion to be practical must be lived, and that the Kingdom of Heaven is not in some far-off heaven, but that heaven must be in our being, in our mind and soul; that if man so lives that he is at peace with himself and the world, doing all he can for his fellow beings, loving all, hating no one, a kind word for all, but never a curse, helping fallen humanity to again become what they should be; doing as the Christ did and taught, so that there may not be a thought in his mind that he had committed some wrong deed; but the memory that he had done his best and fulfilled his duty.

Harmony and love, love for all, the high and the low, the rich and the poor, for friend and for foe, then will we know what heaven is. Man must not only teach heaven, but he must live it. Religion to be of any use must be lived in this life. I believe in the immortality of the soul and a life beyond the grave. But immortality does not begin after death, but begins in this life. Love for humanity and divinity is the key to immortality.

Man does not get immortality as a free gift, to be laid away in this life, and be taken up after the change called death; but he must live the life as Christ taught it, so that he will truly have the "Kingdom of Heaven" within himself. Man doing this need not fear that he will reap his reward after death, for to such as live not for their own selfish ends and desires, but for the good of humanity and the betterment of the world, not because they wish to gain a reward thereby, but because they love humanity and the Author of their being, to such immortality is an assured fact, for in the heart where love dwells, there also and always dwell heaven and immortality.

Man in his mad rush after pleasure and wealth, never takes time to think that perhaps he would gain more if he would help his fellow beings; he seems to have forgotten the saying of the Christ that, "What thou sowest, so shalt thou reap;" and also the law of karma as taught in the New Thought.

Man may for a time live for himself only, caring nothing for those poor souls around him that need his help and influence to become what they should be. He may have all the pleasure he wants, and realize the riches of the world, but sooner or later he will find that the shortest way is not always the best way, and that pleasure and riches are not all that is needed to fulfill the earthly mission.

The orthodox church teaches sanctification by faith, in fact this is the foundation of the church; teaching that no matter how grievously man may sin, no matter how many hearts he may break, or out of how many mouths he may take the bread that they need to keep their bodies and souls together, yet, if that man asks for forgiveness, even though it be at the last hour he calls upon his God, whom he has insulted for years, by not living the spiritual laws, he will be forgiven, and his soul will pass to heaven and is safe. The orthodox church totally ignores the law of karma and the saying of the Christ, that, "As thou sowest, so shalt thou reap;" this is why the Christian church has failed thus far, because in teaching "sanctification by faith," they give men free license to all crime and misdoings; because all that is necessary after many hearts are broken and many a life ruined, after being surfeited with all the pleasures of the world that wealth and position can give; then when death is near, is to pray to the God he has forgotten so long for forgiveness, and that man, who never had any love in his heart, or ever did a kindly act to a fallen brother or sister, and therefore has not the germ of immortality in his soul, yet, according to the teachings of his church, that man cheats Satan out of his dues, and has a place in heaven.

The New Thought or New Religion teaches as the Christ taught, that whatever a man soweth, so shall he reap; it teaches that if we make another suffer in any way, either in thought, word, or deed, we also must suffer; because the "law of karma" is a just law, and all who break it must suffer; and while God may forgive, yet man must suffer the consequences of his wrong doing.

It teaches that if we do good and help our fellow man, help the fallen, and love all men as our brothers, that we will then receive the reward of our well doing. It teaches that love for man and God, acknowledging the wisdom and truth of all his teachings, this is the key to immortality; it teaches that no amount of prayer will gain for us immortality, if love hath not a dwelling place in our hearts. It teaches that man must not do good because he wishes to become immortal, or any other selfish desire; but because he loves to do that only which is right. Love is the key of the New Thought. It teaches man to love God, and not to fear him; for when man once loves God he will not do any wrong, neither to God nor any of his fellow beings; and it is not necessary then for him to fear God, in order to keep his commandments. Fear has never yet made an honest, God loving man or woman; but has made plenty of cowards and hypocrites.

The New Thought or New Religion teaches man the true spiritual philosophy of life; to develop the highest self culture, through right thinking as a means of bringing one's loftiest ideals into realization in the present life; to teach the higher nature of man in his relation to health, happiness, progress and immortality.

Man's first thought should be, how he can best serve God; the next, what can I do for my fellow man? and by answering the thought—in works—or putting into practice the theory, he therefore serves himself. And this the Ideal Religion teaches; and a religion to be ideal and all-embracing must have love as the foundation. Pure unselfish love for God and man is the foundation of the New Religion.

A Higher Critic.

The average orthodox clergyman often indulges in very flippant language when discoursing on what he deems sacred things.

Rev. F. L. Foster, an evangelist, created quite a disturbance in eastern New York a few years ago. He is said to have touched lightly and gracefully on many things; but to have expounded nothing more clearly than his idea of the manner by which the "higher critic," who has been troubling the placid waters of orthodoxy, came into existence. In an unctuous voice he said:

"After God had made man He had some mud left over and left it lying in the road. Some monkeys that had been viewing the work from the tree-tops, came down after God had gone away and began monkeying with this mud. Now, monkeys are great imitators, and as they had seen God make a man, they thought they would make one, too. So they made a very strange and curious image. Not long after, God came back that way and saw this thing the monkeys had made. It struck Him as rather curious, and when He came up to it He said, 'Goodness gracious! Here is a higher critic!'"

Perhaps this was the same Bishop Foster of the M. E. Church, who gave the orthodox away by the utterance that, "however humiliating it may be, truth compels us to say that we do not yet know that death does not end all."

J. Charles Walker, of Johns Hopkins University of Baltimore, Md., says: "An appeal to faith is the only subterfuge of ignorance and impotence. This is the Age of Reason. The mind demands proof and it must have it, or it remains in honest doubt. The church which has arrogated to itself the instruction of mankind in spiritual matters, is utterly failing to discharge its duty and missing its greatest opportunity for good. It should either stop preaching a hereafter altogether, or else ascertain a scientific basis for its assumption; a logical theory for the life to come, and all the light that study and investigation can throw upon this mighty question. Let us hope that the church will soon awaken to a realization of its greatest mission—the bridging of the chasm between the two worlds, so that death will cease to be the 'King of Terrors' and transition a frightful leap into the dark."

Let our local clergy who are so prone to denounce Spiritualism as a "fraud" and a "humbug" make note of this and govern themselves accordingly.

BEAUTIFUL EXPERIENCE OF AN OLD-TIME SPIRITUALIST

To the Editor:—It has been suggested by some of my Spiritualist friends that I write some of my experiences with mediums, and also some of the many visions that have been given me during the last forty years that I have been engaged as a healer and a seer.

Mediums existed on the earth many thousand years ago, hence it is no new thing lately discovered. The woman of Endor was a fine clairvoyant, but the devil got the credit of controlling her to see. He was a very good devil at that time, and if the clergy are to be believed he is engaged in the same holy business yet.

I am now about eighty years old. When only twelve years old I began to feel electric shocks and see beautiful white lights. I was told by my mother that the devil existed, but if I was a good boy, God would take good care of me, and no serious trouble would ever befall me. I could not help regretting that fight occurred in heaven and the Devil was ejected and permitted to roam at large all over the earth.

If the Devil gave me the power to see spirits and behold all those lovely visions that I have witnessed, perhaps I am under many obligations to him, and should treat him with greater respect than ever before.

When the Fox children were first brought out the clergy proclaimed that the devil had a new lease of life, and was using it to thwart the designs of God, and that God could not prevent it.

Modern Spiritualism was a revelation that has always inspired me with the desire to accomplish some good.

The first grand vision that was given me occurred after I had lain on my back for thirty long days and nights with catarrh of the stomach. Dr. Mitchell, a clairvoyant healer, was attending me. He had expressed the opinion that my recovery was doubtful, but that night would disclose the truth; sure enough it did. It was a dark, rainy night. I was without pain, but could not turn my head quickly without having vertigo. As I came to consciousness I realized that some one was in my room, for it was as light as day. I was startled by seeing a woman dressed in pure white sitting in a graceful position at the other side of my room. It was a beautiful sight to behold. Soon I discovered that it was the spirit of my oldest sister, who had passed away some years before. She was the mother of seven children, and was dearly beloved by all who knew her. She did not move or speak, but sat in a position so that I could see her hair as it was done up on the back part of her head. It was auburn in color, and she had combed it in the same way she did when on the earth. The light she brought with her illuminated the whole room, and her features shone like those of an angel. Her white flossy dress fitted her exactly, and hung in graceful folds to the floor.

I had plenty of time to survey her whole surroundings, and I improved my time with much satisfaction.

She had on white slippers; her feet protruded just a little from the folds of her dress, but I could see them plainly.

The spirit of my sister was in my room for at least ten minutes, and I was as conscious of her presence as I ever was of any transaction that ever occurred in my daily life. When she left, the light went with her and the room was dark and dreary as before she came.

During this illness and about a week after the other vision, another was given me. The room was lighted up in the same way with a light from the Spiritual Kingdom. I saw when in the midst of darkness a brilliant light enter my room on the walls and on the ceiling overhead, printing in chapters and verses, with lines drawn between, similar to those in the Bible. The lines extended from the floor to the ceiling, and all overhead was like a great book with chapters and verses. The chapters were numbered, and so were the verses.

After viewing the scene for a time, and wondering what it all meant, the light quickly vanished and I was as before left in darkness.

I was now convalescing at a rapid rate; in the next two weeks I was up and around, relating my vision to all my friends, but it was at least six months before my vision commenced to be fulfilled.

Now I had never written a book or an article for publication in all my life. Suddenly I was seized with a desire to write a book. I wrote, and kept on writing until I had manuscript sufficient to make a book of 400 pages, which is beautifully bound, and on sale to any one who would like it.

I will now relate another vision that was strangely given me.

I was in the City of Washington, alone in my room. My daughter Ella was only eight years old when she passed to spirit life, but at the time this vision was given me, she was eighteen or twenty years old. A large amphitheatre was shown me. There was an open air concert. The amphitheatre was at least an acre in extent, with a large stage or platform in the center. The stage was so arranged that the five thousand spirits that were seated could view it without inconveniencing each other.

Right here I will say that my daughter has, so she informs me, developed wonderful musical talent, and is one in a band of one hundred that sing and play on many different instruments.

On this occasion I was the only one who was from the earth invited to the grand operatic performance that took place on that occasion. This musicale was given my daughter in honor of her birth into the spirit world. She was permitted to invite her old father, who enjoyed it very much.

My Ella took part in all that was done. The opening commenced with the one hundred all taking a part; then came solos on different instruments, with song and happy speaking. I could see the flutter of handkerchiefs and the sound of voices as they cheered. A sweet-toned silver bell attracted my attention as it kept time with the other instruments. The last act was left for my Ella to perform. She came out all alone on the stage and sang a song dedicated to her father. It voiced the love she had for her father. At the time I remembered the words and the air she sang it in.

Cheers and congratulations were profusely offered as she bowed herself off the stage. Thus ended the most wonderful musicale that mortal ever witnessed.

Only a few weeks ago I was awakened by hearing a Scotch bagpipe played upon in my room. The music was much sweeter than any I ever heard before, and I was charmed with its melody. Before going any farther with a description of this seance or vision, I will be compelled to go back seventy years in my life. An incident took place, wherein two others were parties to the same, and which I am about to relate. It was in the town of Hopewell, Ontario county, N. Y. I was little more than eight years old, and attended school in a country school-house. It was warm summer weather and the fish in the brook had a charm for me that was irresistible. On all occasions when I could possibly get away I was fishing in that lovely brook.

Little Maggie Draper was about my own age. Her father was a rich Scotch farmer, and they lived about half a mile up the road above our house. I was a dull scholar, and always at the foot of my class. Maggie was bright and beautiful; and took much pains to assist me in getting my lessons. We were much together, and any boy or girl that disturbed the happiness of little Maggie Draper was sure to find me ready to take her part.

One bright summer day while at school, I was told to stand out and study my lesson, which I had failed to get. This soon became tiresome, and I began to edge toward the door, which stood ajar. A moment's hesitation, the book fell to the floor, and I flew away toward the brook with the speed of a race horse. The school-mistress called and rapped, but I was running away and gave no heed to her calls.

When the school was dismissed at night, I was with the others with a fine string of fish that I believed would save me from being punished. But the plan did not work, for the next morning I was terribly whipped, and a line sent by my father to the mistress to give me another dressing down, which she immediately set about doing.

A small rope was procured and the process of tying me to the high desk commenced, when little Maggie Draper started from her seat with eyes streaming with tears to take my part, and prevent, if possible, the extra flogging that I was about to get. The school-mistress was compelled to give it up, for Maggie's tears were more than she could endure.

That fall was the last that I saw of Maggie for about thirty years. We emigrated to Ohio, and Maggie grew to womanhood, studied elocution, became leading woman in Shakespeare's plays, an actress of much ability.

It was about two years after my companion had departed this life. I was in Detroit, Mich., and was walking down Michigan avenue where it joins Woodward avenue. I met a large, stately finely dressed lady. As I came near her, I felt an electric shock; the lady must have felt it at the same time, for she turned her head quickly and with a flushed face she seemed about ready to speak to me, but she saw I was a stranger, when she passed quickly along. This was a mutual feeling of recognition, but we passed each other without speaking. But there were the same large blue eyes that shed the tears that saved me from being whipped when a boy of only 8 years.

Mr. Draper played the bagpipes when on earth, and there is no good reason why he could not play them in the spirit world. I heard them I am sure. I am also sure that the voice I heard was that of Miss Draper, whom I knew so well when she was only a little girl of 8 years.

Now comes the most strange part of this vision. After hearing Maggie's voice singing sweetly, Scots wo wha where Wallace leads, I being somewhat familiar with the old Scotch song, started in and sang with them. The moment my voice took part the whole heavens was filled with voices that sang so sweetly. The singing and playing lasted until I became weary, and quit singing, when all was quiet and still.

On one occasion when in the small hours of the night, I was awakened by the sound of music in my room. It was the sweet tones of the piano, and was played by the hands of a skillful artist. Soon there appeared a spirit. He was not more than 30 years old; dark complexion, with dark hair and whiskers. His voice was the sweetest male voice that I ever heard. His song related to the progressive work in the spirit world, and, oh! it was so lovely—nothing earthly in it.

Sometimes I hear words distinctly spoken; at other times a loud impression is forcibly felt that I realize the name of the person speaking. These are my latest developments, but I was told some years ago that a new development was awaiting me. The spirit proclaimed that this was rarely accomplished in persons of my age. Once a spirit informed her medium that she intended to leave him and go with me. She said he did not always tell the truth, besides he said he wished she would go. She was with me for two years, and now I miss her.

A STUDY OF JESUS--MAN, MEDIUM, CHRIST.

Synopsis of an Inspirational Lecture Delivered by John W. Ring, at Galveston, Texas, Dec. 25, 1901.

In the study of the life of Jesus the Christ there is probably no more beautiful or important lesson than this: Truth stands unmoved by man's disbelief, unchanged by his denial; in majesty she moves, and her presence dispels the gloom of error; the quaking forms of superstition and bigotry disperse, while doubt and fear flee as bats from a torch. Let man seek to be made free by Truth, to stand in its brightness, to reflect the holy light which drives away all darkness, conceals all clouds and transforms night into high noon. Truth asks no defense, but she seeks a hearing. "Truth crushed to earth will rise again, the eternal years of God are hers." This magnificent illustraton of successful soul culture is drawn from the fact that Jesus as a historical character is comparatively unnoticed and unmentioned. Historians of his day, from prejudice possibly, so briefly mention him that were it not for some higher inspiration, he would pass unnoticed. Outside the Holy Bible, which we all know is a compilation by religious enthusiasts, and some books purporting to come from the magicians of India and Persia (wise men) which in matter of form and ceremony contradict the Bible, there is no history of this character, Jesus.

This only emphasizes the fact that men are but vehicles for lives, as the body is an instrument for the soul. "Lives of great men all remind us, we can make our lives sublime."

JESUS THE MAN.

Creative energy has evolved the manifestations of life from seemingly inert pebble and clay to the wondrous creature, Man. "What a piece of work is man; how noble in reason; how infinite in faculties; in form and moving, how express and admirable; in action, how like an angel; in apprehension, how like a god; the beauty of the world; the paragon of animals." Man's towering reason has arranged the vastness of space, filled with beauty and grandeur, to suit his taste, eye, fancy; harnessed the forces so wondrously potent that once they were looked upon as far beyond the conception of mortal mind, not to mention the grasp of his hand; when electricity is subservient and even the magnetic waves of earth and air are bearers of his messages. All history leads one to rest assured that Deity has said of Man, "This is my beloved son in whom I am well pleased." Nature lies an open book, a revelation of the Infinite; the sands upon the shores, the boulders on the mountain's rugged side and craigy top, speak in tones subdued, but mighty; the babble of the brook, the dashing of a great wave pushed by angry winds, the chirping wren, and trilling lark, the roaring lion and the whining tiger from jungle lair, all speak to listening ears—respond to souls anxious for a revelation of Divinity. The springing grass and violets of early Springtime, the wilting flowers and growing grain of sultry Summer, the fruition, nuts and seed, of Autumn's golden touch, aye, even the blast and chill of winter bleak and dismal, contains volumes of wisdom rare and most desirable. All, all this is a wondrous panorama to the several senses of man. As these whispering and thundering tones respond to the observations of man's physical senses, so there is constant response to the appeal of his spiritual senses. The angels of high Heaven stooped to earth on many occasions to find mouthpieces for their heaven-born ideas.

Nature, as seen by man, breathes in holy voice the revelation of Creative Energy, but Man is the one for whom such purpose moves. Note how animals become domesticated or extinct, and vegetation changes, as if by magic touched, when man and civilization, with their appendages move in majesty across a country or a continent.

So much nearer to our hearts, so much dearer, is the sweetness and purity of the life because Jesus was a man, born of woman. However much we may look up for the heavenly Christ, the divine, the immaculate, we will find vying in prominence to our gaze, the human impulses which every man inherits from the brightest jewel in memory's casket—Mother. Compassion which moved his heart toward the multitude, grew from mother's sympathy for the bruised finger and trivial misfortunes of childhood; no higher source is necessary for such qualities; provoked to chastisement on several occasions, no attribute of Deity, but a quality of man growing from mother's ability to correct and if necessary punish for the well-being of the child; moved to tears when contemplating a close walk in the path of duty (as when he prayed that the cup might pass), not the manner of a god but the behavior of a man cultivating the noble characteristics bequeathed by a loving mother who dampened the pillow many nights to decide, "which shall it be."

JESUS THE MEDIUM.

As tangible Nature has been a means of expression for life in its varied forms, so man has been the medium or mouthpiece for spiritual gifts of perception and reason. Our judgment does not lead us to presume that any preparations are made for divine revelation, other than the building of chaste characters that should stand for the actual purity of life, rather than the fleeting or seeming. Nor do we presume that the occasion of this exemplary life in which old teachings were to be taught and practiced, any exception was made. You are aware with a moment's thought that all of the teachings of Jesus, which breathe of divine origin are the precepts of former ages; the first and second commandments on which he declared hung the law and the prophets, had been taught by Confucius and others hundreds of years before the birth of this great Man and Medium—Jesus. In fact, that sweet singer, Ella Wheeler Wilcox has, both wisely and beautifully, said, "Whoever was begotten by pure love, and came desired and welcomed into life, is of immaculate conception. He whose heart is full of tenderness and truth, who loves mankind more than he loves himself, and cannot find room in his heart for hate, may be another Christ. We all may be the Saviors of the world if we believe in the Divinity which dwells in us, and worship it, and hail our grosser selves, our tempers, greeds, and our unworthy aims, upon the cross. Who giveth love to all; pays kindness for unkindness, smiles for frowns; and lends new courage to each fainting heart, and strengthens hope and scatters joy abroad—he, too, is a Redeemer, Son of God." This is the high state of Mediumship which exists in embryo in all minds. The philosophy of spiritual mediumship as taught and practiced by Spiritualists enables one to immediately see that our lives—yours and mine—are vehicles for the revelation of spiritual, aye, infinite things of greatness.

History discloses to us the fact that cycles of time bring forth conditions which form characters that are apparently endowed with especial qualities. India has her Buddha, with a following of three to one more than any other Messiah; no small number bow at the altars of Mohammed and most reverently acclaim, "Allah, Allah, Thou Almighty." Egypt, with her several Messiahs holds a pronounced influence over the entire world. So man in his true state of spiritual development is medium between his mortal condition and the Most High. The soul speaks and all space reverberates. Anxious ears listen for voices we thought were stilled, and angel whispers tremble in the air about us; pleading eyes seek to peer beyond the darkness of the tomb and familiar forms, in shining raiment clad, illuminate the gloomy surroundings. Longfellow says:

"Then the forms of our departed,
Enter at the open door;
The beloved, the true hearted,
Come to visit us once more."

JESUS THE CHRIST.

With such an estimation of Man, recognizing in him his true nature as a mediator (Medium) 'twixt mankind and mankind's Creator, we can but see the Christ in such a life. Our tolerance compels us to see the light which lighteth the life of every man that cometh into the world; to see the divine impulse (Christ) which moved Prince Siddartha to leave the luxury of his station as king's son and beautiful Yasodhara who dwelt in a "pleasant prison house where love was jailer and delight its bars," where "'was treason if a thread of silver strayed in tress of singing girl or nautch dancer, and every dawn the dying rose was plucked and dead leaves hid, all evil sights removed," to live for years in seclusion and grow to be a Buddha. This selfsame light doth light the altars of Egypt's Messiahs and of Mohammedan devotees.

The Man has become a Medium for helpful revelation and the comforting balm, the helpful courage, the abiding faith and hope—the Christ—has so outlived the man, the instrument, that we behold Jesus afar off, but the Christ our abiding guest, our unfading light. We picture the man Jesus in a sphere where such ethereal conditions prevail that garments are as but glistening sheen to adorn the characters of those who dwell in that blest sphere; the harmony so complete that thought waves serve as language with no harshness of verbal speech. With folded hands and countenance aglow, he stands in a floral paradise—on one side, perchance, a mound rising high, like some gayly liveried sentinel, behind an arch simple, but its simplicity too grand for any mighty monarch, to the other side a curving vale reaches out unto other graceful forms of beauteous display. Each covered deep with flowers of perfect form, and in color displaying every tint man's most vivid imagination can picture.

These are the prayers of earnest, needy souls of earth which perhaps found, below, no such garments as words, but wafted from the very soul to the great fountain of all good, they thus adorn the presence of this illustrious Man, this renowned Medium, this—Christ. "For at the gate of heaven an angel stands, and the prayers that children pray, change into flowers within his hands and by him are borne away." The formal mutterings and supplications void of spirit linger in the air no higher than the spires of costly edifices in the shadow of which children cry for bread, and at length fall like heavy stones upon the heart of the supplicant who was filled, perchance, with religious ecstasy, but lacked the Christ principle of Love and Life.

May the purposes of our life be so noble that they inspire us to love the Man, respect the Medium and practice the Christ, which is a principle living in embryo in each soul to-day and but needs to be called into activity to become the light and comfort, peace and gladness of our life; to reflect like qualities upon the pathway and into the souls of every one with whom we come in contact.

Missionary Work of G. W. Kates and Wife.

The month of December had been engaged by the First Church of Spiritualists in Pittsburg, Pa., presided over by C. L. Stevens. This has been a prosperous society for a number of years, and is a faithful supporter of the N. S. A. We had good meetings each Sunday morning and evening and Thursday evenings. With some cold weather and rainy days at the wrong dates, we feel that an earnest interest was manifest by the large attendance. With an earnest society back of the public worker, the latter will always be able to succeed. To the building of such societies we are urged by the N. S. A.

The local auxiliary now chartered needs help to obtain strength, and offers as necessary a field of labor for the missionary as does the unorganized locality. Hence, the instruction was given us to accept calls from auxiliary societies to help them, and also go wherever two or three may desire to hear the message of Spiritualism.

During the month we held meetings in Smithton and Duquesne, Pa., with a funeral at Lucyville. We will always lay aside any duty we can to minister at the season of sorrow that the transition of a loved one enforces. A special need for the filling of a date at New Haven caused the senior member of the the missionaries to go there and speak two nights, whilst Mrs. Kates conducted the week-night meeting in Pittsburg. We will hold a special N. S. A. benefit meeting at the hall in Pittsburg, Thursday January 2. That will make twenty-two meetings during the month—which we hope to do each month of the new year, or possibly will do better if the friends enroute will arrange for us. We sadly need the help of our friends in every locality we can visit. We have had several courtesies and helps extended us by R. W. Simpson, president of the Allegheny county society, which is organized for mission work. With the aid of local talent, Bro. Simpson is holding meetings in outlying towns and developing much interest thereby. The local cause in Pittsburg is helped by this plan of effort, and the general cause is having a growth that makes it possible for every county to achieve. Write for the plan to R. W. Simpson, 425 Diamond street, Pittsburg, Pa. He is also issuing The Psychic Magazine, which promises to fill a need and to embellish our public cause. Our spiritual press, each and all, are doing yeoman service for truth, and are good missionaries that should visit every home. We go to Wheeling, W. Va., for January 4 to 18. Thence to Gallipolis and Cincinnati, Ohio; Evansville, Ind.; and possibly Nashville and Memphis, Tenn., en route to Texas. Address us for open dates at 600 Pennsylvania avenue S. E., Washington, D. C.

STUDIES IN SPIRITUAL THOUGHT.

Healing Power of Thought--Rationale of Its Operation--Suggestion and Auto-Suggestion.

As I sat listening, in the Silence, I overheard two Voices conversing with each other. They were speaking of the power of thought, in some of its finer phases, and what it can accomplish.

I will endeavor to recall the substance of some of their remarks.

Especial emphasis was given to the health-giving and health-conserving influence of sweet pure thoughts; the beautiful potent factor for health of right-minded thoughts, etc.

One Voice observed: "There is another point in this matter, not yet known and realized as it should be. It is this: The power of the mind, when rightly controlled and exercised, to eliminate diseased conditions within the physical organism, its power to expel disease and induce healthful conditions.

"Why, there is power in the mind, by the exertion of suitable thought and will, to kill noxious microbes and hasten their expulsion from the physical organism. To will their destruction and expulsion, when one learns how to use his mind forces for that purpose, is to conquer. The mind has power to concentrate a current of disintegration and death upon such noxious organisms. Certainly the powers of the mind and directed will force for curative medical purposes are not fully apprehended, nor realized, either theoretically or practically. The force within, thus directed, will plant in them the seeds of death. Similarly other forms of disease may be mitigated, overcome and eradicated, by right action of the mind, in right will and thought."

"These are things the human mind is just beginning to learn. As yet only some spiritually enlightened minds are gaining glimpses of the truth and are reaching in experimental attempts at the realization of its conscious attainment. There are some who have attained in an intelligent degree the knowledge of how to control and use this power," was the response of the companion Voice.

"We know from observation, and it accords with the teachings of science, that in the lowest orders of organized animal life the senses are diffused throughout the whole bodily organism. For instance, the sense of sight, which has not yet been concentrated and concreted into a specialized organ of sight, or eye, is diffused through the whole body, inchoate and undifferentiated. The eyeless organism senses the light with every part of its body. So with hearing, and the other senses.

"The great mystery of spirit and life is and will remain a mystery. Spirit and life are in all sentient existences, and are the foundation of the senses, in all degrees, from very lowest to highest. In the lower organisms the mind is in a state of diffusion, as are the senses. In the higher organisms, notably in man, the mind, the seat of thought, has become focalized, consciously localized, in the brain, more apparently the front brain.

"In earlier and lower forms of life, the mentality, such as it is, acts equally and apparently with equal consciousness and will, in every part. In the higher development, such as man, this diffusive mind and will is very largely lost—as the seat of mind and will has become concentrated in the brain.

"But there remains yet a degree of diffused mind, and by means of proper action at the localized seat of mind in the brain, through will force, the diffused mind may be reinforced and prompted into action, in obedience to the command of the centred or governing mind enthroned in the brain.

"And this power may be so actualized and enforced as to dissipate diseased conditions of the body. By thought, will and command, man can send forces and set them at work, at any designated point or locality in the physical system, to expel diseased conditions and build up conditions of health."

There is yet another correlative view of the philosophy of mental or spiritual healing. All physical bodies are builded up of primal integral entities or forces which may be designated atoms, or any other term that may seem suitable. Each distinct atom is possessed of a mind force, a life principle, in itself, and it is the combination of these into one, that forms a larger personality, such as man, in whose organism each item performs its distinct part or duty.

According to one's power to intelligently command or direct the operations of these minute forces will be one's power to dissipate diseased conditions within one's physical organism.

After listening to this exposition of the rationale of this thought-cure, and the power of its use, I thought it well to experiment upon or within my own physical organism. I had been somewhat troubled with rheumatism in neck and left shoulder, also one knee. I began to will and command the forces within me to go to work with healing power and remove the wrong conditions and pain from the affected parts. To this I added, by inner suggestion, a reinforcement of muscular action at the points affected—seeming to bring into play a force of local muscular movement never before known within myself.

Well, the result was, speedy dissipation of the rheumatism.

I have also operated in like manner, with like good results, on other ills that flesh is heir to, within my bodily system.

Now note, this was within myself, the use by myself of my own forces; there was no bringing in of "God" or "Jesus," or "Christ," nor of any "spirit" outside of my own spirit, though such may have co-operated with me.

I do not doubt that the bringing in of these may be and is beneficial to those who think it is necessary, or proper and good, to do so. It may prove to such minds a helpful reinforcement; and "spirit" powers often assist in effecting cures. We may well and wisely ask their kindly, beneficent aid.

I give these "thoughts" and experiences just as they are, hoping to hear responses from others, that may add to our knowledge of mind and body and their interrelations.

SENDING HELPFUL THOUGHT TO OTHERS.

Telepathy is one of the established facts of spiritual science.

The power of mind, of thought, is still but dimly apprehended. The power of mind to span the realms of space and impress its thought upon other minds, is only faintly received and recognized even by close students and inquirers into occult lines.

The poetic mind is first in prophetic perceptions of the adumbrations of the inner light of truth; being open to the influx of thought from advanced spiritual spheres.

The idea that the thoughts sent out by one who is not in the possession of good physical health must have a tendency to induce sickness or disease instead of health, is not, I think, tenable. The vibrations of thought do not depend on or flow from the physical organism, but rather from the spiritual being or selfhood. Whether the influence of the thought vibrations are healthful and helpful will depend on their own spiritual character and the attitude of mind of their projectors. Even though he may be physically sick and diseased, he may send forth thoughts laden with earnest good will and sincere loving helpfulness of desire, and the thoughts will carry a meed of pure healing power. Their healing quality and force reside in the leaven of good will with which they are sent forth—reside in their spiritual nature, and not in the physical condition of the personality that projects them.

It is not the condition of the thinker's physical organism, but the spirit of the thinker's thought, that effects its healing influence.

Thought, as thought, goes forth from the spirit embodied as from the spirit disembodied; they are alike spiritual in their source and nature, and carry with them their own spiritual qualities and influence, partaking of or in accord with, the will, desire and intent of their sender.

Blessings or curses, such as we send out, will come back to us.

Unspoken thought projections are not carried by ordinary sound waves, or material vibrations of the air. As a finer force, thought is vibrated by or through the instrumentality of a far finer and more spiritual agency than common air; a spiritual ether which interpenetrates this coarser atmosphere of our earth, and which is adapted to fulfill these finer spiritual purposes of thought transmission.

Thought force wings its way through space and touches the spiritual recipient with its own vibrant qualities as intoned by the will of its sender; the spirit of the recipient, in nature's fine methods acts upon the physical organism to which it is related, translating the thought vibration into terms of physical health.

In this spiritual science of thought transmission, there seems an important fact to be considered, that there is something analogous to the conditions in telegraphy demanding what is known as the return current, forming an electric circuit, by which the current returns to its starting point.

So in this spiritual realm of thought vibration. If the projector sends forth pure, good, healthful vibrations, laden with good will, the same will be returned to him, laden with pure and healthful force, for his own benefit; if he sends forth malignant thoughts, laden with hate and evil desire, the return current will bring the same back, to his own moral and physical detriment.

Cheerfulness and hopefulness tend to the conservation of health; despondency, lugubriousness, fretfulness, animosity, hate, wrongful thought, and worry, beget and fasten diseased conditions of the physical system.

Agreement of Organization, and Subscription List.

For the purpose of forming a corporation to have for its object the acquiring of land and the building of a building or buildings thereon, and the maintaining and leasing of the same; one of the buildings to be so constructed that when complete it may be used for stores, offices, theatre, printing office or other business purposes as well as for and by the Spiritualist societies and people for the purpose of propagation, cultivation and expounding of their tenets, and of liberal higher and progressive thought and all matters pertaining thereto.

Said building to be known as the Spiritualist Temple, and to be erected in Oakland, California.

Said incorporation being for the purpose of providing funds for the purchase of said lands, and for the erection of said building and the incorporation and organization of said company.

We, the undersigned, each in consideration of the promise of the other, do each agree, one with the other to subscribe for and take a number of shares of the capital stock of said corporation as soon as formed, set opposite our respective names.

Said company to be incorporated for not less than 200,000 shares, shares to be of the par value of $1 each, and we do each agree to take and pay for the number of shares we do each hereby subscribe for, and pay therefor the par value of said shares as follows: Said shares shall be paid for 10 per cent on the first day of each quarter after the date of our individual subscription, and payment shall continue and be due the company on the first day of each quarter until the full par value of the stock has been paid by quarterly payments; we mean that said quarters shall be Jan. 1, April 1, July 1, Oct. 1 of each year; and we do each guarantee, one with the other to make all the payments as they fall due to the Central Bank, of Oakland, California, trustees for the fellow associates of this agreement, the said trustees being herewith instructed and empowered to pay said money over to the said proposed comapny as soon as incorporated, this agreement as soon as said company is incorporated shall be assigned by our said trustee to and for the benefit of the said incorporation to be incorporated.

Said incorporation shall be known as "The Spiritualist Temple Association" of Oakland, California.

It is understood that one-half of all the caiptal stock of said association shall be set aside in the treasury of said corporation, and can only be sold to the Spiritual Association and organizations. It is not the intention that any stock shall be sold at less than its par value.

We desire to have as large a building as it is possible to obtain subscriptions for; we have therefore left at this time the amount for which said company may be incorporated for, at a minimum amount, so that if the majority of the subscribers here to believe that a larger amount is warranted, that said company may be incorporated for and with a larger amount of caiptal stock.

Solicitors for subscriptions may be allowed five per cent as the money is paid in. Resident subscribers living in Oakland, California, are hereby authorized and empowered to incorporate said company as soon as in their judgment they deem befitting. All solicitors claiming or entitled to commission, must be duly authorized under contract signed by Charles F. Van Luven, of Oakland, Cal.

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

THE TWOWORLDS, MANCHESTER, ENGLAND.

THE OLD ORGANIST—A SPANISH GHOST STORY.

Spain, the romantic and ancient, teems with legends and ghost stories. These have been picturesquely told by the prince of Spanish story-tellers, A weird and touching tale in his collection is called "Perez, the Organist," and it is claimed to be true.

The story is of a poor blind organist, whose whole life had been dedicated to music. He played in an old, half-dilapidated church in Seville. Seated at the organ in a shadowy niche of the venerable church, he would elicit such strains from the time-worn instrument as mortal ears had never before heard. Under his fingers the old organ became a magic thing.

Crowds came to the church on purpose to hear the wonderful music. Rapt in the inspiration of the improvisator, the old man neither heard nor heeded them.

It was particularly at midnight mass on Christmas eve that the playing of Perez was most marvelous.

One Christmas eve the vast congregation that assembled to hear the music was doomed, it appeared, to disappointment. The service began, but the noble head, the pale, grand face of the blind misician did not appear. A rumor spread like fire through the church. Perez was ill. Perez was mortally stricken; he would never touch his beloved organ again.

It was some time before the consternation subsided; then, as another musician was about to ascend to the organ-loft, a second murmur ran through the assembly. This time it was a murmur of joy and relief. Perez appeared once more among them. Pale and feeble—evidently in the last stage of mortal weakness—he was borne by two men to his old place in the chair. He had insisted on coming to perform the task he loved best—to play the music for the midnight mass of Christmas eve. Not the commands of his physician nor the entreaties of his beloved daughter could prevent him

The celebration of high mass was recommenced. Soon came the solemn moment when the priest slowly raised the sacred host. A cloud of incense floated about the altar, the bell signalled the elevation. With trembling fingers Perez touched the keys.

A slow, prolonged, majestic harmony rose from the instrument—a vast volume of sound, the combined prayers of all humanity made vocal. Gradually it died away like the lulling of a mighty storm, and soft, caressing strains succeeded—the voices of angels wending their way earthward.

Next came the sound of hymns chanted from afar, a thousand blended in one. Gradually the elaborate combination of harmonies grew simpler, until only two voices were distinguished. Finally one voice alone, clear, thrilling, pleading, rose as on heavenly wings.

The priest bent down; the sacred emblem showed dimly through the fragrant incense mist. Still the sustained note of the maestro rose and soared, and expanded into a more and more magnificent burst of harmony.

Each separate note seemed in itself a complete theme, a superb melody; some low-voiced and tender, others fiery and passionate. All earthly and heavenly voices—of men and angels, worlds and space—seemed pouring out in their voices—made one by music—in a glorious hymn of praise for the Nativity.

The crowd held its breath to listen. The hands of the priest trembled. In that supreme moment it seemed to him that supernatural as well as human voices saluted the symbol he touched.

The many-voiced tones of the organ slowly died away one by one. A deep hush pervaded the church. Suddenly it was broken by a woman's cry—a cry of terror and anguish. The maestro was dead! He sat at his beloved instrument, his head bowed on the keys, his daughter kneeling by him, calling upon him to speak to her, and pressing the once magically endowed hands to her heart.

Christmas eve had come around once more. A young and arrogant musician of shallow capacity offered to play the mass. He had bitterly envied Perez his renown, and showed unfriendliness to the gentle old man. Now, as he seated himself before the organ, his face expressed a complacent self-confidence.

He pressed the keys, and almost at once he started and the color dropped from his cheeks. A magnificent burst of melody flooded the church. The people looked wildly at each other. It was the touch of Perez; it was his music; none could mistake it. Thunder-like, it rolled through the building, seeming, in the silence of the solemn midnight, to be the very voice of God.

Pale as death, the unhappy man at the organ seemed unable to take his hands from the keys, until at length the music died into silence. Then he staggered to his feet and descended from the organ-loft, a look of awe and terror upon his face. All knew why. Other hands than his had touched the keys that night.

Another year passed. Once more it was the eve of the Nativity. The abbess of the Convent of Santa Inez and Perez' daughter were talking in subdued undertones as they sat in the dimly lighted choir of the old musician's church. The bell summoned the faithful to prayer; but only a few worshipers obeyed the summons. One at a time these stragglers entered, touched the holy water, and took their places.

"You see," whispered the mother superior to her young companion, "your timidity is groundless. Hardly a score of people have come; everybody is flocking to the cathedral. Do, then, play the organ. You are among friends only. What can make you hesitate?"

"I am afraid," replied the young girl, shrinking back.

"Afraid? Holy Virgin! Of what?"

"Mother, I know not. Of something supernatural. Last night I heard you say you wished me to play at mass tonight, and, proud of the honor, I thought I would go into the church and practice a little, so as to get accustomed to the instrument. It was dusk when I came here, and not a soul was in the place. Far away, like a star shining on dark night, burned the lights of the high altar. By those lights I saw—mother, I am speaking the truth, and nothing but the truth—I saw a figure seated before the organ. He sat with his back turned toward me, and began to play the most wondrous strains mortal ears ever listened to. Suddenly he moved. I was going to say that he looked at me. That, he could not do, for he was blind. It was—it was my father!"

"Bah! sister, away with such fancies—mere temptings of the evil one. Say an Ave to St. Michael, leader of the angelic hosts, and he will drive away the bad spirits. Here, put my own rosary round your neck—it has just this moment touched the reliquary of St. Pacome—and go to your place, fearing nothing. See, the hour has struck; the faithful await the elevation. Be sure your sainted father will look down and bless his child upon this solemn anniversary."

The mother superior now took her seat among the nuns. The trembling girl, daring no longer to disobey, rose, slowly opened the door of the little staircase, and climbed to the organ loft.

The service began, and nothing unusual occurred till the consecration of the Host. Then the organ pealed forth a glorious strain, above which rose a piercing cry. The mother superior, followed by the nuns and some of the congregation, hastened up the staircase.

"Look at him—my father!" cried the girl, pointing with trembling fingers to the seat she had just quitted.

Nothing was seen; but still the organ continued to give out the same wonderful melodies of former Christmas eves. No visible fingers touched the keys. The musician's stool was empty.

WHY GROW OLD?

Patti Says, "Health Is Youth."

It is said they are asking in England what they shall do with their old men? But Irving says that a man in England is young until he is 70, so I think the question there is less embarrassing than in America. A. R. Serven, chief examiner U. S. Civil Service Commission, says that young men go at their work with more vim and enthusiasm, have greater elasticity and energy than the older ones, and that it is now difficult for a man above 40 to obtain a high business position with a new firm. This statement should put men of this age on their mettle, and prompt them to treat the first sign of age as they would an intended insult—do not give it recognition.

Why grow old? Why not preserve the health and powers? Consider what Roosevelt has done. Being delicate, before the age of 30, he went West and lived the life of a ranchman, became a rough rider, and built himself up by outdoor life, and indoor athletics. He now exercises three hours a day. Sandow, calling upon him at the White House, a short time ago, was astonished to find a man of such physique; such vigor and elasticity. He says, "His grip and steady eye are something unusual. I thought he would jump across the table. I make a business of physical culture, do not do anything else, and regard the President as the best athlete that I know. I think his example will do more for athletics and the advancing of physical culture in this country than all other causes combined."

So here is a man who has prudently prepared for the latter half of his life. He is quite up to date. There is a growing tendency to shelve people who do not keep up with the times. The question of carriage or transportation is an all-important one. An active mind in an active body is demanded now. Few people had the hardihood to mount a bicycle with hard rubber tires after the pneumatic came into use, knowing the epithet of "ice wagon" was in store for them at every corner.

George Ade tells us in a late fable, "How to wither a parent." A young lady has gone to a famous school for three months. On her return her father tells her he is glad to see her "hum agin," but her affection is not in evidence, and her greetings are not friendly greetings, but harsh criticism for his English and clothes. The contrast between father and daughter is very marked, and he is a good subject for the withering process. It is not such men as he who are forming the 100-year clubs in our large cities. They are men who have learned the value of air, water, exercise and diet, and every form of cleanliness.

Dr. Dio Lewis, the eminent physiologist of 30 years ago, used to tell about a man who consumed a plate of fried cakes or crullers every evening after supper, to "kinder sorter pass away the time." As a pastime, or solace for troubles, eating cannot be recommended after 40. At this age it is wise to take the mental view of life we had at 20, to go back to the time when life seemed rosy and not too serious, and take a new lease. At 60, if you use a cane, lay it aside. Don't stoop. Preserve contour. Be active. Avoid childishness and cultivate child-likeness and "Sound the bugle-call to all your powers."

The youngest people I know are old in years. They are interested in a revival of the Olympian games. As life is warmth, and warmth aids life, these cold days suggest that men of all ages lay aside their derby hats, and wear good comfortable caps, and pull them well down over the ears; turn up the high coat collar, and preserve or protect as far as possible the delicate brain structure. Wear the shirt collars two sizes too large, and all underwear very loose, so as not to impede circulation, as the veins are very near the surface of the skin.

Patti inherited a weak constitution from her mother. Her manager, knowing this, and the value of her voice, gave her the treatment from the age of 6 years that would be given a thoroughbred horse, and now at the age of 60 she does not look older than 30. She says that "every time one is ill a part of remaining youth is squandered, and that health is youth; that wrinkling of the skin is a disease, but, that the affliction is so general that we entertain the illusion that it is inevitable." She says, "You may all do what I have done, if you commence early enough." No gray hairs, no gold in teeth, no evidence of age. She had a marvelous voice to guard, but may we not say, "A charge to keep I have," if we believe the body to be a temple?

"Oh, discontented man, whate'er you want, pay the price, and take it." Take vitality, long life, usefulness to the last. Self-help is the only help there is. Physical Perfection by D. H. Jacques is a standard work on this subject. There is much in the daily press to assist, and a dozen or more fine health journals.

Is there no age? No death of youth? We know all may cultivate the things enumerated; vim, enthusiasm, elasticity and energy. There is no monopoly of them at the present time, just as there is no monopoly of knowledge.

. . . OF . . .

OCCULT MYSTERIES.

THE HYPNOTIC TRANCE WHICH CAN MAKE CERTAIN PERSONS FAMOUS.

DR. QUACKENBOS' THEORY.

This is not a religion; it is a science based on the belief in two selfs to each finite body—the mind self and the matter self; the objective, superior self and the subjective, inferior self. When the objective self is in a hypnotic state, and receives a new suggestion from some other mind, it retains it and on awakening that new suggestion governs the subjective self, which is the body.

Wonderful story of Dr. Quackenbos, who declares that by means of hypnotism he has raised an actress from a subordinate position to a leading role in a play now running in a Broadway theatre. Experiments in mind suggestion which he claims have resulted in the achievement of success by his subjects in various walks of life.

"An actress who is inspired through suggestion to reach the heights of histrionic art is inspired forever."

"Americanitis."—A new nervous disease which, according to Dr. Quackenbos, is produced by the terrific mental strain of the struggle for success in the United States, and which may be cured by hypnotism.

"Really, Dr. Quackenbos, have you hypnotized an actress into success?"

"Many of them."

"And singers?"

"And singers."

"And musicians and authors and playwrights? And made drunkards sober, and thieves honest, and wise men out of fools?"

"Guilty," said the doctor, smiling, and his china-blue eyes gazed into brown ones that were wide with wonder.

"Are you a wizard?"

"No. I am a scientist."

The man who has got the whole town guessing who may be the particular star in the Broadway dipper that twinkles at his command invited me to be seated.

His hand waved toward a dainty couch with a snowy pillow at its head.

It suggested subjects and seances. I declined. I've no ambition to be a great actress. We've more of them now than I can pay to go see.

"You mustn't think," said the doctor positively, "because I can make a stage favorite from a stage 'stick' that I'm populating the stage with a series of Trilbys. My subjects don't walk up and get their little laurel wreaths in a trance. It isn't any force of mine nor any will of mine that regulates their efforts.

"They are working and struggling for their fame just like anybody else—with this difference: They are pursuing their course intelligently, with a grip on the mental and moral forces in their lives which they did not have before they awoke to full realization."

"When did they wake up?"

"When they went to sleep," said the doctor, paradoxically. "It is merely the result of suggestion made to my patients while they are in hypnotic sleep.

"The actress I mentioned in my lecture the other night, which has given me so much unpleasant notoriety, is at present playing to crowded houses on Broadway. When she came to me she had never been heard from.

"Her parts were always minor ones, and it was with difficulty she filled those satisfactorily. Yet I have never known a woman who was more ardent in her desire to accomplish. Her whole soul was wrapped up in her art, her whole heart was in it, till it overflowed with the feeling she wanted to express and couldn't.

"Many an actress has just missed greatness for lack of the power to feel her parts. This one was missing it for lack of the power to express what she felt.

"She was the most hopeless being imaginable as she sat on that couch and stated her case. 'I would give it all up,' she said, 'only somehow I feel it is my life's vocation and I've got it in me. Something is keeping it back.'

"That something was the lack of confidence, the lack of energy. Her belief that she 'had it in her' was nothing more actual than hope—and hope alone never got anyone into the king row. It requires more decisive, vital qualities.

"These qualities I supplied to the actress in question by the method of suggestion during hypnotic sleep.

HER TALENTS REVEALED TO HER

"When her eyes had closed and her mind was thoroughly under my control I told her of the talents she possessed, of the possibilities before her, of the future which would be a long line of successes. 'You are now in perfect control of all your faculties,' I said 'You have poise, you have confidence, you have ease and grace and power of natural expression. You will never again fear failure, for failure is not in you.'

"When she awoke she was a different being. She arose from the couch and looked two inches taller. Her eyes flashed and her head was thrown back.

"'Doctor,' she said, and there was a ring in her voice that vibrated through everything in the room, 'I'm going to make a success of this thing. I was mad to think of giving up. Why, I'm an actress to my finger-tips, and I'm going to make the whole world know it.'

"And the whole of the play-going world does know it," added the doctor, nodding his head so emphatically that his eighty-year-old white hair fell over his forty-year-old pink face and convinced me beyond the power to express a doubt.

"'It must be very gratifying," I said.

"It is magnificent," he replied warmly. "All the discoveries of science are splendid. They make for man's comfort and progress.

"But the science which makes for man himself, which expands his soul, enlarges his character, helps discover him his talents and the means for developing them to the fullest, surely that science means most of all to mankind."

"But you can't always make a man through hypnotic suggestion?"

"You can always improve him."

"Suppose the actress who came to you hadn't had any talent. Could you have put it there?"

"Hardly. I'm not a 'Mother Eddy.' I don't profess to be divine, nor have I any gifts to distribute. I am not taking the truth of hypnotic suggestion and attempting to build a religion on it, as the Christian Scientists have done. This is not a religion. It is a science based on the belief in two selves to each finite body—the mind self and the matter self; the objective, superior self, and the subjective, inferior self.

"The mind or objective self is a thing utterly distinct from the subjective self, which it governs. When the objective self is in a hypnotic state and receives a new suggestion from some other mind it retains it, and on awakening that new suggestion governs the subjective self, which is the body.

"The suggestion, however, would have to be along lines of talent possessed by the patient. The very fact that a subject seeks perfection along certain lines, however, argues that there is talent, wanting only the proper expression to make itself manifest."

"Have you ever failed with an actress?"

IMPEDIMENT EASILY REMOVED.

"Never. A woman who wants to be an actress badly enough to make all the sacrifices the profession demands usually has talent. The impediment which checks its expression is often of the simplest character, easily removed by hypnotism, and the necessary qualities at the same time supplied.

"They come to me for self-confidence, for inspiration, for faith in their powers of impersonation, for the emphasizing of grace and dignity and magnetism and individuality."

"And they get it?"

"It is the easiest thing in hypnotism."

"Does it last?"

"Forever. An actress who is inspired through hypnotism to reach the heights of histrionic art is inspired forever. In such cases I conclude the suggestions to the sleeper with the assurance that the good work accomplished can never be undone."

"Is the power of suggestion always so lasting?"

"No. There is less certainty in treating for the elimination of vices. In that case there is always temptation to offset the good accomplished. To one who has become a successful actress or singer or musician or writer through the medium of suggestion there is no temptation to fall back and become an inferior artist. There is nothing fascinating about mediocrity, but vice in these days is made most alluring.

"Besides, in the case of the artiste the new life is more satisfying than the old, while in the case of the drunkard, for instance the habit that is cured deprives him of a stimulant.

"So I divide the science of hypnotic suggestion into two classes—destructive and constructive. It is not sufficient to eliminate vice; something better must be put into the empty place.

"When people come to be treated for the liquor, cigarette or morphine habits I accomplish results by degrees. I impress upon the minds under my control that more than three drinks or three cigarettes or three doses of morphine a day will make them violently ill; that it will not only nauseate them, but undermine their constitutions.

"Sometimes it has already done so. You can have no conception of the prevalence of these vices among men and women.

"The morphine habit is the hardest to cure. It is almost impossible to get control of a mind so deadened by drugs that it passes aimlessly from one subject to another. If a patient has partaken of any sort of false stimulant before a treatment, it is almost impossible to get control of the mind."

"Must a subject be a willing one?"

"Yes—or made willing. There is compulsory hypnotism, but it is not advisable."

"What is it?"

"Sleep induced by drugs."

"Is the suggestion just as effective?"

"Yes, perhaps more so; for there can then be no resistance. Sinners are not always repentant, you know. Few people addicted to the morphine habit really want to be cured—they like it; and how many drunkards want to give up drinking? Drunkards like the pleasure they fancy they derive from drinking. It's usually a good deal harder to make them want to be cured than to cure them. In almost all cases they come through other influences—a wife, or a mother or sister.

"One of the most pitiful cases I have had was a mother who came through the solicitations of her daughter to be cured of the morphine habit. There are innumerable cases of women drunkards in excellent families. Once they are willing to be cured, the rest is easy. Construction is swift in their cases. There is so much to be gained by a cure—the happiness of their loved ones, the respect of friends, beauty, health, position in society.

"These new suggestions working in a purified mind create pleasurable excitement in place of what is missed.

"For men there is the construction of new hopes for health and home and career. When I have convinced the sleeper that he loathes the vice which has been mastering him, that he has crushed it out and will fall no more, I impress upon his mind the new things he has gained: Vitality, ambition, new interest in his profession and in society of a higher plane."

"Is it necessary to hypnotize a man to make him realize the advantage of morality?"

SERMONS HAVE NO EFFECT.

"It's very evident," replied the doctor, "that you haven't had experience in reforming criminals. The most beautiful sermons in the world mean nothing but words to them. The grief and pleadings of their families become a bore. The most beautifully balanced logic—cause, effect, remedy or ruin—laid before them with patience and skill, has no effect. Why? Because you can't inculcate new, pure principles into a mind poisoned by vice. The canker must be eliminated—and that is an act which it is almost impossible for a helpless victim to do for himself.

"Like kleptomania, I have cured hundreds of patients of this disease. People who have had no experience with it cannot realize how terrible it is. It is a disease of the nerves, resulting, perhaps, from refractory nerves for generations back. The kleptomaniac usually has had some one in his family who was a morphine eater, or a drunkard, or a tobacco fiend or a lunatic.

"The desire to steal is just as ungovernable as the inclination to open or close your eyes. It is impulse, entirely unpremeditated, and the victim is in no way responsible for it. You could talk morality to the kleptomaniac till doomsday, it would have no effect.

"They suffer the penalties more keenly than those around them.

"They are branded as thieves and of inferior morality, when in fact they are suffering from the disease of moral hysteria."

"And hypnotism can cure them?"

"Absolutely. I've had a score of cases, some of them of the most vicious character, and there has never been a lapse. Of course, I am in no position to say there never will be. I should have to wait till the end of time to make that statement. But some of the cures have been remarkable. Most of them have been children, and these are very susceptible to the new suggestion. If mothers could only be made to realize that the moral health of their children is equally as important as their physical health, and should be studied and watched just as carefully, they would, in nine cases out of ten, discover that the wayward child who lies and steals may be at heart perfectly honest—its crimes resulting from mental hysteria, the fruit of a mother's unhealthy nerves before it was born.

"Now," continued the doctor earnestly, "I know of no other way to correct these perversions than through hypnotic suggestion. Scoldings and punishments may correct a fault; they cannot cure a disease. And, when the disease in the child is neglected and allowed to grow with its character, that is where we may look for our criminals and social lepers."

"Can you cure grown-up kleptomaniacs?"

"I have. One patient of mine who had more jewels than she knew what to do with had a mania for stealing rubies. On one occasion she went into a Broadway jeweler's and slipped an uncut ruby in her mouth. When the jeweler accused her she swallowed it. He sent a bill to her husband—which the husband promptly paid. The next bill he paid was for my treatment—which was less costly than the ruby habit. I hear from the husband periodically and there has been no recurrence.

"One of my most singular cases was a medical friend in high standing who had an income of $30,000 a year. This man never dined or lunched out that he didn't steal food from the table. He certainly wasn't in need of it, and after he stole it made no use of it beyond ruining his clothes and keeping his tailors busy. He used to have his bureau drawers and desk full of eatables in a more or less defunct state, which he was embarrassed to dispose of, fearing detection. It took a number of sittings to thoroughly cure this man, for he'd been at it a number of years. He has never relapsed since the cure, however, for his objective self is in control, and once it gets control, it retains it."

"Is there anything hypnotic suggestion won't cure?"

"Yes; it won't cure organic diseases; it won't make a hopeless lunatic sane—at least it never has—and it won't mend broken bones."

"What are the most frequent cases?"

"Americanitis."

The doctor loves a little mystery. He likes to make statements full of long names and cubby-holes and puzzle pictures. Then when one has guessed and guessed and thrown one's self at the mercy of the court with a hopeless "Well, I give it up," he takes the bad guesser by the hand and leads him amiably through the labyrinth of his thought curves.

"Americanitis," repeated the doctor, amiably; "that's nerve hysteria. It develops in all kinds of unexpected ways, and sometimes, if it develops long enough, it becomes insanity.

"Americanitis produces all kinds of false tastes. Of course, stimulants are among the first. One man came to me to be cured of the chocolate bonbon habit. It came upon him suddenly, and he simply couldn't curb it. He ate chocolates till he lost his appetite for all nourishing food, ruined his digestion, suffered from nausea, headache, dizziness. He was a man past the prime of life, and I think the absurdity of the situation hurt him as much as anything.

It was simply a case of overwrought and wornout nerves, which often find an outlet in eccentric form. The horror of bonbon eating had become a nightmare with him, and the weaker his health became the less able was he to cope with it. One seance wiped out the folly, quieted his nerves, convinced him of the foolhardiness of letting his business go to ruin for the sake of chocolate bonbons, and put his superior self in control. I think he could be shipwrecked now with a cargo of chocolates at his command, and he wouldn't be tempted.

"American women are victims of all kinds of nervous hysteria. Their birthright is apt to be a set of nerves that are like bells out of tune. The society life of the period is ruinous. Society women come to me whose lives are a strain which no husky day laborer could stand. They are afflicted with all sorts of hallucinations and imaginings. Sometimes it's a suicidal tendency; often it's a disposition to suspect everyone of murderous intent, or the fear that they are losing their fortune, or strange voices that are insistent.

"Remember one thing, however," said the doctor earnestly, "when I make an author or an actress, I don't stand as manager or inspiration, or control; I am no Svengali. I am doing nothing that is not being experimented with all over Europe to-day. I am simply awakening the better selfs of men and women, and making them masters of their own destiny."—New York Sunday World.

OCCULT FORCES.

Ghosts Haunt an Illinois Farm.

Clinton, Iowa, Dec. 26—According to reports which have reached this city, there are ghosts and uncanny things at the Bastian farm, just across the river in Rock Island county, Illinois. This farm has been conducted lately by a tenant named William Hoffman, who, with his wife and family, lived on the premises. Mrs. Hoffman has now gone away, and her husband says he will follow her as soon as he can dispose of his effects. The reason for leaving is that they cannot longer stand the midnight prowlings of the spirits of Bastian's victims.

Some years ago the body of a man who had worked for Bastian was found in the road a short distance from the farmhouse. Bastian at first advanced the theory that the man had met his death by falling from his horse, and this was accepted until it was shown that he had been murdered, his injuries being such that it would have been impossible to have received them in a fall. At the inquest this fact was clearly brought out, but Bastian was not suspected until the mysterious disappearance of a number of his former employes were recalled. It was found that eight or ten men had worked for Bastian, letting their wages accumulate until they amounted to a considerable sum, and that about the time when they would begin to urge payment they would mysteriously disappear. Bastian generally had some plausible excuse to offer for their sudden departure, and it was not until he left the body of this particular victim in the road that his wholesale butcherings were discovered.

Proof of Bastian's guilt was obtained by a search of his farm, which resulted in six bodies being dug up. He was arrested but committed suicide in jail without making any statement. While he was in custody the sheriff took a number of citizens and made a thorough search of the farm. At that time four partially decomposed bodies were unearthed, the remains being fully identified as those of men who had been in Bastian's employ. Further inquiry brought out the fact that all of these victims had told neighboring farm hands and friends that Bastian owed them money, and that they were having a hard time to get any satisfaction from him. Later three more bodies were found, and a few days ago Hoffman, who had rented the farm, dug up the body of August Johnson, another man who had worked for Bastian. Hoffman was digging a ditch at the time in a field near the house and found the remains of Johnson but a few feet from the surface. Several people with whom Johnson was intimate at once told of his quarrels over money matters with his former employer, and of his sudden disappearance one night after having announced his intention of bringing suit the next day to recover the amount due him.

This makes eight bodies already found, and one of Bastian's neighbors says he knows where another is buried, but is afraid to give details from fear of being mixed up in the tragedy. The names of the victims that have been identified are Fred Kuschman, John Lauderback, Marshall Lewis, Fred Kreinsen, Alex Sternberg, Ernest Miller, Hugh Cafferty, and August Johnson. In addition to these two more men are unaccounted for, making ten in all that Bastian murdered. Love of money is supposed to have been the motive that prompted Bastian to commit these wholesale butcheries. He was a miser and is said to have had $10,000 buried on his farm, but it has never been found, although a close search has been made.

It was the uneasiness of the spirit of Johnson that caused Hoffman and his wife to abandon the farm. For some time before his body was found Johnson's ghost is said to have been prowling around at night trying to attract the attention of somebody who would dig up his remains and give them Christian burial. At least this is the inference to be drawn from the statements of the Hoffmans. Their slumbers were disturbed night after night by uncanny groans and noises, which at first gave Hoffman little uneasiness, but annoyed Mrs. Hoffman seriously. At last the ghost became so persistent in his efforts that Hoffman himself, who is a man of hard common sense, became worried and started on a tour of the farm to look for the body, but he found nothing until he ran across Johnson's remains by accident a day or so later. Even this did not allay the ghostly visitations, and Hoffman is now apprehensive that he will be tormented until the rest of the victims are found and decently interred. And, as he says, there's no telling how much of a job this may be, as nobody knows exactly how many men were killed there. That there are two besides those already found seems certain.—Chicago Inter Ocean.

Moses Hull Has Another Visitant From the Other Side of Life.

Moses Hull, the veteran worker, has had another Vision, which will be spread before our readers next week. It is one that will be read with deep interest, and which conveys an important lesson. Every Spiritualist in the United States should read it; every Spiritualist, however, will not read it, for there are millions who take no Spiritualist paper, hence are in darkness in reference to what is going on in our ranks. Such being the case, each of our subscribers can find an ample field in which to do some missionary work—calling the attention of the Spiritualists who take no Spiritualist paper, to The Progressive Thinker. Send in one additional subscriber, at least, and thus aid in the great reformatory work now going on. The Progressive Thinker will continue to lead in all things that pertain to our movement.

HISTORY OF SPIRITUALISM

A Call for Facts and Testimony.

I wish to obtain definite information on certain specific points from which I may select such as I deem important for history.

In the line of phenomena, under the following heads:

1. Rappings. (a) Under conditions that leave no room for suspicion of fraud; (b) intelligence communicated by means of rappings communicating facts which were unknown to any one present, and afterwards verified as correct; (c) evidence thus communicated that the agent producing the raps was a human being, with memory of past events; (d) rappings made at a distance from any mortal person; (e) raps that were directed by an intelligence that could hear questions, read the alphabet, arrange letters to spell words, and count objects not visible to any mortal present.

Example: Isaac Post once related to me some experiences with the Fox Sisters, one of which was that he picked up a handful of shot—or peas—and asked the spirit how many he held, and the raps gave the exact number. As many facts of this kind as can be well established, by reliable witnesses, are desirable. The same authority related that, while riding with these mediums, raps came upon the dashboard, floor, seat, and sides of the carriage, and on trees as they passed them, and answered questions intelligently. Such facts should be established by evidence from various sources, always of a reliable character, with no looseness of statement.

2. Moving of heavy bodies without mortal control. (a) whether such movements were slight or vigorous; (b) lifting of heavy bodies and holding them suspended in a good light, with no one touching them, or any possible trick machinery, or secret cords or springs to move them; (c) intelligence, connected with these movements, not traceable to any carnate being; (d) the power manifested by these bodies to move against the resisting strength of vigorous men; (e) levitation of the medium in the light, witnessed by wide-awake investigators; (f) levitation in the dark, when conditions are such as to leave no chance for deception.

3. Playing upon pianos, organs, etc., when locked, in the light. (a) the same in darkness; (b) character and quality of the music; (c) other instruments played when no mortal touched them, in the light; (d) the same in darkness; (e) quality of music.

4. Passing solids (apparently) through solids. This class needs the most careful and pains-taking examination, and thoroughness of critical analysis, eliminating every factor of uncertainty, every possibility of trick.

5. Transferring bodies of matter or human bodies from place to place without any mortal control. The carrying of persons (mediums) across Niagara, or over miles of space, has been many times reported. But as mediums can walk, run, or ride, as they may elect, and might plan a secret escapade, it should be attested by the strongest proof, and every doubtful factor eliminated, before it is worthy to be chronicled as reliable history. How much proof is there of these phenomena? Who can present it, and fortify it so as to leave no reasonable doubt?

6. Personal benefits and special reforms, realized by the influence of spirits; (a) on mediums under their control; (b) on others not mediums, by the influence of spirit teachings, persuasions, or warnings; (c) health restored, evil habits overcome by spirit influence. Example: Many have been cured of the tobacco habit, of alcoholism, and profanity. Give strong cases of this sort, and others, such as curing the opium habit, rescuing from attempts at suicide, exposing and preventing criminal plots, and protecting the innocent from wrongs designed against them.

7. Large movements, public reforms, philanthropic enterprises, emancipation of slaves, or the serfs of Russia, by direction or counsel of spirits. On this let us have the most direct and definite testimony attainable. Facts, dates, names of mediums and nature of the messages that moved public men to act. In this connection, too, there is much connected with the civil war that should not be omitted.

8. Prophecies made by spirits that were definite and verified, or partly verified. In this department let us include (a) special forecasts of individual careers, and (b) the clear and unequivocal prophecies of public events, great fires, floods, cyclones, train wrecks, shipwrecks, earthquakes, wars, and the rescues from disaster or death by direct spirit intervention. There has been much guessing misnamed prophecy, and sometimes they have guessed right. But there are prophetic gifts by which future events are definitely forecast, and it is these we want.

Instance: Mrs. Herrick, of Horse Heads, N. Y., has made as many as fifty direct prophecies, fully forty of which have been fulfilled, and many of them were very definite. On one occasion she described a building on fire, and it burned down. She heard the fire bell strike twice, and no more. Within a week that building was consumed by fire. The fire bell was rung, and at the second stroke the rope broke and it rung no more. This will do for a starter. But there is a wide field to be covered that is not even hinted at in this letter.

Now I would suggest: All who can give any of the data mentioned here are invited to send them to me—or publish if preferred, but be critically exact in all the details of evidence, and in describing phenomena. Do not multiply words, but tell it as directly as possible, but use words enough to make it clear. Write plainly. Whenever names of actors are a necessary part of a statement, due credit will accompany the same; but no attempt at personal puffing or special eulogy will be in order, beyond a direct and truthful statement of facts.

At first I want mostly what belongs to the first decade of Modern Spiritualism, from 1848 to 1858. As few of the original actors are left, it is important to get their evidence in first. A few come to mind of those who remain, such as J. S. Loveland, Dr. J. M. Peebles, Dr. Fred L. H. Willis, A. J. Davis, R. D. Jones, George A. Bacon, Genl. Bullard, Hudson and Emma Tuttle, A. G. Smith, J. Clement Smith, and perhaps Clara Field Conant, but she may not date back to the first decade. But I appeal to every old veteran, who can furnish reliable data from the first ten years—1848 to 1858—to favor me with such facts as he can substantiate that might be useful in writing a thorough history of Modern Spiritualism. Of course there is much already in print to cull from. But some of this may need trimming and verifying to fit it for a standard work.

In a future letter I will give a sketch of the other leading subjects to be developed. I want to prepare a thoroughly reliable history, without exaggerating anything, or allowing any prejudice, pro or con, to shadow the truth. In this work I think all true Spiritualists are concerned.

AGENTS WANTED.

THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH,

Or the Future Life According to Science. By Louis Figuier. Translated from the French by S. R. Crockee. A very fascinating work. This fine volume might well have been entitled Spiritualism Demonstrated by Science. It is written in that peculiar interesting style in which French writers excel when they would popularize scientific subjects in adaptation to the needs of the general reader. The author says: "There is a true and respectable idea in Spiritualism," and regards as proved "the fact of communication between superhumans and the inhabitants of earth." Price, $1.50.

"THE DREAM CHILD,"

A Fascinating Romance of Two Worlds. By Florence Huntley. Price, cloth, 75 cents. Books like "The Dream Child" spur humanity on to make more and more demands of this nature, and will open up new heights and depths of spiritual knowledge.—Ella Wheeler Wilcox. Will, I believe, take its place beside Bulwer's "Zanoni" and the "Seraphita" of Balzac.—Daily Capital, Topeka, Kansas. Although simple and unvarnished with any inflammable descriptions, enthralls the mind to the exclusion of other thoughts, until reluctantly the reader closes the last page.—Minneapolis Sunday Times.

HELIOCENTRIC ASTROLOGY,

Or Essentials of Astronomy and Solar Mentality, with Tables of Ephemeris to 1910. By Yarmo Vedra. With 64 illustrations, 35 of which are original drawings by Holmes W. Merton, author of "Descriptive Mentality." A new system of personally determining the primary fund of Mental and Physical forces and their results in mental aptitudes that dominate the nature of the individual as based upon date of birth. Price, cloth, $1.50.

ASTRAL WORSHIP By J. H. Hill, M. D. A valuable contribution to the current discussion of religious problems. The author by illustrations and a planisphere (a representation of the celestial sphere upon a plane with adjustable circles), traces most of the myths which lie at the base of Christianity to their origin in sun and star worship. The astronomical facts given possess great value, the illustrations rare and curious. The book is bound in only one style—heavy boards. Price $1.

Father Tom and the Pope,

Or a Night at the Vatican. Written probably by Sir Samuel Ferguson. From Blackwood's Edinburg Magazine. This is a humorous account of a rollicksome visit to the Pope of Rome by Father Tom, an Irish priest, armed with a superabundance of Irish wit, two imperial quart bottles of Irish "poteen," and an Irish recipe for "convounding" the same. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

MOLLIE FANCHER,

The Brooklyn Enigma.

An authentic statement of facts in the life of Mary J. Fancher, the psychological marvel of the nineteenth century. Unimpeachable testimony of many witnesses. By Abram H. Dailey. With illustrations. Price, cloth, $1.50.

The Blue Laws of Connecticut.

Taken from the Code of 1650, and the public records of the colony of Connecticut previous to 1655, as printed in a compilation of the earliest laws and orders of the general court of Connecticut; also an account of the persecution of witches and Quakers in New England. Some extracts from the Blue Laws of Virginia. Price 25 cents.

JOYS BEYOND THE THRESHOLD

A Sequel to The To-morrow of Death.

By Louis Figuier. Translated from the French. The To-morrow of death was written to develop the idea of the principle of the permanence of the human soul after death, and its reincarnation in a chain of new beings, whose successive links are unrolled to the bosom of ethereal space. "Beyond the Threshold" continues on the same lines, enlarging and expanding the idea by reasons and considerations drawn from science and philosophy, claiming that the certainty of a new birth beyond our earthly end is the best means of arming ourselves against all weakness in the presence of death, and that the help offered by science and philosophy to that end is far superior to that of any of the existing religions. From beginning to end it is interesting, entertaining, instructive and fascinating, and whether one accepts it all or not, much will have been learned and much pleasure enjoyed in its perusal. Price, $1.25.

The Spiritual Wreath.

A collection of words and music for the choir, congregation and social circle. By S. W. Tucker. Comprises sixty or more gems of song. Price, 15 cents.

THE OTHER WORLD AND THIS.

A compendium of Spiritual Laws. No. 1, New White Cross Literature. By Augusta W. Fletcher, M. D. In this volume the author, in the thirty-nine chapters, discusses a wide variety of subjects pertaining to Spiritualism, from a spiritualistic standpoint. She evinces the powers of a trained thinker, both in matter of thought and fine literary style, and capability of thought expression. The subjects are well handled with conciseness and yet with clearness. It will prove a rich addition to any Spiritualist's library, and a most excellent book for any one seeking information concerning Spiritualism and its teachings. Price $1.50.

THE DIAKKA. The Diakka and Their Earthly Victims. By the Seer A. J. Davis. A very interesting and suggestive work. It is an explanation of much that is false and repulsive in Spiritualism, embodying a most important recent interview with James Victor Wilson, a resident of Summer Land. Price, 50 cents.

Psychopathy, or Spirit Healing.

A series of lessons on the relations of the spirit to its own organism, and the interrelation of human beings with reference to health, disease and healing. By the spirit of Dr. Benjamin Rush, through the mediumship of Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond. A book that every healer, physician and Spiritualist should read. Price, $1.50.

Views of Our Heavenly Home.

By Andrew Jackson Davis. A highly interesting work. Price, 75 cents. Postage 5 cents.

THE GOSPEL OF BUDDHA,

According to Old Records. By Dr. Paul Carus. A translation made from Japanese, under the auspices of the Rev. Shaku Soyer, delegate to the Parliament of Religions. Was published in Japan. Price, $1.

KAREZZA Ethics of Marriage. By Alice B. Stockham, M. D. Karezza makes a plea for a better birthright for children, and aims to lead individuals to seek a higher development of themselves through most sacred relations. It is pure in tone and aim, and should be widely circulated. Price, cloth, $1.

THE GOSPEL OF NATURE

Is a most excellent work by Dr. M. L. Sherman, assisted by Prof. W. F. Lyon. Heretofore it has been sold for $2, but the price now has been reduced to $1. It is a book that will interest and instruct. It contains 280 pages, and is full of suggestive thoughts. Dr. Sherman was a medium of rare qualities, and his work is a reflection from the celestial spheres.

SPIRITUAL HARP A collection of Vocal Music for the Choir, Congregation and Social Circles. By J. M. Peebles and J. O. Barrett; E. H. Bailey, Musical Editor. New edition. Culled from a wide field of literature with the most critical care, free from all theological bias, throbbing with the soul of inspiration, embodying the principles and virtues of the spiritual philosophy, set to the most cheerful and popular music (nearly all original) and adapted to all occasions, it is doubtless the most attractive work of the kind ever published. Its beautiful songs, duets and quartets, with piano, organ or melodeon accompaniment, adapted both to public meetings and the social circles. Cloth, $1.25; postage, 14 cents.

A. SCHOPENHAUER ESSAYS.

Translated by T. B. Saunders. Cloth. 75 cents. "Schopenhauer is one of the few philosophers who can be generally understood without a commentary. All his theories claim to be drawn direct from facts, to be suggested by observation, and to interpret the world as it is; and whatever view he takes, he is constant in his appeal to the experience of common life. This characteristic endows his style with a freshness and vigor which would be difficult to match in the philosophic writing of any country, and impossible in that of Germany."—Translator.

THE SOUL OF THINGS;

Or Psychometric Researches and Discoveries. By Wm. and Elizabeth M. F. Denton. A marvelous work. Though concise as a text book it is as fascinating as a work of fiction. The reader will be amazed to see the curious facts here combined in support of this power of the human mind, which will resolve a thousand doubts and difficulties, make geology plain as day, and throw light on all subjects now obscured by time. Price, $1.50. In three volumes, cloth bound, $1.50 each. Postage, 10c per copy.

THE AGE OF REASON By Thomas Paine. Being an investigation of True and Fabulous Theology. A complete edition of 186 pages, post 8vo. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

A Few Earnest Thoughts.

The new year now opening on us portends much to Spiritualism.

There is ever going on a garnering up of the past, as stepping stones for future progress.

In view of the advances made in the diffusion of facts and knowledge of Spiritualism, and especially its gain in the recognition of its salient evidences by men of standing as educators and scientists, who after careful and honest investigation have openly acknowledged their adhesion to the spiritual theory of important manifestations, Spiritualists have reason to rejoice, not only in what has been accomplished, but to look forward with joyful expectancy of still greater progress during the coming year.

This year should be a year of strong endeavor, of earnest work, of sincere and hearty effort for the upbuilding of our cause in all the essential features of permanence, strength and beauty.

A principal and mighty factor in securing solid permanence and strength to local societies is a well conducted Progressive Lyceum. No society is justified in expecting solid growth and permanent strength without the essential aid of such lyceum.

The Progressive Lyceum is the Spiritualist Sunday-School and Bible Class—so to speak—all in one. It is a school where all—old and young—can receive culture in the essential principles of Spiritualism, and gain beneficent instruction in thought along lines in harmony with common sense, in harmony with enlightened moral sentiment, in harmony with the higher instincts and spiritual perceptions of humanity.

Another important factor of success and strength, that should not be neglected, is the Home Circle.

Each in its own way, the Progressive Lyceum and the Home Circle, should be regarded as most efficient aids in the growth, strength and diffusion of Spiritualism. With these two factors in operation, Spiritualism will build up strong and solid societies. And honest mediumship, as well as public speakers, will reap substantial benefits, with the general growth and upbuilding of our cause.

And let it not be forgotten that, after all and above all, the great end and aim should be, to spiritualize and beautify individual character.

Spiritualism is worth little to any man or woman if the spirit of it does not so enter into, and mould and impress itself upon and into the mental and moral texture of his or her being, that a progressively higher state of spirituality is induced and becomes a fixed element of one's personality.

For the good of our cause, and for individual spiritual benefit, Spiritualists should earnestly endeavor after growth in spirituality of mind and thought. If this is done, the world will take cognizance of the fact, and Spiritualism will be made stronger thereby. Clean, pure, spiritual lives count for more than names and professions.

Hints With Reference to Communicating With Spirits.

The object of a spiritual circle should be to furnish the conditions on this side, necessary for spirit friends on the other to communicate. Few, indeed, understand the delicacy of these conditions, or the exactitude of their requirements. If they were understood it would not be thought strange that there were contradictions and failures, but wonderful that communications were possible. That there are spirits always desirous of communicating is a certainty, but they cannot do so unless there are proper conditions, and the furnishing of these is the task of their friends here. It must be borne in mind that communications depend for their transmission on laws fixed and unchanging. The spirits, even of the highest intelligence, cannot transmit a thought, otherwise than by means of the laws and conditions of such transmission. There are two sides to these conditions; one facing the spirit world, the other fronting the physical, and conformity is as essential on the one as on the other. A spirit understanding these laws may conform on its part to every requirement, but if it meet no response on the other, it can no more communicate than a voice convey ideas to the mind of a deaf mute. There must be furnished the right conditions on the physical side, else the efforts on the spirit side will be abortive.

We must leave that spiritual side to the spirits who would communicate, for it is beyond our knowledge or ability to adjust, and confine ourselves to our own physical side. We must seek to know what are the essential conditions which make intercourse with the departed possible. What are the conditions and laws which enable them to transmit their thoughts to us? On this knowledge depends the success of our efforts and our growth in spiritual knowledge.

We do not doubt for a moment that right on the other side of this thin curtain which is drawn between mortal and spiritual being, our spirit friends are anxiously awaiting an opportunity to make their presence known, and tell us of the love that outlives the darkness of the grave. They may not know how to communicate with us, even were the right conditions furnished, for it is not presumable that all have this knowledge or art, which must be difficult, and only acquired by study with those who do. If they know, they must wait until we open the door for their entrance.

As a means of communication, sympathy is the most potent. A strong sympathy between two kindred souls brings them near together, and when this is not sufficient to give the power of direct communication, it lightens the task of the medium who fills this slight interval.

It is one of the most observable features of spiritual communication, that those who have no near friends in spirit life find it difficult to receive communications, or obtain evidence, while those who have are fortunate in this respect. There are exceptions to this rule, especially where the bereaved are overwhelmed with grief, which like a black cloud shuts down over their spiritual perceptions, and sympathy (or better, sensitiveness) is blotted out by grief. It is true here, as in the physical world, that you cannot have storm and sunshine at the same time. The heart must wait in patience for the broken fibres of affection to heal, and the light of gladness to break through the clouds, before it may hope to gather tidings from the departed ones.

Whether such souls baptized in sympathy are sufficiently sensitive to receive direct the thoughts of those near and dear to them or not, they are in the right path, and when they sit with one endowed with higher sensitiveness—mediumship—they furnish that receptivity so essential to perfect control of that medium.

On the other hand, an unsympathetic person may sit with the same medium, with a cold, hard, skeptical and hypocritical condition of mind, and either utterly fail, or receive distorted, conflicting or false communications. The medium will then receive censure, as a fraud, or pretender, which really should fall to the investigator, who comes with a coarse, material understanding to the investigation of the most subtile laws and conditions in the universe. The methods of such investigators remind one of a scientist who would dissect a mite under high powers of the microscope with a pick and crow-bar or of a ditcher who would analyze a flower with his spade!

Having established communication, the lingering superstition that spiritual beings must possess universal knowledge has caused a great deal of misunderstanding and adverse criticism. When friends converse, instead of seeking spiritual knowledge, the most material questions are asked, as though the sphere and mission of spiritual beings was to become servants and police. There are instances where, under great stress and need, a spirit friend has made known some essential fact or circumstance to the profit of one near to it, but such instances are rare, and must be regarded as the exception. Spirit life is so pure, different and above that of earth, that the advanced spirit, freed from earthly cares, regards them of least consequence.

Yet some who claim to be Spiritualists seem to regard the benefits of a worldly guardianship more than of spiritual growth. Such are always seeking for tests; trying the spirits, and consulting them for worldly gain! Such a course attracts those on the same selfish plane of thought, the cause is degraded, and the medium made susceptible to the reaction of his own selfishness, in the end, unless exceedingly fortunate, to become corrupted and depraved.

It is well that in this higher mental department of communion the rude tests exacted elsewhere cannot be employed. This should be understood, and that the character of a communication bears the internal evidences of its genuineness. Success in obtaining evidence depends greatly on the sympathetic spirit in which the subject is approached. If skepticism or criticism are to be indulged, it should be kindly. These remarks do not apply to the hundreds of tricky mediums and impostors who have invaded our ranks—with them the rule should be—grab the spirit, in fact resort to any method to disturb their conditions! They are a menace to Spiritualism. They are a curse to our ranks. They are barnacles in our cause. They resist scientific investigation. They trade tests. They swindle the too confiding. They are commercial impostors, making merchandize of their fraudulent manifestations. There are scores of such in our large cities. They visit the country towns and swindle the people. Look out for them.

A Notable Sign of Progress.

A notable step in advance has recently been taken by one of the great Protestant churches, the Methodist Episcopal. It denotes not only a great and far-reaching result in that church, but a distinct gain to the woman suffrage movement in general. It indicates that the principle underlying the woman suffrage movement is gaining recognition as a just and righteous proposition, more especially, perhaps, in the minds of the younger and more progressive members of the church.

As stated by the Chicago Chronicle, last year at the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church held in this city a new constitution was adopted which has been ratified by the three-quarters vote required for confirmation. The returns are all in, Sweden, Norway, South America, Bengal, Japan, South India and North India are among the conferences that have expressed authoritative judgment upon the questions involved, which are fundamental.

The most radical of the changes wrought by the conclusive balloting is that giving women the right to sit as delegates in the General Conference. Laymen's electoral meetings acquire the right to vote upon constitutional questions. A two-thirds vote is substituted for a three-fourths in amending the constitution.

One of the most alert and vigorous of ecclesiastical bodies is thus started upon what will undoubtedly prove a new era in its progress. "Last at the cross and earliest at the grave," women have been potent from apostolic days in the spread of the gospel while content with a subordinate place in the government of all Christian churches. Their usefulness has been greatest in the charitable work directed by the shapers of the polity of the churches. Admission of women to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church will undoubtedly add zest and eloquence to those periodical assemblies which so profoundly stir the pulse of the church and contribute materially to its energy.

It requires no prophetic gift to foresee that this widespread and general recognition of woman in this militant church means ultimately more than sitting as delegates to the General Conference. The privilege of voting sooner or later generates the privilege of holding office. Without ordination women have long been modestly exercising in several communions the prediciatory office, despite the Paulist injunction that the sex shall be silent in the temples. Paul himself dissolved his enjoining mood when he praised the holy women who had been his helpers and commended them to the brethren. That to sit as delegates in the General Conference means in due time ordination to the ministerial rank, consecration to the episcopal dignity is rendered probable by the universal trend of progress as irresistibly inflated in the new century.

This result is made the more likely by the reigning style of pulpit address. While some creeds are "dying of explanations" the Methodist Episcopal concerns itself less and less with dogma and more with literary, aesthetic, ethical and popular topics. Of a brilliant heterodox pulpiteer it was written by Lowell:

His hearers can't tell you Sunday beforehand
If in that day's discourse you'll be Bibled or Khoraned.

No Theodore Parker towers above the contemporary level of Christian didacticism, but nearly all the preachers who are unbound by ritual have widened the doors of the Sunday vista and from its windows nature becomes part of the Christian cult. Fine art, literature, politics, philanthropy, science and every phase of vital human interest receives a share of pulpit recognition. The less theological the preacher's desk the easier the ascent of woman thereunto.

The new constitution of the Methodist Episcopal Church is monumental in its significance. It signifies not merely progress; it implies revolution. The precedent may prove infectious.

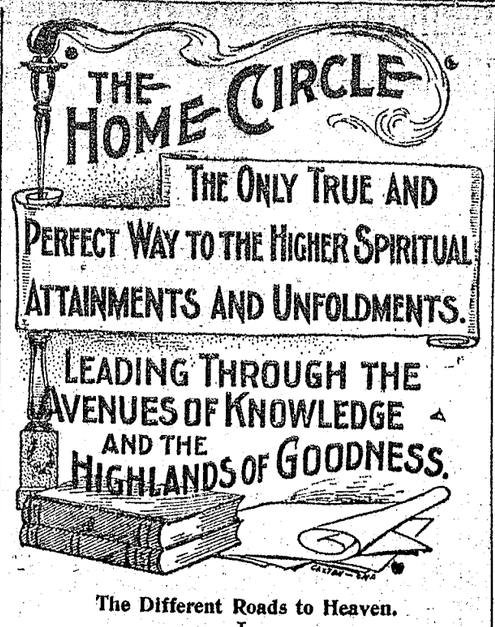
Outlets for the Imagination.

Senator Depew has probably achieved the distinction of giving popular currency to a philosophical hypothesis. In the course of his dedicatory address at New York's Hall of Fame on Thursday he undertook to account for the fact that current American literature hardly measures up to the standard set in the first half of the nineteenth century, says the Inter Ocean.

"We have," he said, "no Tennysons nor Longfellows nor Hawthornes nor Emersons. Perhaps it is because our Michael Angelos are planning tunnels under rivers and through mountains; our Raphaels are devising novel methods for the utilization of electric power; our Shakespeares are forming gigantic combinations; our Tennysons are giving reign to imagination in speculation in stocks, and our Hawthornes and Emersons have abandoned communings with the spirit to exploit mines and factories."

Of course Senator Depew's theory will be repudiated by those who think there is no outlet for imagination in business, who deny the intellectual similarity between writing an Iliad and combining the oil or steel industries of a nation, and who scoff at the idea that William Shakespeare, if living to-day would probably manage a railway or edit a great newspaper instead of writing plays. Yet when we consider the circumstances under which the principal American men of letters did their work this theory seems not unreasonable.

It will be conceded that the man born with a creative imagination naturally seeks means of expression. Is there any reason to disbelieve that his spiritual force, like material forces, follows the line of least resistance? When Emerson and Longfellow and Hawthorne and Whittier and Lowell and Poe were born and accumulated their fundamental ideas the coming material transformation of the world, though foreseen by the advance guard of science, was not realized by the general consciousness. Steam was the theme of great hopes, but the horse was still the chief agency of transportation. Electricity was little more than a scientific toy. Materially the world seemed destined to run along in its accustomed grooves. Under these conditions the creative imagination saw little outlet in the material side of life and fell back upon the aspirations of the soul.



But the generation now ruling the nation's activities was born into new environment. It saw that science and invention were working a positive revolution in the material world. Before the eyes of its creative imaginations large and ever larger vistas of achievement on the material side opened. There was evidently the line of least resistance, and so we began to breed engineers instead of poets, captains of industry instead of philosophers, financiers rather than statesmen. Yet who shall say that more imagination was required to write "The Scarlet Letter" than to span a continent with steel, or to draft a constitution than to organize capital and labor for conquest of world-markets? The difference seems one of form rather than of nature.

And in the gigantic character of the achievements of our imaginations in things material lies the hope of future achievement in things spiritual. The power is there, and as soon as the material revolution is accomplished it will seek new outlets. It is already seeking them, for creative force will always find its way, and when revolutions in things material no longer seem possible it will recur once more to the spiritual domain to seek conquests.

No thoroughly informed person will doubt or deny the power of imagination in the field of science and invention. But much that has been credited to high imagination, has really been the strong promptings of spirit forces impressed upon minds in rapport with high scientific intelligences of the world unseen.

To this extent, and it is wide and important, the views of the Inter Ocean is an inadequate presentation of the subject. It gives to imagination a credit for power and effect that belongs not to it, but to spirits excarnate who have advanced to a knowledge of science and invention beyond what has been reached by mortal, no matter how great their attainments and discoveries.

And so again we may safely conclude that the hope of future achievement in things spiritual does not abide in imagination pure and simple, but rather in the stirring of man's spiritual nature by the quickening impulse of spirit influence, impressing high spiritual thought and ideals.

The Different Roads to Heaven.

I.

Different roads to heaven?

Different pathways to the homes of angels?

Different routes to the various celestial cities in the regions of space?

Different methods by which one can gain a seat in the spirit realms?

Different conditions that entitle one to a seat in Paradise, or a location in a sphere where darkness reigns supreme?

Curious, is it not, that there are so many ways to spirit life?

No two, in all of God's vast universe ever entered the realm of souls in precisely the same manner.

God (he, she or it, or a principle or potency of space or a process of evolution) never repeats himself in any of his multifarious works, hence no two souls ever passed to spirit life under precisely the same conditions.

No two sands of the sea resemble each other in all respects.

The innumerable motes that float so gayly along a sunbeam—no two are exactly alike.

All through this vast universe—infinite in extent, the creative force—whatever you may call it—never repeats itself.

II.

Out west in early days there were many exciting scenes that exhibited life in many different ways. There were two characters with whom I was acquainted whose natures illustrated in a marked degree the wonderful peculiarities of existence in its manifold unfoldments. One, James Earl; the other a Methodist minister, by the name of Devine. Earl was always good-natured, and full of radiant sunshine that seemed to glow in his face with an iridescence that made him a marked character wherever he was. His good nature, his sublime self-assurance and cheerful wit, acting like a bracing tonic on his companions, made him conspicuous in private as well as public life. He never prayed, never read the Bible, and was somewhat atheistically inclined, and was known among the ministers as Godless Jim. When the ministers would talk to him about religion, his features would become illuminated as if some divine being was residing there, having brought with him one of heaven's brightest smiles, and he would remark, that if a heaven, he would have a seat there in the front row.

III.

At a picnic a little girl fell in the river near where Minister Devine was standing exhorting a number of women present to seek God. He did not, however, amid the excitement that followed, jump into the water to save the drowning child; but Godless Jim happening to be present, with almost lightning speed he came to the rescue, plunged into the rapid current, and brought the little girl safely to shore, where she was soon revived.

A prayer meeting was afterwards organized at the picnic to render especial thanks to God for saving the child, while Godless Jim was the one who was entitled to all the praise. All kneeled in prayer except the mother of the little girl, who held her child close to her bosom, apparently absorbed in deep thought. When the minister had concluded his long prayer of thankfulness to God, he seemed greatly surprised to notice that the mother, whose child was so "providentially" rescued, did not join in the prayers, and he commenced to severely rebuke her for her "cruel conduct," when she raised from her seat, walked over to where Godless Jim was sitting on a log, finishing his picnic lunch, and throwing her motherly arms around his neck and kissing him, she thanked him most devoutly for rescuing her child from drowning, giving him—not God—full credit for the heroic act. Her conduct, of course, excited the wrath of Devine, and he said he would have her expelled from his church.

IV.

In early life each one commences to traverse that road which leads to light, love, beauty and transcendent happiness in the celestial world, or the one that leads to desolation, darkness and suffering in the lower spheres of spirit life. Every one—whether in the haunts of vice, poverty, licentiousness and crime, or in the lowly cottage of the peasant, or sitting on a throne, or in the chair of state—is traveling one of the infinite number of roads that wind along their tortuous course to that depot which ends at death, and with which the depot on the spirit side of life blends, and where the disenthralled soul first recognizes its new existence. Every one—no exception—is traversing a road that leads to the glorious realities of exalted spirits, or one that leads to the realms of souls where dark conditions prevail. Each one constructs his own road, his own pathway to the sphere which he will occupy after death liberates his real self from his body, and he can select no other, only as he changes his course in life. There was "Silent Pete," as set forth in the Chicago Record-Herald, a name he was known by to the Chicago Park police, who was on a most dismal road leading to the very darkest spheres in spirit life.

He was a familiar object to club men, artists, business men and frequenters of Michigan avenue and Wabash avenue, between Congress and Randolph streets. His dress, winter and summer, was a coarse shirt open at the neck, ragged trousers stuck into a pair of top boots, and what once had been a frock coat, the whole kept on his body by a cord wound around outside his coat. A man of uncertain age, he had black, tawney hair and a ragged beard. His face was black with dirt. He had bushy eyebrows, pale features and a bent figure, but a chance upward glance would reveal a pair of blue eyes, with a world of despair and of hopelessness pictured in their depths.

He never solicited alms—he just sauntered along the edge of the sidewalk with his eyes on the ground. How he lived was a mystery that probably never bothered the gay crowd that passed him day after day. But artists, actors and club men with sportive tendencies are as a rule superstitious and believe in the occult. "Give a hobo a penny and luck will follow," is one of their sentiments; and "Silent Pete" could live like a lord on half a dollar a week.

V.

Many in Chicago will recognize this pen picture of "Silent Pete." For about two years he has not been seen in his daily haunts. "Dead" was probably the comment, if some other tattered tramp recalled him to the memory of a habitue of the avenue.

"Silent Pete," however, passed through Chicago a few days ago a prosperous mine owner, having a half interest in a copper mine on the Yukon, for which the copper syndicate has made a standing offer of $1,000,000. He carried a letter of credit for about $50,000, and is now on the Atlantic speeding as fast as a crack liner can carry him to Europe to reunite him with wife and child.

And this is the strange story of "Silent Pete," not told by himself, but by a man that a mysterious providence assigned to be his savior.

"Silent Pete," as he will still be called in this story—his right name is his own private property—was meandering along one May evening a year ago last spring on Michigan avenue. He was hungry, but wanted, most of all, a drink. "Pickings" had been small for several days, and Pete was in an agony of alcoholic thirst. In front of him sauntered a prosperous-looking man smoking a cigar. In taking a match out of his vest pocket, a roll of bills, unnoticed by the stranger, dropped from his pocket. As a hawk "Silent Pete's" fingers closed on the roll. The men were alone; no one was in sight for several blocks on both sides of the avenue, and the temptation must have been strong to retain the money; but then the honest blue eyes asserted their character.

With a bashful nod to the stranger, Pete touched his coat sleeve. The stranger turned quickly, and with a wave of his hand sharply said: "Can't do anything," and continued his walk.

VI.

The face of "Silent Pete" flushed for a second, but quickly following the stranger he again touched his arm.

"I beg your pardon, sir, but you dropped this on the sidewalk," handing him the roll of bills.

In an instant the stranger's hand went to his vest pocket; he took the money handed him by the tramp and counted it, and then an expression of intense surprise crept over his face.

"Well, this is a new game on me," he exclaimed. "What does it mean? Why did you not take the money and run?"

Despite the grime and dirt on his face, one could notice the violent emotion that disturbed "Silent Pete," as with a voice ringing clear, head erect for a moment and the blue eyes looking fearlessly into the stranger's, he exclaimed: "I am a fool, an outcast, and unfortunate, but I am not a thief!" and he suddenly crossed the avenue.

The stranger quickly overtook him, placed his hand on his shoulder, and with a hearty "I beg a thousand pardons, my man, for my remarks," grasped the hand of the tramp and gave it a cordial squeeze.

"You have done me a great service," continued the stranger. "There was over $2,000 in that roll. What can I do for you?"

A pleased smile had for a second spread over the face of the tramp at hearing the cordial greeting of the stranger and passed as quickly away again.

"Give me a drink," Pete said in a husky voice. "I am dying for a drink."

"Well, that's honest," remarked the stranger. "You don't want food or a night's lodging?"

"No, curse you," came the fierce exclamation from the tramp. "Give me a drink if you want to give me anything."

VII.

The two men were by this time before the Art Institute. Something about the tramp had evidently impressed the stranger. "I am tired," he said, "let us sit down for a moment on these steps." "Tell me something about yourself. You evidently are a man of education."

The stranger—his name is a household word among the miners of the far West—was on his return to Alaska, where he operated several mines. He was a man of vast experience, with the usual ups and downs of a miner's life, and he possessed an intuitive knowledge of men and things. With wonderful patience he finally succeeded in getting the tramp's story, and in a condensed form this is "Silent Pete's" past.

VIII.

He was by birth a Swede of good family, a university man, and by profession a civil engineer—a man, as was later ascertained, of brilliant attainments. He found a host of friends, but drink became a passion. He married a pretty girl, a little daughter came, position after position was lost, and once in a drunken rage he struck his his wife and child. The wife's patience was almost gone, but a last resource remained. The new world would give him a fighting chance. Even manual labor is no disgrace. Friends here helped him at the large steel mills in Worcester, Mass., where he was given a position, but repeated drunkenness caused his discharge. Lower and lower he fell, and finally became a tramp in Chicago. No hope for the future; all ambition gone; no help possible.

IX.

"Will you pledge yourself not to drink if I help you?" was the stranger's question when the story was ended.

"No—of no earthly use—broken pledges scattered behind me," was the answer.

"Honest—that is one good thing," mused the stranger.

"Drink or no drink, I will give you a trial, but you must place yourself absolutely in my hands—do exactly as I tell you. Will you consent?"

"It is a waste of time and generosity," was "Silent Pete's" brusque comment on the stranger's offer. "Better leave me alone. It will save you disappointment."

"Never mind, I will take the risk. I am used to it. Come on," commanded the stranger, and the two left the shadows of the Art Institute.

X.

Money is an all-powerful factor and can accomplish almost everything.

Two hours later the stranger entered his hotel accompanied by a fine-looking sun-browned man, nicely dressed in a blue serge suit, his face bearing the marks of dissipation or of long illness. It was "Silent Pete." A visit to the Turkish bath, to the barber and the clothier had transformed the vagrant into a gentlemanly-looking man.

"Now for the drink that I promised you," said the stranger to his companion.

They entered a curtained recess. The stranger called for a bottle of whisky, and filling a tumbler half full, pushed it toward "Silent Pete," whose trembling hand eagerly clutched the glass. His wild desire to swallow the fiery contents was pitiable to behold. He carried the goblet to his lips; the fume of the liquor was in his nostrils.

As he was about to swallow the liquor his eyes met those of the stranger's expressing the loathing, disappointment and the contempt of the man.

For a moment the two men looked square into each other's faces and then, with a "d—— you—I, too, am a man!" "Silent Pete" dashed the glass with the liquid to the floor untasted.

From that moment "Silent Pete" has never touched liquor—never felt the slightest desire for strong drink.

Students of psychology may possibly be able to explain "Silent Pete's" condition, and the results that followed. Three hours previous the man was almost dying in his desire for strong drink. If the stranger had given him a dime or a quarter and left him "Silent Pete" would have been in a happy, oblivious condition for hours. Here was liquor to be had in unlimited quantities. He was invited to help himself; he craved a drink and then, presto change, the desire was gone.

Before retiring to bed that night the stranger telegraphed several persons whose names had been mentioned by "Silent Pete" in his story, and received confirmation of all the facts.

"Silent Pete" followed his rescuer to Alaska, where his scientific attainments soon made him a valuable official of the company. Later in locating rich copper mines in the Yukon district he at one swoop became a wealthy man. For the last year he has been in correspondence with his wife and family, and this Christmas, a brown-eyed little woman, a little girl and a white-haired mother and father in a town in the far north of Sweden will welcome husband, father and son—the man again master of himself, and with a heart full of thankfulness to an all-merciful God for a miraculous reformation.

XI.

In "Silent Pete" you have an example of a man who was making day by day his own dismal, heart-rending road to the spirit realms. It led, of course, towards the very dark spheres where there exists a pandemonium more black and wretched than the loftiest imagination can conceive. Happily, his life changed, he ceased to make a road that led to a hell, and commenced constructing one that led in an exactly opposite direction—to heaven and happiness.

Minister Devine and Godless Jim were, too, each constructing a road to the future; the former, creed-bound, austere in his ways, and fiercely denunciatory of those who would not endorse his theology, was pursuing a pathway that would finally convey him to a gloomy condition of life in the beyond, and from which he could only emerge by changing his method of life. Godless Jim, strictly honest, always ready to do a kind act, and even willing to assist the suffering, though very reckless at times in the use of swear words, built for himself a pathway that led him to a home far more beautiful than that occupied by Minister Devine. Both learned that swear words were far less harmful to the spiritual nature than the continual use of the name of God in building up a rotten theology, or a false creed.

This is no fancy sketch—it is the actual truth that the road you make by your conduct in life will lead you either to a place of dismal gloom, or to one where light, beauty, loveliness and grandeur are the prevailing characteristics. Heed the lesson here imparted and build your road to heaven in accordance with the home you wish to enjoy there.

HULL-JAMIESON DEBATE.

There has been some difficulty in properly preparing the report of the debate between Mr. Hull and Mr. Jamieson, hence no speech appears this week. We hope the difficulty experienced will be amicably settled and that in a short time we may be able to carry it forward to completion. In the meantime The Progressive Thinker will be full of interesting matter.

"Who are These Spiritualists and What Is Spiritualism?" A pamphlet of 40 pages by Dr. J. M. Peebles, the well-known author. Price 15 cents For sale at this office.

"The Kingship of Self-Control." By Wm. George Jordan. It treats of the crimes of the tongue, the Red Tape duty, the supreme charity of the world, the revelation of reserve power, etc. Price 30 cents. For sale at this office.

CLUBS! CLUBS! CLUBS!

Send in your Clubs of Ten on the following terms: Each member of the club, for the small sum of $1.15, will receive The Progressive Thinker one year and that remarkable book, "A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands." The one who gets up the club will receive the paper one year, and his choice of any two of our premium books.

Send in your club of twenty on the following terms: Each member of the club, for $1.15, will receive the paper one year, and also that wonderfully instructive book, "A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands." The one who gets up a club of twenty will receive the paper one year, and any five of the premium books he may select—a valuable library indeed, worth its weight in gold.

Send in your club of twenty-five on the following terms: Each member of the club, for $1.15, will receive the paper one year and "A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands." The one who gets up the club will receive the paper one year, and the eight remarkable premium books. They are a library within themselves of occult and spiritual knowledge. No other eight books in the whole spiritual literature (and you may select the cream of the same,) are any more valuable. They are neatly and substantially bound in cloth; they are finely printed; they contain information invaluable to every student of our philosophy. Each volume should be read yearly by every one. Every inland city and town should get up a club of twenty-five. Organize a circle or a home meeting and get up a club. Call in all the Spiritualists of your place, to YOUR residence, and then get up a club.

The Destiny of the Nation.

Graphically Depicted By Julian Hawthorne.

SPIRITS OF THE BENEFICENT DEAD COMBAT EVIL TO GUIDE OUR PRESIDENT'S ACTION ARIGHT IN A GREAT CRISIS.

From among several manuscripts placed on my desk [as set forth in the North American, Philadelphia,] I picked up one and opened it at a certain page, on which was written the following, in an old-fashioned hand:

"Death does not end the influence for evil or good of human beings upon earthly affairs. The spiritual world is not remote from us in space; the sympathies and habits which influenced the soul while still incarnate do not cease to operate after the casting off of the body; they govern it, on the contrary, more absolute than before. Spirit is made of feeling and thought; and if the man who dies felt and thought in harmony with the man who stays behind, the two cannot be parted. Though our physical senses no longer perceive the disembodied one, he is at hand, and occasionally, through the medium of a finer sensibility, we are aware of his presence. He on his side is similarly unconscious of our material companionship; but he inhales a kindred atmosphere with us, and both of us continue to be swayed by like impulses and principles. These impulses and principles flow into one another and act as one; and thus the living and departed are merged. Yet there is a difference between our function and his; for inasmuch as he is now nearer to the common source of good or of evil (as the case may be), he, on his plane, suggests what we carry out on ours. So the disembodied murderer generates in the brain of the still incarnate criminal the purpose to murder again; and the benefactor who has passed away causes fresh inspirations toward love and charity to blossom in the hearts of the friends he left behind. There remains to us always our personal freedom of choice, whether we shall comply or resist; but it is always from the other side of the evil that the objects of that choice are communicated to us."

I turned over a few leaves and came upon this:

"The unity of mankind is recognized; but we do not always realize what this unity implies. There can be no independent, individual evil; but the criminals of a community are those into whom are, as it were, drained off the corruption and disorderly tendencies which exist inactively in the entire body-corporate; they do the mischief which in the rest of us is latent. We cannot then free ourselves from responsibility for their misdeeds; and so long as our criminal classes exist, it is a sign that our good society has some rottenness within. This truth is readily illustrated. We snatch the brutal weapon of lynch law to avenge ourselves on the perpetrators of outrage; but the expedient is short-sighted; for we thereby do but transfer to the more potent spiritual plane the wickedness which was till now hindered by the impediments of matter and ignorance. We punish with death the anarchist assassin; but that in him which prompted assassination we could not destroy, and we have succeeded only in giving to that prompting cause a freer and more intelligent scope. Similarly, the loyer of his kind, the wise statesman, the honest citizen, who dies to mortal conditions, lives to sow more effectively in us who survive him the glorious seeds of his lofty aims and loving purposes; his faculty for benevolence is not restricted, but amplified. The infinite love and wisdom which rules the universe had perceived that the good man had accomplished all the good which, on the mortal plane, was possible for him; and has then removed him to a sphere richer to an immeasurable degree in the resources of intelligence and power. Moreover, each successive age has its proper genius; and the man of yesterday is less adequately equipped than he of to-day for the work in hand; this, indeed, is the reason of the generations of mankind. Honor the past for what in it was honorable; but do not mourn it overmuch; rather bend your energies to holding up the hands of the present. Above all forget not that the individual is ever the blossom of the race, white and pure, or foul and black; his significance is representative only. There shall appear a Washington, and beside him a Benedict Arnold; a Judas Iscariot, and in the same company a St. John. But the seer turns from these persons to find their explanation in the sum of the virtue and corruption of the common human nature of their day. They are but concrete outward expressions of conditions that are interior and general."

"This writer," thought I, "is one of those mystical reformers who, instead of hanging thugs and clapping thieves in jail, would extract their venom and render them innocuous by purifying society at large. The plan might work in the long run; but universal regeneration is not achieved in a day, and what would become of us in the meantime? I like better the other branch of this theory—that death sets good men free to accomplish larger schemes of benevolence than they were competent to on earth. Washington influenced his successors to maintain the integrity of the Commonwealth which his sword and wisdom created; Lincoln has inspired conceptions of freedom profounder than were embodied in his Emancipation Proclamation. Yes, it is comforting to feel that they are with us still, wiser and more potent than before. For we need them! The accumulated beneficence of the whole line of them is probably no more than enough to steer us safely through the shoals and rapids that lie close ahead of our ship of state. Our helmsman fell just at the moment when our faith in him had become assured, and this young man who has stepped into his place—extol as we may his good will and honest intentions—is rather alarmingly young for such a destiny. Is he to be left to his own devices? Or is there a power behind the throne—above it, beyond, within it—that will counsel him where mortal intelligence fails, and instill into him, from some Divine source, a wisdom, power and judgment higher, mightier, more catholic than his own, excellent though his own be; enabling him to ignore the personal and the immediate, with their clamorous urgencies, in the vision of the remote, universal, permanent good? After all, it is the old question—does man govern the world, or does God?"

I read no further in the manuscript; but it had indisposed me to take up my other matter, and I remained inactive at my desk, staring out of the window on my left at the wintry sky impending over the masses of dingy brick buildings that constitute my prospect. It was the day before Christmas, and the evening was drawing on. I had seen that morning, and, indeed, during many days before, the splendor of the holiday shops, and the animated crowd of shoppers feasting their eyes on the handsome spectacle, and spending their money for the pleasure of others, as if the millennium were really come at last. But I had noticed a number of poor persons, too, who must satisfy themselves with looking; the possession of these fine things was quite beyond their possibilities or hopes, though, perhaps, they could wish to have them as much as anybody. Why were they poor? With what justice were they shut out from the enjoyment of that which others who very likely had lived lives not less self-centered, upon the whole, than their own might own at will? Charity might feed and clothe a few of them; but charity, though it were boundless as the sea, was not the true solution of the problem. Christ did not give away money or clothes. He did not have them to give. But he was Christ, and whatever impulses toward good have visited men and women since his time had their source in him. But we had crucified him; and as I looked at the poor people staring into the shop windows, I had asked myself whether, in some sense or other, they were not there—instead of being inside buying the fine things—because we had crucified him, and were still doing so? And now, I looked out of my window, and saw other poor people in the little narrow street stretching between the dingy brick buildings, with no Christmas aspect about them, except for a few scraps of evergreen that the children had picked up in more attractive neighborhoods; and the only representative of Santa Claus was a peddler pushing a hand-cart along the pavement, with some apples and sweetmeats, to whose worm-eaten and stale attractions he was calling attention in a blatant voice. Some of the children playing in the gutter followed him with their eyes, but none seemed to have the means of becoming his customer. The words of the manuscript reverted to my memory: "We cannot free ourselves from responsibility. * * It is a sign that good society has some rottenness within."

"I am afraid," said I to myself, "that if the dead do continue to influence us after death, the preponderance of effect is still on the wrong side. It is not only this slum that shows the results of evil; we see plenty of it in high places, too, and the worst of it is by no means associated with poverty. Why do we keep up this Christmas celebration? Is it not a rather empty and ghastly illusion? Would we be any worse if we forgot all about it, and what it means?"

The servant came in at this juncture and laid on my table a package done up in brown paper. It was square, and rather heavy. Apparently somebody had remembered me at this season, and had used the thought to my advantage. I weighed it in my hand, guessing what it could be. "Oh, for a talisman to help me see into the heart and destiny of mankind!"

The box, upon being opened, proved to contain a spherical object, wrapped up in folds of soft silk, purple and yellow. Within these was disclosed a globe of pure crystal, exquisitely polished, so that it gave forth a myriad reflections, and seemed luminous with a white lustre from within. Such globes are made in Japan, and imported thence; they are used by the generality as ornaments, but by the initiated as mediums of clairvoyance. I had never tested my powers with one; here was an apt opportunity. Handling the ball so that the silken wrappings always intervened between its surface and my fingers, I placed it on a little tripod ordinarily used to support my ink-bottle. It was now nearly dark; I lighted the gas jet behind my left shoulder, and draped the silken stuffs about the ball, till to my eye it assumed the appearance of a soft darkness with only one point of intense light in its depths. Steadfastly gazing into the darkness, by degrees all faculties seemed to be concentrated into perception. My pulse slowed down; all sounds died away; thought itself ceased. I began to see subtle undulations in the darkness; masses of light and shade, changing their forms, melted into one another and reappeared. My breathing almost stopped, but was replaced by a singular interior respiration. What was that?—a figure—a human figure? Yes; more than one!

I was in a room, not large, but of harmonious proportions, and of an old-fashioned aspect. It was dimly lighted by a single gas-lamp on a writing table, the flame turned low. The table was covered with letters, documents, books, writing materials; one engrossed sheet, apparently a state paper, lay on the blotter; it lacked the signature that should authenticate it. The figure—the two figures that I had seen were pacing up and down the room arm in arm, conversing in low voices. They were distinct to my vision only when they passed through the circle of light thrown on the floor by the dim lamp; beyond this, on either side, they hardly detached themselves from the shadows. As my mind became engaged with this scene, I was conscious of a profound feeling of suspense—I could hardly call it anxiety—somehow communicated to me from the two men walking and murmuring to each other there. There was deep gravity, almost sadness, in the feeling, but it was not devoid of hope. At length the men paused before the table, and looked down at the writing there, the unsigned writing. I recognized their faces; but it caused me no surprise; it seemed natural that Washington and Lincoln should be present there on the first Christmas Eve of the new century.

"He should not hesitate," said the grand figure with the calm, massive countenance. His left hand dropped involuntarily to the hilt of his dress sword as he spoke. "The nation has been gathering itself to meet this hour. And yonder on the other side is massed the enemy. For a leader who reverences duty there can be no choice of paths. I have marked this young man; he has courage, independence, love of right, the patriotic spirit; but judgment, the wisdom that is born of long experience—how can they belong to a man of his years? Evil can put on the mask of a more urgent good than good itself. And if, meaning however well, he is misled in this"—he pointed toward the paper—if he withholds his approval from this instrument—it will be the beginning of calamity; and when the glitter of the moment has passed away, it will be known that the consecration of true liberty has passed from our country's brows forever."

There was the glimmer of a smile in the cavernous eyes of the other man as he replied. "I have faith in youth," said he; "and it is more to the fore now than when you were at the tiller, or I either. The young men see visions, and they may be as pure and high as the dreams that we older fellows used to have. David slew Goliath, did he not? while he was even younger than this friend of ours. Alexander was a heathen; but he used his sword to good purpose in his twenties. The voice of the Guide may be obeyed more readily and with a more single heart at prime than at eve. These youngsters, when they are of sound stock, show a wonderfully quick scent for corruption, and they see with a clearness that sometimes overmatches experience. Besides, a great trust breeds great strength; if I had known when I took up the reins, what a road I was to travel, I doubt if I would have backed myself to win. But the power came with the deed; and why not now?"

"Aye; but that other was a tried soldier; he knew the moves of the game," returned his companion doubtfully. "It is perilous when such as he falls at the moment before victory. I cannot but wish that he—"

"Here he comes now!" interrupted the other, lifting his head. "The soldierly instinct—he cannot sleep when danger is abroad. Let us hear his opinion."

The new arrival had advanced from the further end of the room, and came to the side of the table opposite to that on which the first comers stood. He paused there, with one hand resting lightly on a pile of pamphlets; so, in times past, had he often stood to speak in the Senate chamber. He was less in stature than the two other men, who indeed loomed almost gigantic; but his rather pallid features wore an expression of benign intelligence that avouched a spiritual kinship with them. He met their gaze with a certain humility which won the heart. He bent his head low in response to their greeting.

"There can be little need for my help," said he, "since you are here."

"We looked for you," answered the taller of the other two. "It was you that laid the plans of the house that is now a building. None should be better able than you to pass an opinion as to the work of the new architect. Our friend here confesses to some doubts; and he might have quoted—had he ever heard it—some old remark of mine about swapping horses when crossing a stream. What is your own feeling?—are you uneasy at the outlook?"

A smiling look brightened in the clear eyes under the bushy brows, and he shook his head. He glanced down at the sheet of written paper on the table, and laid the palm of his right hand gently upon it, with a gesture like a benediction.

"When my summons came," said he, "I felt that the ways of God are not our ways, and he is not mocked, or taken unawares. My heart was in my work; but the work is one, and the workers must be many. Each lifts his load; but none knows who shall put the last stone in place. It is the work, not the glory, that we are to seek. The wisdom of a man—his trust in his own strength—his personal plan for success—may be the obstacle to hinder the Almighty purpose. What he thought the crowning effort, which he had strung his nerves to make, might prove the touch amiss that would have spoiled all. Another nature was needed—a fresher mind—a different training. A man can be only himself; and if he be summoned at the moment when his power to adjust himself to the Divine design had become less than that of another, he will not grieve, but will welcome that other as a better self; and thank God who knew better than he when the change must be made, and upon whom the burden must rest. That I was withdrawn in the very heat of the day is my Creator's best assurance to me that his hand is outstretched to protect our people. His love was such, even to me, that he did not suffer the record of my good intent to be marred in men's memories by the revelation of some inability hidden from me which he foresaw."

"And will the other prevail?" asked the grand old soldier.

"My faith is in him!" was the reply.

At this moment the President entered the room. He did not notice the other figures; he was alive with the life of a man in this world. With a quick, resolute step, swinging his strong young shoulders, he advanced to the table and seated himself in the chair before the document. He took up the pen; but before setting it to the paper, he paused, drew a deep breath, and leaned back in his chair.

I now observed that the room had become crowded with personages whose entrance I had not marked. Some of them—a group numbering about a score—were gathered close around the President; few of their faces had I seen in life, yet all were known to me, and their names will never be forgotten by their countrymen. The two who had preceded the rest stood nearest the President's chair; the third comer remained at the other side of the table. But the throng that pressed forward from the remoter end of the room wore a sinister aspect very different from the others; and the features of many of these were also familiar to me; they had been the evil geniuses of the nation. There is no need to name them here; they were the traitors, open or secret; the foes of liberty; the seekers of self; the corrupters of honor. And thus the two hosts confronted each other, the evil against the good. And the man of flesh and blood, whose present act, or failure to act, should determine the fate of many yet unborn, sat in the midst of them who were invisible to his bodily sight, yet whose opposing influences, I could perceive, were fighting in his mind as in a battleground. He passed his hand across his forehead, and lifted his head with a troubled look. But it seemed to me that this look was directly encountered by that of the benign intelligence standing as a vanguard against the powers of evil, on the other side of the table. Did some supersensual message or enlightenment pass from one to the other? The next moment the President's brow cleared; his lips met firmly beneath his brown moustache; he sat erect with an energetic movement, and reached forward his right arm to dip the pen in the ink.

Then suddenly from the throng in the darkness sprang forward the disheveled shape of a young man, whose smooth features were twisted into a snarl of diabolic malignity. With rigid fingers outstretched like talons in a fury of effort to arrest the President's act, he threw himself toward the table. The latter, who was on the point of dipping the pen in the ink, hesitated for the fraction of a moment; and through the august group that bent over him ran a thrill of apprehension.

But before the assassin could do his will, a firm grasp was laid upon his wrist; he looked fiercely up, and met the quiet but immitigable gaze of the pale-faced martyr. There was no struggle; that glance seemed to wither the creature of evil as a wisp of straw in the fire; he shriveled where he stood, and sank down and out of sight. The throng behind him blenched back into the darkness.

"Let us have more light," said the President to himself.

He turned up the flame in the burner; he dipped his pen in the ink, and wrote his name in clear characters at the bottom of the document; then he laid the pen thoughtfully down and rose to his feet. He stood in the light, alone; for in the brighter illumination the other figures had faded out of sight. I saw him for an instant; then the whole scene had vanished, and I was staring at the polished surface of the crystal globe upon the tripod. Beside it lay the leaves of the manuscript, written in an old-fashioned hand.

The singing music of the Christmas bells rang cheerfully in my ears. The children in the slum had stuck some candle-ends on the spines of a wretched umbrella, and were dancing with joyful outcries round this effigy of the Holy Tree. Once more had a great, good deed been done in the world; and hope, the dearest heritage of mortal man, had not died out of the earth.—Julian Hawthorne, in the North American, Philadelphia, Pa.

DEAFNESS CURED

By No Means Until "ACTINA" Was Discovered.

Ninety-five percent of all cases of deafness brought to our attention is the result of chronic catarrh of the throat and middle ear. The air passages become clogged by catarrhal deposits, stopping the action of the vibratory bones. Until these deposits are removed a cure is impossible. The inner ear cannot be reached by probing or spraying, hence the inability of aurists or physicians to cure. Ear drums are worse than useless. That there is a scientific cure for deafness and catarrh is demonstrated every day by the use of Actina. The vapor current generated in the Actina passes through the Eustachian tubes into the middle ear, removing the catarrhal obstructions as it passes through the tubes, and loosens up the bones (hammer, anvil and stirrup) in the inner ear, making them respond to the slightest vibration of sound. Actina has never failed to cure ringing noises in the head. We have known people troubled with this distressing symptom for years to be completely cured in only three weeks' use of Actina. Actina also cures asthma, bronchitis, sore throat, weak lungs, colds and headache; all of which are directly or indirectly due to catarrh. Actina is sent on trial postpaid. Write us about your case. We give advise free, and positive proof of cures. A valuable book—Professor Wilson's 100 page Dictionary of Disease, Free. Address New York & London Electric Association, Dep. THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE.

A VERY IMPORTANT WORK.

The Spiritual Significance is by Lilian Whiting, author of "The World Beautiful," "After Her Death," "Kate Field, A Record," "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning," Cloth, $1.00.

Miss Whiting finds the title of her new book in these lines from "Aurora Leigh:"

"If a man could feel
Not one, but every day, feast, fast, and working-day,
The spiritual significance burn through
The hieroglyphic of material shows,
Henceforward he would paint the globe with wings."

The aim of this book is to reveal the curiously close correspondence between the developments of modern science and spiritual laws; to note that new forces, as discovered and applied in wireless telegraphy, are simply laws of an unseen realm into which humanity is rapidly advancing and thus gaining a new environment. From this evolutionary progress, as illustrated by physical science the author of "The World Beautiful" continues the same argument presented in those volumes in a plea that the future life is the continuation and development of our present life in all its faculties and powers, and that the present may be ennobled by the constant sense of the Divine Presence, and a truer knowledge of the nature of man and his relations to God tend to a higher morality and increasing happiness. The book is characterized by the same essential style and qualities that have insured for "The World Beautiful" volumes an almost world-wide popularity.

An Interesting Story of Two Worlds.

Elevating, Fascinating, Instructive Throughout.

This work by Carrie E. S. Twing is exceptionally interesting. She well says: "These characters which have brought out the highest and lowest in different religious beliefs, have moved me, not I them." The whole book is interesting, fascinating, and instructive. Price $1.00.

Self Contradictions of the Bible.
One hundred and forty-four propositions, theological, moral, historical and speculative; each proved affirmatively and negatively by quotations from Scripture, without comment. Price, 15 cents.

The Development of the Spirit
After Transition. By the late M. Faraday. The origin of religions, and their influence upon the mental development of the human race. Price, 10 cents.

THE VOICES By Warren Sumner Barlow. The Voices contain poems of remarkable beauty and force. They are most excellent. Price $1.00.

The Devil and the Adventists.
An Adventist attack on Spiritualism repudiated. By Moses Hull. Price 10 cents.

The Koran Commonly called the "Alkoran of Mohammed." The standard Arabian or Mohammedan Bible. Cloth, $1.00

LIFE OF THOMAS PAINE.
By the Editor of the National, with Preface and Notes by Peter Eckler. Illustrated with views of the old Paine Homestead and Paine Monument, at New Rochelle; also portraits of Thomas Ollo Rickman, Joel Barlow, Mary Wollstonecraft, Madame Roland, Condorce, Brissot, and the most prominent of Paine's friends in Europe and America. Cloth, 75 cents.

Grimes of Preachers.
An interesting book along its line and useful to Spiritualists attacked by the clergy and their followers. Price 25 cents; for sale at this office.

VEDANTA PHILOSOPHY.
Lectures by the Swami Vivekananda, on Raja Yoga; or Conquering the Internal Nature, and other subjects; also, Patanjali's Yoga Aphorisms, with commentaries and a copious glossary of Sanskrit terms. Revised and enlarged, 12mo., Cloth, $1.50. Raja Yoga is an ancient system of Indian Philosophy, and one of the four chief methods that the Vedanta Philosophy offers to obtain freedom and perfection. Swami Vivekananda became a familiar figure in several American cities during the three years following the Parliament of Religions at Chicago; he was cordially received in America, where the breadth and depth of his teachings were soon recognized. His teachings are universal in their application. The book is cheap at $1.50. For sale at this office.

THE JEWISH JEHOVAH,

The God Whom the Christians Worship.

The God accepted by the churchmen in all Christendom is the Jewish Jehovah. We have no account of him except that found in the Jewish scriptures. To him is ascribed infinite power, infinite wisdom and infinite love for the children of earth. A few of the characteristics of Jehovah, taken in connection with their acceptance by the theologians will here be noted. No reflection on the motives and character of churchmen is intended; the character of their God only is considered.

1. The Creation. "And God saw everything he had made, and behold it was very good." (Gen. 1:13.) But soon after there was trouble. That very good man, Adam, right in the face of the threat of instant death, disobeyed God's command. Query: How can that which is "very good" bring forth evil? Jesus says it is impossible. "A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit." (Matt. 7:18.) But he didn't die; and for fear that "he would put forth his hand and eat of the tree of life and live forever," he was expelled from the garden of Eden. (Gen. 3:22.)

2. He cursed the earth for Adam's sake (Gen. 3:17-19) and made him earn his living like an honest man.

3. God's repentance. The world got so wicked that he repented that he had made man (Gen. 6:6-7) and resolved to destroy not only the human race, but every living creature. Query: How can an all-wise and all-loving Creator make such a mistake and destroy the works of his hand?

4. But he revoked the curse pronounced upon the earth and declared that he would "no more smite every living thing as he had done." (Gen. 8:21-22.)

5. He sought to kill Moses. He forgot his promise not to smite. (Exodus 4:24.) There is some ambiguity in connection with this statement; but the pronoun "him" is made to personate Moses by the following verses. His wife calls him her "bloody husband" in the matter of a circumcision which seems to abate God's anger. (Exodus 4:25-26.)

6. Only five of the ten commandments are recognized by Jesus. Those regarding the observance of the Sabbath, the worship of idols, the having no other gods, coveting the neighbors' things, and the presenting the days of labor, are ignored. The Rev. Heber Newton is reported in a recent sermon to say: "Christ founded no church, established no state, gave practically no laws, organized no government, and set up no external authority, but he did seek to write on the hearts of men God's laws and make them self-legislating."

7. God violates his own commandment, "Thou shalt not kill." Five kings war against Gibeon, "And the men of Gibeon sent unto Joshua to the camp at Gilead, saying, 'Slack not thy hand from thy servants. Come up to us quickly and save us and help us; for all the kings of the Amorites that dwell in the mountains are gathered together against us.' So Joshua ascended from Gilgal; he and all the people of war with him and all mighty men of valor. And the Lord said unto Joshua, 'Fear them not, for I have delivered them unto thine hand. There shall not be a man of them stand before thee.' And Joshua therefore came unto them suddenly and went up from Gilgal all night. And the Lord discomfited them before Israel and slew them with great slaughter at Gibeon, and chased them along the way that goeth up to Bethhoron and smote them to Azekah and unto Makedah. And it came to pass as they fled before Israel, and were in the going down to Bethhoran, that the Lord cast down great stones from heaven upon them unto Azekah, and they died; they were more which died with hailstones than they whom the children of Israel slew with the sword. Then spake Joshua to the Lord in the day when the Lord delivered up the Amorites before the children of Israel: and he said in the sight of Israel, Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon; and thou, stand thou still upon Gibeon; and thou, moon, in the valley of Ajalon.' And the until the people had avenged themselves upon their enemies. Is not this written in the book of Jasher? So the sun stood still in the midst of heaven and hasted not to go down about a whole day. And there was no day like that before or after it, that the Lord hearkened unto the voice of a man; for the Lord fought for Israel." (Joshua 10:6-14.)

8. God receives the burnt offering of a virgin. This is recorded in Judges, (11:30 et seq.) Jephthah was in chief command of the army of the Israelites and made war with the Ammonites. "And Jephthah vowed a vow unto the Lord and said, 'If thou shalt without fail deliver the children of Ammon into mine hands, then it shall be that whatever cometh forth of the door of my house to meet me when I return in peace from the children of Ammon, shall surely be the Lord's, and I will offer it up for a burnt offering." After many victories he returned "to Mizpah unto his own house, and his daughter came out to meet him with timbrels and dances; and she was his only child; beside her he had neither son nor daughter." "And it came to pass at the end of two months, that she returned unto her father who did with her according to his vow which he had vowed." (Judges 11:39.)

9. God deceives the prophets of the King of Israel. Wishing to destroy Ahab, king of Israel, this is recorded: "And the Lord said, 'Who shall persuade Ahab that he may go up and fall at Ramoth-gilead?' And one said on this manner, and another said on that manner. And there came forth a spirit and stood before the Lord and said, 'I will persuade him.' And the Lord said unto him, 'Wherewith?' And he said, 'I will go forth and I will be a lying spirit in the mouth of all his prophets.' And he said, 'Thou shalt persuade him, and prevail also; go forth and do so.' Now, therefore, behold, the Lord hath put a lying spirit in the mouth of all these thy prophets, and the Lord hath spoken evil concerning thee." (I. Kings 22:22-24; also II. Chron. 20:19-22.)

10. Solomon's wisdom. "And God gave Solomon wisdom and understanding exceeding much, and largeness of heart, even as the sand is on the seashore." (I. Kings 4:29.) And not long after, "the Lord was angry with Solomon because his heart was turned from the Lord God of Israel, which had appeared unto him twice, and commanded him concerning this thing that he should not go after other gods; but he kept not that which the Lord commanded him." (I. Kings 11:9-10.)

Well might the Lord be angry, for "King Solomon loved many strange women (together with the daughter of Pharaoh) women of the Moabites, Amorites, Edomites, Zidonians and Hittites." (I. Kings 11:1.) (He forgot all about his advice in Proverbs about going after strange women.) "And he had seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines, and his wives turned away his heart, for it came to pass when Solomon was old, that his wives turned away his heart after other gods, and his heart was not perfect with the Lord as was the heart of David, his father; for Solomon went after Ashtaroth, the goddess of the Zidonians, and after Mileom, the abomination of the Ammonites; and Solomon did evil in the sight of the Lord and went not fully after the Lord as did David his father. And likewise did he for all his strange wives which burnt incense and sacrificed unto their gods." (I. Kings 11:3-8.) Query: If such wisdom and largeness of heart did not avail with Solomon, of what value would they be when temptations assail?

Ezekiel sets forth a more rational philosophy. His is found in the 18th chapter. It ignores the dogma of total depravity as the alleged curse of Adam, was assigned as the cause of it. "If a man be just and do that which is lawful and right, he shall live; but those who do not these things, shall surely die." (See verse 10 et seq.)

"The soul that sinneth, it shall die. The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father; neither shall the father bear the iniquity of the son. The righteousness of the righteous shall be upon him, and the wickedness of the wicked shall be upon him. (Ezek. 18:20.) This philosophy is reasonable and just, and is in accordance with the teachings of Jesus.

The character of the Jewish Jehovah as set forth in their scriptures, when seen in its nakedness, would bring the blush of shame on the cheek of a Brahman, a Buddhist, or a Mohammedan; and yet he is adored and worshiped by nations that boast of their superior enlightenment! Modern theology (so-called) is a re-hash of paganism, retaining essentially its rites and ceremonies.

Think of such a God! Blundering repenting, revoking his curse, urging Moses to lead the Israelites out of bondage, and hardening the heart of Pharaoh that he will not let them go, violating his own commandment—"Thou shalt not kill"—slaughtering thousands of defenseless fugitives, accepting the burnt sacrifice of a virgin, deceiving the prophets of the king of Israel, imparting wisdom in Solomon and being angry because he exhibits folly instead.

Who would tolerate such a God? And yet whole nations bow down and worship him. In his name millions upon millions obey the mandates of his supposed vice-gerents, giving reverent service to them and untold wealth in their support. What a travesty upon reason and comon sense! When will the people arouse from such a preposterous absurdity?

E. J. SCHELLHAUS.

PRAYER.

It Finds Many Sincere Devotees.

Pray? Yes, most emphatically, yes, pray!

If a child prays or asks its father for a favor, ought not mankind a thousand times more so pray to God, the creator, from whom all blessings come?

The churches take Jesus as their example as a Savior.

Christian Scientists take Jesus as their example as a healer.

Vegetarians take Jesus as their example as a true vegetarian who would not accept money made by this dead-flesh traffic. He kicked the money changers over, calling them dead-flesh thieves, and said, "Take these things or thieves hence. My house shall be called the house of prayer, but ye have made it a den of thieves."

Spiritualists take Jesus as their example as a medium.

Now Jesus filled these places by his doctrine taught, deeds performed, life lived, and truth demonstrated, as no other person did.

Now this same Jesus claimed God was his father, being one with him, and prayed that we all might be one likewise; and yet how is it possible that any person or set of persons who should belong to one or the other of the above classes, that could for one moment discard the bond that ties in Christian love—Prayer. The very thought is enough to send a thrill of horror through the sublimest altitude of a loving Father's care.

Jesus continued all night in prayer, and bid us pray for those who despitefully use and persecute us. He prayed for Simon, that his faith would not fail.

Paul said, first prayer and supplication be made, as that was acceptable to God.

Cornelius was informed by an angel of God, that his prayers and alms had come up for a memorial before God.

In everything by prayer, let your request be made known unto God. The prayer of faith shall save the sick. The Lord heareth the prayer of the righteous. The effectual fervent prayer of the righteous availeth much.

If ten righteous could be found, it would have saved the city of Sodom and Gomorrah; but they were not found, hence the city's destruction. Likewise, so of the martyred President. It is said a nation prayed for the President's recovery, but failed, hence what availeth to pray.

If ten righteous would have saved several cities from being destroyed, then ten righteous in a nation would have saved the life of the President, but where were the righteous; they were not to be found, hence the nation mourns the loss of the assassinated.

The Bible says that God will not hear the prayers of flesh-eaters, hence if a nation of dead-flesh eaters do pray, their prayers will not avail. It also says that whatever is asked is received of God, if his commandments are kept and men DO HIS WILL. How many of the nation that prayed obeyed this Divine injunction? Did you? If not, did a nation pray? If so, why not, Elijah and Elias like, prevail? To say there is no personal God is too absurd for a moment's consideration. Might as well say a child had no personal father or was not made in his image or likeness.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD--ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

Bear in mind that all notices for this page are cut down to suit the space we have to occupy when received.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Judge Davis, president of the board of children's guardians, Terre Haute, Ind., has given his consent for Professor Henry of a Chicago school of hypnotism to experiment with the children in the home maintained by the board. It is Mr. Henry's theory that by hypnotic suggestion he can start a train of thought in the minds of the children for better things. Children who have been taken from vicious parents will be experimented with. Judge Davis says he does not believe it can do the children harm and possibly will have good results.

M. E. Sell writes from Berkley, Cal.: "I have seen no notice in The Progressive Thinker of the passing to spirit life of Capt. E. W. Gould, a contributor for many years to your and other Spiritualist publications. He passed to spirit life at the age of 89 years and 11 months, retaining all his faculties. I knew him as a friend for forty years, and can truly say that he lived his religion."

Declaring that the modern church is a "good deal of a misfit," the Rev. Dr. Rainsford makes a plea for Sunday saloons in the new Year Book of St. George's Church, Stuyvesant Square, New York, of which he is rector. Dr. Rainsford says: "Distinctly the tide ebbs strongly from all forms of organic Christianity. Multitudes of good men who used to come to church more or less regularly now spend Sunday in outdoor recreation. If the saloons were open—as, in my judgment they should be—at midday and at dinner hour, they might keep shut at the dangerous and unprofitable hours during which they are now doing their evil work. The hunger for the spiritual is not dead among people. The woeful multiplicity of religious fads and sectlets—mushrooms of a night and a day—abundantly proves this. Many good but ill-informed or lop-sided people are putting an immense fund of religious energy into organizations mistakenly called churches. Explain it as we may, the modern church is a good deal of a misfit, and only the blind or ignorant or unsympathetic refuse to see it."

Mrs. S. L. W. writes: "I must tell you I think The Progressive Thinker grows better every year. It seems to me it is almost a perfect spiritual paper now."

J. A. Laut writes from Detroit, December 27: "The Society of Willing Workers, at 333 Michigan avenue, is in a most flourishing condition. Meetings are held each Thursday and Sunday evenings, with large attendance. December 26 was a red letter event in the history of this thriving band of brothers and sisters. The hall was trimmed with pines and greens, and across the platform overhead was hung in evergreen letters, 'Deeds, Not Creeds,' behind which hung the handsomely-framed charter, which was formally presented. President Mishler invited all prominent lecturers and mediums to the platform. Mrs. Harlow, the secretary, acted as master of the program, and called up twenty-four participants of varied note and talent in speech, song and music. Dr. Burrows and choir sang 'There is Room Enough for All," at the close. Refreshments were served, and dancing followed. The Willing Workers are prosperous and progressive. They should have a regular speaker."

Jane Luce writes from Detroit, Mich.: "It was my pleasure while spending the holidays in this city to accompany my friends to hear Rev. St. Omer Briggs, who is serving the Society of Spiritual Unity. She was assisted by Mrs. Jenkins, of Windsor, Can. Her subject, the Old and the New, was well chosen and was by her guides ably handled. After the discourse the pastor said: 'We will now proceed with the baptismal service.' Two young ladies and their aged mother, a child, I should say, of nine years, and its mother, passed and stood in front of the rostrum. She asked the question, 'Who giveth these children to receive a spiritual baptism?' The response came, 'I, their mother.' Then placing her hand on each of them, she said; 'As water is an emblem of purity, may your lives in the future be as spotless as the snow.' I wish I could give a verbatim report of the questions asked the parents, and the answers given, and the words spoken to each. They were such that would make a lasting impression. The service was followed by readings and tests by both Mrs. Jenkins and Mrs. Briggs."

Prof. George Forbes presents the hypothecates, that "a planet exists beyond the orbit of Neptune, and separated from it by more than three times the distance of that planet." In "Higher Realms," page 227, by Arthur F. Milton, printed in 1895 by the Light of Truth Publishing Company, it reads: "There are two more planets beyond Neptune at immense distances, with little hope (at present) of discovery by telescope."

Mrs. A. K. Edwards, clairvoyant and medium, after several months' absence in the East, has returned to her home, 675 Osgood street, near Lincoln Park, Chicago, and will be pleased to meet her former friends and patrons.

B. G. Sweet writes from Empire City, Kansas "Bro. D. W. Hull has been with us for a little over three weeks, and he has undoubtedly done good work for us. He has been lecturing for the Galena, Kan., and Joplin, Mo., people, up to last Sunday, December 29, when he commenced a course of lectures with us here. Mr. and Mrs. B. G. Sweet furnish the hall, which is capable of seating three hundred people, also lights, fuel, etc., free for the use of the lecturer, and the good of the cause they love. At our Sunday afternoon meeting about thirty people were present to listen to the lecture, but in the evening the attendance was increased to seventy-five. Last evening, December 30, we had fully one hundred or more in attendance, with the most perfect order and strict attention to every word uttered by Brother Hull, showing a deep interest in his explanation of the Bible. This is a new field for spiritual work, and Brother Hull's words have sent peoples' thoughts soaring off into fields heretofore unexplored by them. The harvest is surely ripe, as the discussions among the people upon the street concerning Brother Hull's lectures is an indication that we are in a fair way of gathering in a number of earnest Spiritualists from the ranks of Bible worshipers. Another hopeful indication is, written questions are being handed in for Brother Hull to answer from the platform. We are very much in hopes of being able to organize a Spiritual Society while Brother Hull is with us."

C. H. Doty writes: "I have been a Spiritualist since 1850. I would like to see more harmony among us. I think all of us are uncharitable and unbrotherly to each other at times, in a greater or less degree. We have no occasion or right to call each other hard names. We are differently constituted. Some are strong in intellect and reason—strong in firmness and self esteem, and not over-endowed with intuition, faith and veneration. Such people are inclined to be logical, exact, scientific, slow to receive. Their lives we may say are rather fixed. And when they question all spirits, 'have you seen God?' and get a universal no; and when they trace the old Hebrew Scriptures to pagan myths; and when they find not one word outside the Gospels in their support; and when they trace the larger part of those gospels to earlier writings, and when by examination the whole scheme called salvation, is found to be inconsistent with love, wisdom, and reason, what could we expect? Reverse the picture. A sensitive temperament—an emotional nature—strong love—tenacious hope—veneration bordering on servitude—faith almost inseparable from superstition—an education nearly becoming second nature—what could we expect? One disposition urges this way. The other disposition fails to urge. Both may be right in some things, and wrong in some things. But we should not excommunicate each other. The basis of our examinations must be analogy, nature, the human soul and spirit communication."

Dr. Sarah M. Dudley writes from Elyria, Ohio: "I have been serving the Elyria (Ohio) Society for six weeks past very satisfactorily. The public interest has been marked. Christmas night the children of the Lyceum had a Christmas tree, beautifully trimmed and loaded with candies and gifts. The tree was presented by the president of the society, Mr. Fred Martin. The children of the lyceum are under the skillful tuition of Miss Jessie Hank, and gave ample evidence of the manner in which they have been instructed by the excellent way in which they carried out their program. The young organist, Miss Ada Van Housen, received many gifts. She has contributed her services voluntarily for the society and is well appreciated. The crowning gifts of the evening were the offerings presented Miss Jessie Hank, by the lyceum children and the society. The society of Elyria Spiritualists is small, but very earnest and zealous. Mr. Martin is an enthusiastic Spiritualist, is untiring in his efforts toward promoting the growth of the society, and is helping in all ways with money, time and energy. I go from here to Kalamazoo, Mich., to serve the society at that city."

Mrs. Sarah Stone Rockhill, of Alliance, Ohio, sends in a large club of subscribers. The Progressive Thinker is in an exceedingly healthy condition, thanks to its numerous friends throughout the country.

Homer T. Garyan writes from Cleveland, Ohio: "We write to extend through your valuable paper a very happy new year to Rev. Frank McKinley, of Sandusky, Ohio, for his grand and noble work in this city the past year, both in lectures and trumpet seances."

The Milwaukee Sentinel says: "There is always a dark side to even the brightest possibilities. If the hypnotist can perform such remarkable deeds for the good of humanity, he can also do much harm. It has become a common plea in criminal cases that the defendants have acted under the spell of hypnotism. Envious and plotting persons may seek revenge by exercising their knowledge of hypnotism. If an indifferent actress can be transformed into a star by the right sort of hypnotism, what is to prevent a star from being changed to a second-rate actress by the spell of a wicked rival? Great singers may be hypnotized so that they are unable to produce the celebrated notes that bring them fortunes. Popular writers will be most vulnerable. Some embittered author might take it into his head to compel William D. Howells to write blood and thunder novels, Edgar Saltus might be made to devote himself to Sunday-school literature, and the women writers who are making fortunes by their historical narratives might be compelled to produce twentieth century yarns. It is just as well to be prepared for the worst. If hypnosis becomes a generally recognized power in the world social conditions will be revolutionized. Legislatures will be compelled to make an entirely new code of laws for the protection of the public. The day may come when the wearing of smoked glasses may be a necessary precaution against the twentieth century evil eye. It is to be hoped, however, that Dr. Quackenbos will be allowed to communicate what he knows about hypnotism only to a few trustworthy and conscientious persons. 'Science is not a thing to fool with' has been a generally accepted axiom. It appears to be about time to protect one's great, retiring, unostentatious subconscious ego."

When writing for this paper use a pen or typewriter.

Samuel Anderson writes from Montana: "The Progressive Thinker grows better with every issue, and when Brother Hull and Jamieson are through 'chewing the rag,' we will all be ready to rally round the flag until next time. Good wishes for the best paper printed."

The Capital of Des Moines, Iowa, says: "The program for the first annual convention of the State Spiritualists' Association, which will meet at Oskaloosa, January 16, 17, 18 and 19, has been issued. The chief feature of the convention will undoutedly be the presence of Harrison D. Barrett, of Boston, president of the National Spiritualists Association. A rate of a fare and a third for this meeting has been granted by the Western Passenger Association, on the certificate plan, providing one hundred or more attend the convention from abroad. Tickets may be bought three days before the opening of the meeting and are good to return three days after its close, this announcement having been made by Stella A. Fisk, of Keokuk, secretary of the association. The executive committee of the association will hold a meeting on the evening of January 16. The call to order will be the following morning by the president, Dr. G. A. Hinton, of Oskaloosa. Among those who will be present and take part in the convention are Mrs. Hattie C. Westlake, of Marshalltown; Dr. C. R. Fisk, of Keokuk; Mrs. Eva McCoy, of Marshalltown, and Mrs. Stella A. Fisk, of Keokuk. Mr. Barrett's chief address will be made on the evening of January 18."

Mrs. D. L. Burrows writes from Gibson, Pa.: "A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands was received and gladly given a place in our cozy family circle. My husband has read it aloud during the long winter evenings, and has made them pass only too quickly. After reading the description of the hells, I have about made up my mind to go back to a belief in the orthodox place of punishment. Why, in comparison it is a grand old picnic, pink lemonade and all; it is cleaner and more purifying. I am going to be awful good after this."

Dr. Quackenbos says: "The time has come when souls may know of each other without the intermediary of the senses. I do not hesitate to say that we have within us an immaterial principle entirely independent of sense organs. These facts cast light upon the principles of telepathic communication. Minds brought into hypnotic contact can exchange thoughts, ideas, convictions and feelings which suggest the possibility that such minds may communicate without reference to space limitations. There is no difference as regards suggestibility between natural sleep and the socalled hypnotic trance. That being the case, every hour of natural sleep is prolific of opportunity for communication with those who have departed this life, and who knows that it does not take place?"

Correspondent of the Independent Church, Alliance, Ohio., writes: Professor Lockwood and wife have been with us during December, and the thinkers have enjoyed a rare treat. The scholarly demonstrated lectures contain a fund of information that every Spiritualist should hear. The high order of mediumship as presented by the spiritual instructors of Mrs. Lockwood, in their keen intellectual treatment of the many questions offered for consideration, was an unexpected and highly appreciated accompaniment to the Professor's work, a compliment to our rostrum. December 29 ends their engagement in Alliance and from here they go to Columbus, Ohio for the month of January. Our best wishes go with them."

The Chicago Record-Herald says: "One of the occasional contributors to the Battle Ground page writes as follows: 'Will you not kindly ask some of the readers of your excellent page to give their experiences with crystal gazing' in some such entertaining manner as Mrs. C. has told us of her psychical researches. Andrew Lang has been advising his readers in the Monthly Review to purchase crystal balls from the Psychical Research Society, peer into them earnestly and see what they shall see, then send along the result to him. In his instructions to crystal-gazing novices Mr. Lang says: 'It is best to go alone into a room, sit down with the back to the light, place the ball at a just focus in the lap of a dark dress, or a dark piece of cloth, try to exclude reflections, think of anything you please, and stare for, say, five minutes at the ball. That is all.' The crystal is a spherical ball of solid glass, about two inches in diameter. Mr. Lang has known people who have seen in a crystal things that were actually happening miles away. More wonderful, he has known two persons, gazing into separate crystals at the same moment, to see the same picture. Why can people see pictures of real persons and real things in this way? Mr. Lang hints that it may be "a rudimental survival of some organ that was useful to man when his arcestors were other kinds of animals."

E. R. Hopkins writes from Brooklyn, N. Y.: "The Band of Willing Workers, under the direction of Mrs. Marie Robinson and assistants, Mrs. Bogart and Mrs. Dr. Franks, gladdened fifty little hearts that but for this sweet charity would experience little pleasure in these closing days of 1901. Beside the large, well-loaded Christmas tree, they were provided with shoes, fifty-six pairs of stockings, twelve pairs of mittens, thirty-seven dressed dolls and many articles of underclothing. Truly the hall at 1101 Bedford avenue, Brooklyn, was made a blessed haven to each one of the fifty poor children, for whom this band of little girls have planned and work so faithfully and well."

Mattie E. Hayden writes from 1431 Columbus avenue, Indianapolis, Ind.: "Spiritualism in its true sense has taught us this principle, that we can be happy only in proportion to the happiness of those by whom we are surrounded, and just in proportion to our own efforts in rendering them happy do we overcome our own selfish tendencies and increase our patience and happiness. Nothing we can do with a single dollar will go so far and last so long and insure a greater amount of true enjoyment to all members of the family circle, as remitting it to you, and thus secure a weekly visit of the dear old Progressive Thinker for the incoming year, for we see by the tag that No. 631 marks the end of our trip; but we have been aboard with you so long that life would lose half its charms for us to be thrown overboard now. We are now holding public circles every Tuesday and Friday nights, and an afternoon meeting every Wednesday from 2 to 4 p. m. Will go anywhere within 100 miles of Indianapolis to hold Sunday meetings, deliver funeral addresses, etc.; are open for camp engagements for 1902."

Alfred Curtis writes: "The Progressive Spiritual Society held its annual Christmas tree entertainment at North avenue and Burling street, December 27. The entertainment was largely attended. The president presided, and exceedingly appropriate speeches and tests were delivered by the pastor, Mrs. Hilbert, assisted by Mrs. Schwan (a well known speaker of our own society), and Mr. Hill, who is a gentleman of the right calibre. Mr. Garland, a member of our society, ably presided at the Piano. Following the speeches and tests came Master Arthur Rupp, with an exceedingly well delivered recitation. A quartette was then given by the Birlinget Sisters, introducing Santa Claus, who then came in. It is needless to say the little ones were highly delighted. Good old Santa Claus had presents for every one of them. He at once commenced to deliver his books and boxes of candy with an appropriate speech to every little one present. After the audience had dispersed Santa Claus distributed some very nice presents to each of the members of the society. This concluded the proceedings for the evening, and the society hopes to have the opportunity and pleasure of making so many little ones happy on Christmas for many, many years to come."

F. O. Matthews writes from Buffalo, N. Y.: "My own work has been a success here. My lectures are followed by demonstrations, personal tests and psychometric readings and spirit messages, attested to by the large audiences that have greeted me in the finest and best equipped hall of the city, showing that Buffalo is alive to the interests of Spiritualism. If it were not for phenomena and phenomenal mediumship, where would our great intellectual philosophers and theorists have a basis on which to stand?"

Laura Matlock, secretary of the M. S. S. A., writes from Owosso, Mich.: "The ninth annual mid-winter convention of the Michigan State Spiritualists Association will be held in Battle Creek, February 7, 8 and 9. The following speakers and mediums are expected to be with us: Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Sprague, missionaries for the N. S. A.; Dr. A. B. Spinney, Mrs. Carpenter, Mrs. Julia M. Walton, Mrs. Nellie S. Baude, Mrs. Dorothy Dailey, Mrs. A. Ferris, Dr. W. O. Knowles, Dr. P. T. Johnson and Mrs. Carrie Weatherford. On most railroads, parties of ten or more can procure reduced rates, and we hope the Spiritualists of Michigan will come and lend their mental and financial assistance to make this meeting a grand success."

James Liddle, of Toronto, Canada, writes: "I received my premium book, 'A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands.' I am exceedingly interested in it. I have read it through once, and I have commenced to read it again. I have now the eight valuable premium books. The weekly visits of The Progressive Thinker come to me with so many good things. I cannot begin to tell you the great pleasure I take in reading it. You have my best thoughts and wishes for your success."

James Boyd writes from Riverside, Cal.: "Your 'Wanderer in the Spirit Lands' is a marvel in every respect, a mixture of Dante and Milton, with all the interest of reality as understood and interpreted by modern Spiritualists and Spiritualism. No one can ever read it understandingly without having a greater desire to do good and be good for their own sake, with a greater detestation of all that savors of evil. Verily, your 'Wanderer' shows that as 'a man sows, so also shall he reap' in this world and in that which is to come. Accept my sincere thanks for the pleasure you have given me in perusing the volume, and for your efforts to spread pure Spiritualism."

Mr. Jessup and Alice Gehring have an engagement for one month at Elwood, Ind.

Prof. W. M. Lockwood and wife are engaged for the month of January at Columbus, Ohio. Address them as follows: Bryden Hotel, East Town street, Columbus, Ohio.

Maybell St. Clair writes from Smyrna, Mich.: "The Home Circle articles are intensely interesting and instructive, and never fail to leave behind a lesson well worth many times the price of the paper to those who read and heed. The Progressive Thinker is growing better at each publication, and furnishes food to the thousands who are starving for Spiritualism and its grand and glorious teachings. Long may it continue to herald forth the glorious truth!"

Carrie F. Weatherford goes to Sturgis, Mich., for January, and Kalamazoo for February. Will answer calls for funerals. Her permanent home address is Alaska, Mich.

The Arrest of Dr. Freedman.

To the Editor:—I write to inform those who are interested in medical liberty. You remember last year what a hard time I had with state laws in Pennsylvania and Ohio, and once in New York City where I beat the medical hounds. Twice I paid $17, each time not counting the expense besides, which has been very heavy. Now, since I returned to Chicago, the medical pirates, who lack the ability that I have so long demonstrated before the public and Spiritualists, have seen fit to summons me for practicing medicine. The fact is I never recommend drugs. I am a graduate of Dutton's Medical College, a chartered college by the State of Illinois. I graduated in March 25, 1899. They would not register me when I presented my diploma in the presence of Dr. Dutton, they stating that our college, as they always choose to term it, was not in good standing. The fact, as is well known, our college is the most progressive and most practical for the benefit of a suffering people. The medical experimentors of Chicago and of Illinois thought the only way to try and knock out these modern schools is to make a law compelling every body graduating from any medical school, to first pass an examination before the state medical board. This act came in force on July 1, 1899, and the law implies that every one graduating before that date is exempt from passing a medical, bigoted, selfish board. Already such a case as mine has been taken to the supreme court of Illinois, and beaten the medical board. They think that when they have tired me financially that I will give up the struggle! My lawyer is Henry S. Wilcox, of 163 Randolph street, Chicago, and I was obliged to put up a retainer's fee of $25. Now, I ask you, dear reader, magnetists, doctors and liberals, to help me with funds. I have a letter in my possession from Harrison D. Barrett, stating that the N. S. A. will stand by me, and all mediums and healers who are fighting for a just cause, so I ask all people with means to assist me in carrying this case through and make a test case of it. I know we can win. So send in your funds to the writer at once for the fight, and medical liberty and justice.

DR. LOUIS H. FREEDMAN,
The Australian Healer.
3036 Indiana Avenue, Chicago, Ill.

We believe Dr. Freedman to be an excellent healer, and perfectly honest, and he will faithfully apply the funds given him for the purpose of defending himself, and at the same time helping others.—Editor.

This school was started and has been continued for the purpose of furnishing a place where those interested and active in the Spiritualist cause can go and get assistance in better fitting themselves for the work they are doing. Of course but little, comparatively, can be accomplished in one short term. Spiritualist speakers and writers, like all others before the public, need a good education; to obtain this takes years instead of weeks of time, and is the best acquired in the early part of one's life.

It has long been my wish to see Spiritualists doing something for education. It now gives me great pleasure to say that there is a prospect my wish will be gratified. It looks as if a well equipped school will in due time be established in this country by Spiritualists with at least a two or three years' course of instruction, where our young men and women with bright minds and high purposes can go and be educated and be saved to our cause by the protection of Spiritualist influences. A fine school building costing nearly $40,000 has been donated by a wealthy Spiritualist, and steps for incorporation have already been taken. It only awaits an endowment fund in order to be put into active operation.

It will be a proud day for Spiritualism when a permanent institution of learning is established under its auspices, especially if it be made strong by a wide-spread and generous support, so its classes shall be full and overflowing with eager students, who, graduating, will add their power to the scholarship of the world and to the elevation and honor of Spiritualism.

The cry of the present hour is for the organization of societies. These will need public workers. They might as well not be organized unless competent workers can be found to take charge of them. Such workers in the Christian church are called ministers. They profess to minister to the needs of the world in spiritual and moral truths. This indeed is a noble mission. But their lack of knowledge of the most valuable of all spiritual truths makes their work well nigh a failure.

In this matter the true Spiritualist has a great advantage over all Christian preachers and is the true minister to humanity. But he, too, is a partial failure as a public teacher unless he supplements his psychic power as well as his moral power, with a high and broad intellectual culture. Without this every Spiritualist worker, man or woman, is cheating himself. Uneducated, he is hampered and hindered by his mental limitations. His work is weakened and often made insipid by what he leaves out because of his ignorance, or it is not less often made vulgar by what he puts in because of his illiteracy; and worst of all, he is often wholly unconscious either of his ignorance or illiteracy. He is also cheating Spiritualism by not fitting himself to do for it all which he might do with the faculties which nature gave him. More than all, he is cheating humanity by not making himself the power he might be for enlightening the ignorant by bringing to them the rich results of learning.

Well endowed chartered colleges are to form a part of the great future of Spiritualism. One of them, it seems, is on its way—is almost here—but until it arrives there is no better place for the worker to get assistance than at the Spiritualist Training School at Lily Dale. BLIND.

It has ever been since time began,
And ever will be, till time lose breath,
That love is a mood—no more—to man,
And love to woman is life or death!
For her hope dies when love's sun sets;
For him hope sleeps—till a new day dawn,
And she remembers and he forgets,
While the world rolls on—while the world rolls on.

It is woman who sits with her starved desire
And drinks to passion in cups of tears.
She reads by the light of her heart on fire
The secrets of love through lonely years.
But out of all she has felt, or heard,
Or read by the glow of her soul's white flame,
If she dare but utter aloud one word,
How the world cries shame!—how the world cries shame!

Whatever a man may think or feel
He can tell to the world, and it hears aright;
But it bids the woman conceal—conceal,
And woe for the thoughts that at last ignite!
She may serve up gossip, or dwell on fashion,
Or play the critic with speech unkind;
But alas! for the woman who speaks with passion,
For the world is blind—O, the world is blind.

It cannot distinguish between the glow
Of a gleaming star in a sky of gold,
Or a spent cigar in the dust below—
'Twixt unclad Eve, or a wanton bold.
And ever if woman speak what she feels
(And feels consistent with God's great plan),
It has cast her under its Juggernaut wheels
Since the world began—since the world began.

A Marvelous New Book on Personal Magnetism and Hypnotism

Startling Facts which are Agitating the Whole Country.

The Labors of Nearly Fifty Experts Combined for the Elevation of Mankind.

The Great Universities of America and Europe Contribute to the Final Course.

The Occult so Simple that Everybody can be Successful.

One of the most astounding new books of the age is the one just published by the American College of Sciences, of Philadelphia.

The new facts presented prove that every person has the power to exert an influence over others, and that it is not merely the "strongest" mind that can sway multitudes.

This wonderful book divides hypnotic science into its various branches and tells how each may be quickly mastered mastered so completely at home that anyone can perform the most marvelous things that all have read about, but that few have seen demonstrated.

The true secrets of Hypnotism, Magnetic Healing, Personal Influence and Absent Control are laid bare so that the most ordinary persons can readily grasp and utilize what nature has endowed them with.

By devoting a little time to the science you can lift yourself from despair to the grandest heights of affluence and success—can gratify your ambitions and gain marked business and social power.

Professional and business men everywhere have given this new book their unqualified praise, and even ministers of the gospel have expressed their heartiest approval.

If you wish to avail yourself of the knowledge contained in this beautifully illustrated work, simply send a postal or letter to the American College of Sciences, Dept. P. L. 9, 416 to 420 Walnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa., and a copy will be sent you by return mail, free of charge.

RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

By S. Weil. Cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents. This is a work of great value, written by one of the keenest, most powerful and most truly religious minds of the day. It is particularly a work which should be put into the hands of those who have freed themselves from the dogmas of orthodoxy and from the dogmas of materialistic science, for it will strengthen the conviction of the free mind that mind and senses are not the whole of life.

The chapters reveal a new method in psychic and spiritual research. They show vivid glimpses of a stupendous moral cosmos that will supersede moral confusion, that only verifiable tenets can survive, and the childhood period of faith and fancy will be superseded by knowledge and facts.

THE PSYCHOGRAPH
DIAL PLANCHETTE.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than seven years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means of developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive Communications?

The Psychograph is an invaluable assistant. A pamphlet with full directions for the

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt. D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

NEW EDITION.

THE LYCEUM GUIDE.

Do you want to organize a society, for the social, intellectual and spiritual advancement of the children and adults?

THE PROGRESSIVE LYCEUM

furnishes all you desire.

Do you want a self-sustaining society, founded on the basic principles of the spiritual philosophy? You have it in THE PROGRESSIVE LYCEUM.
It furnishes a system of evolution by internal growth; not the old cup and pitcher Sunday-school.
It has something to interest and advance every member, and those who are most active in teaching are the ones who learn most.

NO SPECIAL INSTRUCTOR REQUIRED.

THE LYCEUM GUIDE gives every detail needed for effective organization, and for conducting the society when established.
It has Golden Chain Recitations; the prettiest songs and music; choral responses; a service for a Band of Mercy; calisthenics; how to make the badges, flags and banners; marching exercises; full instructions in conducting the exercises, with parliamentary rules, etc.
Many Spiritualists living in isolation, have formed lyceums in their own families; others have banded, two or three families together, while large societies have organized on the lyceum platform, and found great interest in this self-instructive method.
Do not wait for a "missionary" to come to your assistance, but take hold of the matter yourself, procure copies of the GUIDE, and commence with the few or many you find interested.
Mrs. Emma Rood Tuttle (address, Berlin Heights, Ohio) will answer all questions pertaining to lyceum work.
The price of THE LYCEUM GUIDE is 50 cents, postpaid, or by the dozen, 40 cents each, by express, charges paid by receiver. Address

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

Fair Play: Q. When the famous Seybert Commission held their investigation, why did not the Spiritualists give cordial assistance? Why did not mediums voluntarily give opportunity to have the truth fully demonstrated?

A. Smith: Q. Why do not mediums accept the challenges made, as the $1,000 offering for genuine materialization, and thus at once prove their claims?

A. These questions represent a great number which have been sent by correspondents, and the same general answer applies to them all. After the farce by which the Seybert Commission met the demands of the law enabling them to retain the large sum bestowed by the will of Henry Seybert, the chairman wrote me asking if I could recommend a clairvoyant who would be willing to come before the commission. To this request I could give only one reply. The high commission had proved recreant to its trust, and I was forced to reply: "I cannot give you the desired address of a clairvoyant with my endorsement, not because I have not full faith in clairvoyance, but because I have no confidence in your commission. The methods you proposed to investigate the rappings through Mrs. Fox-Kane were so insulting she could not with honor submit to them, and if you proceeded in a similar manner with the best clairvoyant you could not obtain any other than negative results, which you would at once herald as a refutation of the claims of spiritual seeing.

"If your commission had proceeded intelligently and earnestly to investigate, with a candor and integrity worthy of a great movement which claims to bring assurance of immortal life, it would be the bounden duty of every Spiritualist to assist you to the utmost of his power. All would gladly do so, and when your commission was first proposed, they rejoiced that at length the attention of scientific men was called to the subject. They soon saw their error; that they could expect nothing but an ex parte examination and verdict. When your report appeared, instead of a dignified document, such as men of science usually write, it was composed in the banterling style of buffoonery and cuteness of the court-fool; and while the secular press cried Eureka! honest men, even those who opposed Spiritualism, were made sad at heart, that men who claimed high places in science, should so far forget themselves as to play the clown, and subscribe to a report more damaging to themselves than the cause they sought to bring into disrepute.

"Send you a clairvoyant! Clairvoyance is one of the most subtile spiritual conditions, the coming and going of which cannot be assured. It comes to the sensitives who are as delicate to the influence as the magnetic needle; yet your commission want a clairvoyant, as you would a machine, to do a certain work in a way you demand, and if they fail, you will cry: 'See! here is a clairvoyant recommended by the Spiritualists whom she deceived, but she cannot deceive us!' This applies with equal force to all phases of mediumship, and the higher the phase the more susceptible it is to environment. Manifestations cannot be produced to order. The subtle conditions on which they depend are almost wholly unknown, or when understood, difficult to comply with. So sensitive and delicate is this state that even expectancy by the subject or of those who are near may entirely vitiate the results."

The reason why I would not recommend a clairvoyant or medium to accept challenges, even when given in good faith, is thus apparent. When a student of astronomy would observe an eclipse of the sun, he goes to the locality where the phenomena can be seen. Suppose on the contrary he should enter a darkened room, and say to some one who had declared that there would be an eclipse: "If that is true, bring in the sun, and let me see it. If it cannot be eclipsed here I will not believe you. I never saw it, and you cannot show it, consequently your words are false."

Psychometrist: Q. Who was the discoverer of psychometry? Who has made the most exhaustive researches in that direction?

A. Dr. J. R. Buchanan first clearly defined the sensitiveness of the brain and gave it a name. His researches were continuous through many years. The most compact report and most exhaustive was made by Prof. Denton in his "Soul of Things." Both he and Dr. Buchanan apparently exercised great care in their experiments, yet a careful analysis of their labors, it seems to me, will show that with the ardor and overzeal of new discoverers they broaden the field of psychometry until it overlaps others quite as important. They make psychometry explain not only the facts directly referable to it, but others which with equal propriety may be accounted for by clairvoyance or spirit control.

As an example: A fragment from the swathing-band of a mummy is placed in the hand of a psychometrist. It retains the impress of the individual it enclosed, and of that remote age. It also retains the impress of the hands through which it passed, and of the persons who have had it in their possession and gave it to the sensitive for inspection. The latter holds it, and delineates the character of the mummy when living 4000 years ago, and does not read the character of the person standing beside the specimen! How is it proven that the psychometrist does not receive these impressions through clairvoyance, that is, through her own spiritual perception, or from an independent spiritual source? Neither investigator has given a guide, or chartered the path. On reading the record of results one is constantly forced to admit that the spiritual theory is the most plausible in a great number of cases, and at times the only admissible one.

Anna E. Kanky: Q. Will you give the address of Elsie Hornbeck, medium for Frances E. Willard?

A. Monon, Ind.

May Crosby: Q. What is meant by astronomical cycles?

A. Astronomical cycles are a series of movements or events which completed, are again resumed and this goes on perpetually. As an illustration take the solar cycle, which is that period when the same day of the week occurs on the same day of the year. Were it not for the added day in leap year this cycle would contain seven years, but with this interpolation of a day in four years, the cycle is twenty-eight years.

The falling of new and full moon on the same day of the year occurs once in nineteen years, which is the lunar cycle.

There is a cycle which measures the variation of the moon in its orbit; that is, take that satellite in any given position, and after many variations and perturbations, it will come to exactly the same place.

So with the earth; its orbit oscillates and there are disturbances which if indefinitely continued would bring about an entire change, but after a time these are reversed and go as far the other way, thus swinging back and forth, preserving the equilibrium. This oscillation is measured by some millions of years.

It would appear that all events move in cycles more or less vast in measurement of time. That there is constant return after many wanderings and starting again from the same point.

There are yet vaster cycles, which measure incomprehensible ages, such as that of the revolution of the solar system around its remote centre of attraction; and the rotation of the cosmic zone we call the milky way.

MANNERS IN THE SLUMS.

"So, you've been slummin', did you say,
You've been about the whole long day,
In callin' on the wretched poor,
An' peekin' in from door to door,
An' askin' this, an' askin' that,
Of ev'ry little ragged brat—
An' talkin' to the big folks, too,
An' tellin' of 'em what they ought to do.

"An' when the day is through, what hev you done?
You've left some tracts, you say, to ev'ry one!
But hev you got 'em work to earn their bread—
To keep a fire, an' roof safe over head,
An' now, you'll go an' tell what you hev seen,
An' preach about the places where you've been,
An' folks will think how mighty good you be,
How full of pious deeds, an' sanctity!

"But let me tell you now, right here, thet I
Don't hev no call to 'slick the blab' nor lie.
You need to put your manners in a tub,
An' wash 'em well with soap, an' rub,
An' rinse 'em out, an' hang 'em on a line,
Where sun an' air kin make 'em fair an' fine,
Afore you dast to gab about the slum,
An' 'bout the dirt thet's there, or what is done.

"I tell you now, the poor man's home
Belongs to him, an' him alone,
His sorrows too, an' grief, an' care,
Are just his own, an' his to bear,
An' you folks a'int no need to pry—
To find out 'when' or 'how' or 'why'—
A' stirrin' up the want or shame,
For which, may be, they ain't to blame.

"Don't you suppose the poor hev hearts,
Thet feel the hurts, an' feel the smarts?
What right hev you to poke your nose
Around their cupboards, or their clothes,
For how'd you feel, supposin' they Should chance to call on you some day,
An' interfere about your home?
Mos' like you'd ring your telephone—
For the police to come an' fix
'Em quick, for their bad burglar tricks,
An' lock 'em in the city jail,
Without a cent, or chance of bail!

"That's what you'd do if they'd intrude,
Or be unmannerly, or rude.
You say I'm talkin' through my hat,
That I don't know just where I'm at,
That 'cause we're poor, an' in the slums,
An' some of us degraded 'bums,'
We don't know nothin' 'bout what's right,
Nor can't reach up to your great height.

"Maybe we can't, but then, inside
We've got a little bit of pride
That makes us human, don't you know,
If we are poor, an' counted low.
That pride's like strings across our hearts;
At strangers' touch it snaps, an' smarts,
An' hurts us hard, jest through and through,
At what you're tryin' for to do.

"It makes us lose what faith we had,
An' helps to send us to the bad,
For sacred are our secrets, too,
The same's though they belonged to you.
The poor man's heart, an' soul, an' home
Are his own kingdom, his alone,
An' if you're really bent on good
To bring about man's brotherhood,
Please 'mind your manners' when you come
To visit folks down in the slum."

THE YEAR PAST.

'Tis done; 'tis done; 'tis past, and o'er
With one year added to life's short store;
So swiftly doth time in its years fly past,
You and I ere we know it will find it our last;
Then, when this life on earth is o'er,
May we all find rest on that heavenly shore,
A rest that's sublime to both you and I,
In that realm of bliss where years fly not by,
Where time is unknown; nights are changed into day,
And the penalty of death, none ever can pay.
There death is unknown, nor is there decay
Of those once held earthly, but now passed away,
On that beautiful shore, where waste is unknown
You and I for earth's wrongs must surely atone.
So it truly behooves us to walk in paths straight,
Then our life over there will ever be bright.

ASPHODEL BLOOMS AND OTHER OFFERINGS

BY

EMMA ROOD TUTTLE.

This volume, containing a selection of Poems by this gifted author, is now ready for delivery. Mrs. Emma Rood Tuttle has been too long before the public as a writer of verse of exquisite thought and measure to require more than an announcement of this her latest work. It contains 285 pages, beautifully printed on elegant paper, with six full page engravings, including one of the author; is finely bound and embossed. It is a gift book that will please. Every Spiritualist in the land should have it.

TESTIFYING TO THE TRUTH

Spiritualists Should Bravely Declare What They Know.

To the Editor:—The renowned German philosopher, Fichte, upon thorough investigation and despite of all scholastic pride and all his prepossessions, became convinced that Spiritualism was true and holy. Then, though he had left the active literary world long before to dwell in the rest he had so well earned, he conceived it to be his duty to return to that world long enough to testify boldly what great and good things he had found by many infallible proofs in the facts and philosophy of our oft-derided cult.

He was therein entirely right, and noble. Nothing is so needed as the witnessing by those who have found the priceless pearl of everlasting life and light and love. If, to-day, those who do know would boldly tell that they do know, there would be no need of all the special "missionary work" of good Spiritualists, and there would be no discussion as to whether "Spiritualism is dying out." It is greatly gratifying to find the vast number of those in all ranks and in all professions and in all businesses who are convinced of the truth that discarnate spirits communicate with the incarnate. But it is as humiliating to find the majority of those so convinced trying to repress themselves, trying to hide their convictions many of them sneaking, some of them denying with oaths, like Peter. If all men in the United States upon a near day would write out their opinions on the great question of spirit intercourse (so-called) a majority would appear as believers. But each fears each. Hence a world of foolish cowardice.

This Fichte saw, and therefore he declared that the duty of all men at this hour is the duty of witnessing, witnessing boldly.

So urges also Pharos in the communications through the hand of Mrs. Underwood, Julia pleads by the hand of the celebrated Stead for the faithful bearing witness. And now come divers discarnate, and through the book, "Beyond the Vail," plead with all who know the truth that they shall let their light shine, lest they lose that light. If we can only persuade all convinced to shine, persuade them not to hide their light under a bushel or any other thing, there will be Spiritualist churches, temples, meeting-houses in every village in the land.

It is cowardice that ruins Spiritualism to-day. The earlier Spiritualists, Hare, Edmonds, Talmadge, Owen, et al., were brave men and spoke, and Spiritualism in their day filled all men's thought. I choose to follow these and if need be "face a frowning world" or one seeming to frown, frowning if at all only by a few weakling "pastors."

I attended seance seventy-two, recorded in paragraphs 1007 to 1018 in "Beyond the Vail," and I think I ought to testify publicly about that sitting.

For several years before this, I had in divers places and in divers times been participant in seances held by Mr. W. W. Aber. I saw, I heard, I felt many things which without the slightest doubt emanated from the world of spirits and not from or by, only through, the medium. But I was never thoroughly satisfied as to the manifestations in all respects until I experienced the things stated in the above paragraphs.

Mr. Nixon's account is correct—as far as it goes. Of course it is impossible to tell on a page or two all that occurred in a sitting through more than an hour. The only lack in the account—if it be a lack—is the severe compression by the compiler. I desire to add to it, because I believe it will be of public interest and utility so to do. Mr. Nixon says:

"S. N. Wood and His Slayer. This spirit came from the cabinet in good make-up and approached near to Judge Chesney, saying: 'Don't you know me, Mr. Chesney—S. N. Wood? Don't you know that they have never brought that man to trial yet for murdering me?'

Mr. Chesney: 'Yes, Sam, I know that; but he cannot escape justice. He must be suffering now. I am glad, Colonel, that I meet you here.'

"Spirit (with much feeling): 'Yes, my friend, it is a glorious privilege thus to meet again. Yes, yes, the man is suffering now. But wait till he gets to this side. Then indeed will the poor fellow feel the hand of retribution. Though his cowardly act sent me out of the body and though he fixed it so as not to get his earthly deserts, yet I can pity the poor soul as he must grope his way alone and in darkness.'"

The appearance and conversation of Col. Sam Wood (a distinguished character in Kansas history from the Border Ruffian times to the hour of his cowardly and brutal murder through the machinations of depraved politicians) as told by Mr. Nixon, was in every way wonderful to all present; but more than wonderful to the writer thereof. In the fall of 1864 he and I had crossed swords, when I was but a bit of a boy and a little impertinent. He had complained of the actions of some militiamen of mine concerning him, accused me of a breach of respect, and I, ignorant of the proprieties and duties just. So we became known to each other. Soon we became much better acquainted and I came to have a profound respect for his powerful intellect, undaunted courage and absolute honesty with himself in boldly proclaiming every conclusion he arrived at.

Of course such a man must in these days be a Spiritualist. Often have I heard him declare that through "the spirits" he had found sure ground, firm footing and faith, and a certain knowledge that there is no death; only life and more life and ever—more life, renewal, continuance, ascension. His favorite was that pearl of Edwin Arnold:

"He who died at Azam sends
This to comfort all his friends."

Finally, when "the deep damnation of his taking off" aroused universal sympathy for him and his family, making even the rancor of political enmities give place, it fell to me to write an editorial in the Topeka Daily Republican of the unique and strenuous life of this reformer. This editorial greatly pleased his family as being among the best estimates of the character, career and influence of Col. Wood; so that it was republished by Mrs. Wood in her memorial volume of her husband. The Topeka Daily Republican after this often called attention to the case of Col. Wood.

In the light of this history it must be considered no slight test that Col. Wood should come to me and come as he did and speak the words he did speak.

The test increases in force when we attend to the matter of his address to me, in the very beginning referring to the fact that his murderer had not been tried.

This test grows and fairly glows when Col. Wood adds: "I want to thank you, my friend, for your manifestation of sympathy for me and mine."

Then, as the record says, the Colonel actually wept and audibly sobbed and closed what had become a short address by words of divine pity for his wretched murderers.

He came, or seemed to come, from the slight cabinet of Mr. Aber and advanced eight or ten feet towards me and stood there and talked with me not farther off than three or four feet. His words were as loud as he ordinarily spoke when in this life.

The whole scene was both natural and theatrical. It was profoundly impressive. His doctrine of forgiveness and mercy was in keeping with the solemnity of the whole occasion and in perfect harmony with his whole life on earth. Here was a practical sermon on forgiveness. And mercy and forgiveness are, as Rusnik says, the deepest facts of all God's universes, material and spiritual. This was the creed of Shakspeare and Goethe also.

I have written this to induce all to testify boldly everywhere, to call attention to this new good book and to glory in the Spiritualism of Edmonds and Owen. E. E. CHESNEY.

ANALYTICAL.

That Old Deistic "Sop," or Chance.

Under the heading of "The God Question," by J. Young McFarland, in 631 of The Progressive Thinker, we read the following: "If he (Prof. Loveland), prefers a universe without a governmental control, he has at least as good a right to his choice as other anarchists."

Whether it is through desperation or stupidity that a man professing a little more than ordinary intelligence, should attempt to display the above ideas as matter either of philosophy, of science or logic, it is difficult to judge; though we would prefer either to the only alternative, viciousness.

Mr. McFarland gives us a God. God, by design, and virtue of supreme control. Given, in a fairly comprehensive manner, the control or effect, by a posteriori mode of reasoning we are to discover the prime creator of cause, or accept McFarland's God.

The conduct of organic government, of itself, is sufficient to distinctly establish the belief of all social government to be, that a just, omnipotent and irrespective designer is not in supreme control of the universal law, and its relations to conduct, as represented by politico-social events. The very fact that human, or any other order of government, either by custom or by rule, is extant and essential, nay even imperative, is evidence absolute, still say I, that a supreme, and judicious intelligence is not in full control.

Every governmental statute; every judicial ruling; every judicial official, either civil or military; every executive official, from corporal to colonel; from constable to hangman; every weapon from the cave dweller's flint to the great power's battle-ship, is evidence, positive, that a just and omnipotent being, either organic or universal is not in control.

The legislator who forms a rule (called law) of conduct or mode of punishment, for the universal or general application to his constituent peoples; absolutely ignores the deific functions he claims to be so conversant with; disrespecting His endowment of justice, potency and omniscience. Volumes of codes for conduct and punishments have been written and quoted for the efficient, and to the inefficient, control of the wise and ignorant, the orderly and vicious human products of this comparatively insignificant globe, sufficient to build another babelistic tower; each and every page of which was, and is, a positive declaration that the God of McFarland et al., is not, nor has he ever been, in control, even over and among the poor sub-civilians of our little astral nativity.

The social organization showing the greatest degree of trust, if not of faith, in a deity under full control, is that class of politico-social erratics, among whom he classes Mr. Loveland, the modern anarchists. In their radical disrespect for human rules and customs, they may be said to unwittingly infer a supremacy, to a degree of practical importance, in the justice and potency of lex Deo.

When two or more individuals meet and make oath, each to the other, that they will not cheat, rob or slay the other, it means that no designing intelligence, from a universal fountainhead, had pre-arranged in their soul's constructions, for a safety valve barring them from the dangerous antagonisms native to all. When two or more states or nations, not at war, make and execute serious terms, declaring that they each individually or collectively, shall mingle in social and business interrelations, and that each shall keep a standing army, both of civil and military units, to keep everybody from robbing, raping or murdering everybody else, it means that there is no high, moral, potentate; no supreme, omniscient law-maker and law-enforcer known and acknowledged in the transaction; no judicial omnipotence in supreme control.

I quote from an article of mine published in Light of Truth, of some two years ago, and court criticism on the same:

"All law is equally invulnerable to the functions of individual will, and any functionary, with a capacity to design, can become omnipotent, only by the ability to change infinite law, or thrust impregnable barriers between cause and effect. When law becomes a plaything in the hands of a speculator, it loses its prime function, and consequently its force and identity. If a designer is working through the universal law, or any branch of it, he can be so doing only by virtue of its plastic condition, and by which it is shorn of all vestiges of stability, thereby surrendering substance to a capricious rule; which, by this universal sacrifice of constancy, in universal government, must indisputably give us as a terrible reality, what has heretofore been but an imaginative shadow; a typical world of chance."

I also quote from Draper, in the History of the Conflict Between Religion and Science: "That which men call chance is only the effect of an unknown cause, even of chance there is a law; there is no such thing as providence, for Nature proceeds under irresistible laws, and in this respect the universe is only a vast automatic engine. The vital force which pervades the world, is what the illiterate call God."

And again I quote, and from Tyndall, in "Heat as a Mode of Motion": "The sum of her (Nature's) energies is constant; and the utmost man can do in the pursuit of physical truth, or in the application of physical knowledge, is to shift the constituents of the never-varying total. The Law of Conservation rigidly excludes both creation and annihilation.

"Waves may change to ripples and ripples to waves—magnitude may be substituted for number, and number for magnitude—asteroids may aggregate to suns, suns may resolve themselves into florae and faunae, and florae and faunae melt into air—the flux of power is eternally the same—it rolls in music through the ages, and all terrestrial energy—the manifestations of life, as well as the display of phenomena—are but the modulation of its rhythm."

Not to assist the professor in upsetting any argument (?) introduced in the Deist's article, as he will need none; but in a measure, to resent the inference that atheism and anarchism are in any wise synonymous, was my object in this reply; for will not even a worm turn when tread upon?

The evolution of Deism is but a shadowy symbol of the cotemporaneous evolution of intellectual force and mental penetration, in which the shadow grows weaker as the reason grows stronger. Creatures governed either by instinct alone, or such prehistoric types of life as are endowed with impotent functions of reason; looked not to the causes of extraordinary phenomena; but later, as the intellect developed and reason expanded, the causes of such events began to attract attention; and the primitive deductions were naturally in favor of a great being organically factored and functioned, like some huge beast, slimy reptile, or monster biped; and gradually evolving from such to those more congenial to the more advanced reason, the old and out-reasoned being thrown aside, until the higher reasoners of to-day, who include an endowment of true courage sufficient to face the lethargic masses, representing a decaying idolatry, have torn from its pedestal the last type of paganism, fetishism and other relics of a debased, a non-intellectual and a barbarous past. PREFERENCES AND TREASURES.

I'd rather drink cold water from the brook
Than quaff excitement from a golden chalice;
I'd rather sleep on straw in the shepherd's hut
Than lie awake and restless in a palace.

I'd rather earn dry bread in lusty health,
And eat it with a sense of wholesome pleasure,
Than feed without the zest of appetite
Off gorgeous plate mid unavailing treasure.

I'd rather have one true, unfailing friend
Than fifty parasites to crave my bounty,
And one poor lass who loved me for myself
Than one without a heart who owned a county.

Nature is kind if our desires are pure,
And strews rich blessings everywhere around us;
While Fortune, if we pant in her pursuit,
Too often grants her favors to confound us.

Fresh air and sunshine, flowers and health and love,
These are endowments if we learn to prize them;
The wise man's treasure, better worth than gold,
And none but fools and wicked men despise them.

RENDING THE VAIL

A Most Remarkable Book Concerning the Existence of Man, and All Things, and All Being

It Was Written by Materialized Forms at the House of J. H. Pratt, Spring Hill, Kansas, William W. Aber Being the Medium.

"Rending the Vail" is pronounced by Col. R. T. Van Horn, of Kansas City, Mo., as a most remarkable work. That Col. Van Horn is fully competent to judge, we will say that he has been a member of congress for four sessions, an editor of a leading daily, and a profound thinker along scientific lines. He says:

"The principal contributors to the book are four in number: Dr. W. H. Reed, who is called the chemical control of the medium; William Denton, Thomas Paine and Michael Faraday. There are numerous others giving a few incidental and mostly personal messages or dissertations on scientific, philosophic, religious, theologic and occult topics—from world-building, the origin of life, or religions, of scientific discovery, and the laws of cosmos or nature—in fact the entire field of human thought. The limitation seemed to be only that of the spectators to ask questions.

"In addition to this mass of messages, there are in the book about sixty illustrations—44 of them portraits. These were drawn by a form standing out in the room at a desk, the form or personality to be sketched at the doorway of the cabinet and the finished picture handed to one of the circle and filed away by the secretary.

"What will attract the attention of even the non-Spiritualist reader is that the topics treated by Prof. Denton, Thomas Paine and Prof. Faraday, are in kind, in thought and style with those to which their active lives in this world were devoted—in literary character as different here as in their works extant on our book-shelves.

"The Spiritualist press and its contributors are just now discussing a number of questions as to the nature of spirit, of spirit return; the want of agreement between those returning as to conditions in their present world; the limitations—that the organism of the medium imposes upon communication, and various kindred questions. All these are treated, some of them very fully, but all rationally understandable. Also phenomena, inspiration and such, to many, knotty subjects, are freely and fully discussed.

"The work is not written by the medium nor by any one connected with the society or circle. All was delivered by personalities distinct from either, written down by the secretary as spoken, or if in writing, filed away. At the next meeting the minutes in full were read, corrected, or criticised by those present and by the authors, and when approved by both laid away for the book.

"The work is unique in the history of spirit communication. Swedenborg, Andrew Jackson Davis, and Maria King wrote under inspiration. Newbrough wrote Oahspe automatically by typewriter. "Rending the Vail" was written and spoken by full-form personalities and is printed as given. One remarkable thing about the writing may not be amiss here. As high as 1,200 words a minute were written by actual timing by the watch.

"It is but just to the secretary to say that his work has been admirably done—not only faithfully and efficiently, but with excellent taste. There are no dogmatic parentheses, no interpolations or ipse dixits of the scribe. He simply states that "a form purporting to be" So-and-So, "appeared and delivered the following"—stating whether it was oral or in writing.

"In reading the book, and I have read it all, this modest, self-retiring, literal rendering of these extraordinary happenings by the secretary has been a source of constant admiration. It adds character to the book and inspires constant confidence in the integrity that from the first page to the last enhances the respect and interest of the reader."

This remarkable book, "Rending the Vail," is for sale at the office of The Progressive Thinker. Price, $2. It is a large volume of 500 pages.

BEYOND THE VAIL

A Sequel to "Rending the Vail."

The two volumes together as a record of practically obtained facts demonstrating the claims of Modern Spiritualism as to post mortal survival, are unique and overwhelming.

Every communication is from a full materialized spirit form, in good light, and either spoken audibly or written in full view by the form. There is not an automatic or trance message in the book.

It is illustrated by several engravings, the originals of which were drawn in the presence of the circle by a full form materialized spirit artist.

BEYOND THE VAIL is, as a rule, the experiences of spirits in both worlds—their own account of their lives on earth and their progress after death to their present condition of freedom from earth conditions. The narratives are intensely interesting, instructive and often highly dramatic.

Coincident with these are the profoundly philosophical comments of the controlling spirits of the seances. Prof. William Denton, Thomas Paine, Dr. W. H. Reed and others—covering, law, medicine, jurisprudence, theology and metaphysics. There are no books in existence of like character or of higher authority. Price, by mail, $1.75.

THE BEAUTIFUL SOUVENIR VOLUME,

By A. LEAH UNDERHILL,
(Of the Fox Family.)

The Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism.

Thirty-three chapters, 477 pages, superbly printed, and bound in colors and gold, 15 illustrations, 5 steel engraved portraits of the celebrated Fox Family, a full page engraving of the old house at Hydesville, which to this day, by the act of its wealthy and respected owner, Artemas Hyde, Esq., bears the inscription, "Here Spiritualism Originated in 1848."

A complete history of the initiation of the movement known as Modern Spiritualism, from the epochal period which dates from March 31, 1848. Since that day, starting from a small country village in western New York, Spiritualism has made its way against tremendous obstacles around the civilized globe.

Only a limited number of copies of this rare book, now out of print, are to be had, and these can be obtained only at this office. Those who remit at once will receive a copy, post paid, at the GREATLY REDUCED PRICE OF $1.

Note.—By failure in 1885 to complete contract with the author, a large portion of the edition was left unbound, and so remained for a number of years, when they were rescued and bound at additional cost, hence this valuable contribution to the cause of Spiritualism was not properly presented to the Spiritualistic public, and a host of investigators have not had the opportunity of securing a copy until the present time. Do not fail to send for a copy at once. J. R. FRANCIS,

LIFE BEYOND DEATH

Being a Review of

The World's Beliefs on the Subject, a Consideration of Present Conditions of Thought and Feeling,

Leading to the Question as o Whether It Can Be Demonstrated as a Fact.—To Which Is Added an Appendix Containing Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

BY MINOT J. SAVAGE, D. D.

8vo, Cloth, 342 Pages.

After a review of the beliefs held in the past concerning life beyond death, Dr. Savage takes up the present conditions of belief and considers the agnostic reaction from the extreme "other-worldliness" which it replaced, which was in turn followed by the Spiritualistic reaction against agnosticism. He points out the doubts concerning the doctrine of immortality held by the churches and the weakness of the traditional creeds and the loosening of their hold upon the people. He then considers the probabilities of a future life, probabilities which, as he admits, fall short of demonstration. The volume includes a consideration of the work of the Society for Psychical Research and also an appendix giving some of the author's own personal experiences in this line. Dr. Savage holds, as a provisional hypothesis, that continued existence is demonstrated, and that there have been at least some well authenticated communications from persons in the other life. The chief contents of the volume are as follows:

Primitive Ideas—Ethnic Beliefs—The Old Testament and Immortality—Paul's Doctrine of Death and the Other Life—Jesus and Immortality—The Other World and the Middle Ages—Protestant Belief Concerning Death and the Life Beyond—The Agnostic Reaction—The Spiritualistic Reaction—The World's Condition and Needs as to Belief in Immortality—Probabilities Which Fall Short of Demonstration—The Society for Psychical Research and the Immortal Life—Possible Conditions of Another Life—Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

DR. G. E. WATKINS,

The Noted Chronist,

Will on October 15, open his new Boston office, at 1087 Boylston street, where he will be pleased to meet all who may call between the hours of 10 a. m. and 2 p. m. The wonderful work in healing the sick that Dr. Watkins is accomplishing is indeed most astounding; his patients live to testify to his wonderful powers as a healer. For the last year his work has been most wonderful. He says himself that his cures this year have been more than ever before in numbers, as he confined himself to only 30 new patients a month. Dr. Watkins attends personally to each case, and therefore he can do better work than if he had a great many assistants; no staff of visible helpers are in his office to annoy and suggest this and that. He knows what is the trouble with each patient, and knows the right specific to give. He prepares and puts up all of his medicine, and has no help in his medical treatments that is visible help. Write him to-day, and by return mail you will receive the diagnose. No charge made for diagnosing your case. Send age, sex and lending sympton. C. E. BATH, M'gr.

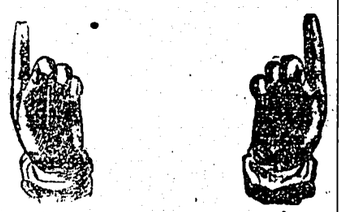
? ARE YOU SICK ?

—IF SO—

Does Your Doctor Understand Your Case?

Are You Getting Better?

If you are not getting better write today to Dr. G. E. WATKINS, Boston, Mass., and write him just your condition financially, and he will make his price for treatment within your reach. He is treating a great many cases free; others he charges a light fee.



He makes no charge whatever for Diagnosis.

If You Are Sick

Why not write him today, and no matter who has failed to help you, to consult him COSTS NOTHING.

Try DR. WATKINS.

Let him diagnose your case, and then it will help you to decide who knows best what is the matter with you. Send all letters to 1087 Boylston St., Boston, Mass.

CRITICAL.

Spiritualism in the State of Kansas.

How to organize Spiritualists, is a question that is still unsettled. Here in Kansas we have certainly made very little progress towards building up local societies, and our State organization is practically at a stand-still. But in spite of this condition Spiritualism is growing throughout the State, and especially here in Topeka. Our local mediums are doing a great work. They are converting people to Spiritualism every day, leading them into the light of its glorious truths, and giving them the knowledge and consolation for which they are hungering.

Thus Spiritualism is growing, but not as fast as it would if we were thoroughly and properly organized. But no organization at all is better than one which, instead of facilitating the presentation of the phenomena, throws obstacles in its way. This leads me to discuss briefly two articles which recently appeared in The Progressive Thinker, one by D. W. Hull, of Norton, Kan., and the other by Laura B. Payne, of Topeka. These writers, like myself, hold official positions in the State organization, Mr. Hull being the president.

In the first part of his article, Bro. Hull tells how disappointed he was recently, upon going into a Kansas town in which some mediums had awakened an interest in Spiritualism, to find people there who were holding circles and sitting for the development of mediumship, but who were unwilling to listen to lectures. Further on he uses the following language: "The first thing that is needed is lectures explaining the philosophy, and then the next thing is not to have a public medium, but persuade them to hold family circles where it will be known that everything is honest."

I am sorry that Bro. Hull cannot have his own way about it, but how is he going to manage to persuade people if they will not come to hear him? And why should he feel disappointed if some medium has outdone him as a persuader and caused people to do that which he wants them to do, viz.: hold family circles? Does he fear the philosophy of Spiritualism will suffer because it comes first-handed to the investigator? Where did Bro. Hull get his philosophy? Did he not deduce it from the phenomena? He certainly did, and could not other people do likewise? Does Bro. Hull wish to restore the age of priestcraft and catechism and limit or take away the right of people to investigate spiritual matters for themselves?

In these matters, as in all others, the people want the best evidence obtainable, and that comes from mediums and not from the lecturers. As I look at it, the first thing needed is not "lectures explaining the philosophy," but phenomena to prove that there are spirits. Without spirits there is no spiritual philosophy. Without mediums we would not know that spirits exist. The phenomena precede the philosophy. Bro. Hull wants to argue his case before the facts are presented to the jury.

Bro. Hull also makes the following remarkable statement: "It is thus seen public mediumship stands in the way of Spiritualism here in Kansas." I take it that a public medium is one who gives readings for pay. He deals with the public generally—with the cold, skeptical world. All the best mediums in time either become public mediums or give up their mediumship. At least that has been my observation. There seems to be no middle course that they can pursue. Their mediumship, being valuable, attracts a large number of investigators who impose upon them and prevent them from doing anything else; therefore, they must either charge for their services, as other laborers do, or quit the business altogether. The best mediums, then, according to Bro. Hull, "stand in the way of Spiritualism in Kansas." I do not believe it.

Mrs. Payne, writing on fraud mediumship, conveys the idea that the mediums of this city are in league with each other, and that when one is accused of practicing fraud, no matter what motive may prompt the accusation or whether it has any foundation or not, the rest rally around her and defend her. I feel it necessary to protest against this general defamation of our mediums, some of whom have lived here for a score of years, whose history is known to all our people, whose characters have never before been assailed, and whose work speaks for itself.

I believe it may be laid down as a general rule that mediums permanently located in a small place do not practice fraud. The transient population is too small to furnish them with dupes, and the residents soon find them out and, by withdrawing their patronage, prevent them from thriving.

During the last twenty-five years I have come in contact with many mediums, some of them celebrated, and I speak advisedly when I say that the mediums of Topeka compare favorably with those that can be found anywhere. Each is doing his work in his own way. Some are public mediums; but much important work is being done by private ones who hold circles or give readings. There never was a greater interest in Spiritualism here than there is now. The cause is growing, but our local and State organizations are not, and they never will grow as long as their public representatives belittle mediumship, depreciate the phenomena, and poison the public mind, not against fraud, but against mediums generally.

Topeka, Kan. W. B. WAGNER.

LIGHT, LONDON, ENGLAND.

The Psychic Journal (Sydney) discourses discriminatingly of what it describes as the supposed "decadence of Spiritualism as a cult." It declines to commit itself to an opinion on the subject, inasmuch as "Spiritualism and Freemasonry stand in a somewhat similar position to each other in that they are both found to exist and flourish in places and persons quite unsuspected by the world at large"; but it agrees with the Harbinger of Light" that if there is decadence, "crudity in mediumship and mercenary motives lie at the root of the trouble."

Then comes the outpouring of its own vials of wrath upon its home offenders:

"A public seance in Sydney is (with a few honorable exceptions) either a screaming farce or an impudent fraud, and bears no more relationship to true Spiritualism than does a Siberian winter to an Australian summer. To say that Spiritualism is to rise or fall upon the evidence provided by these farcical exhibitions by incompetent (often bogus) mediums is to set at naught the mass of evidence and proofs that bear witness to the fact of spirit return to those in the flesh, and, further, of the continuity of life in its eternal progression from the lower to the higher, from the simple to the complex, and from the finite to the infinite, while still retaining the individual consciousness.

"The needs of Spiritualists are, more unity of purpose and of action and a rigorous determination to discourage in every possible way the immature, and therefore unsatisfactory, public exposition of both the phenomena and philosophy of so grand and infinite a teaching as that revealed to the world in ancient and Modern Spiritualism."

This is not exhilarating reading, but it is useful as showing that Spiritualists are as eager as any to stop charlatans, restrain crudity, and pillory fraud.

PRAYER.

Prayer is the flight of an upward thought—
Aspiration noble and pure;
An effort to do with all of our might
What we know to be most worthy and right,
And patiently trials endure.

Striving for wisdom, for truth and for peace,
And a virtuous life while here,
Doing those deeds which never will cease
To bring a reward, with "fourfold" increase,
Of riches we hold the most dear.

Prayer made in earnest, deep in the heart,
With never an audience nigh,
Surely ascends to the angels above,
With happy response in showers of love,
From their glorious homes on high!

JULIA H. JOHNSON.

A Nut for Charles Dawabrn to Crack.

K. Gumpertz describes the case of a 10-year-old girl who, after an early childhood of great seriousness and helpfulness in household matters, began to keep the eyes open while sleeping, and a little later began to change personalities with an aunt deceased eight years previously, and of whom she had very little actual knowledge. Normally, the child is quiet, self-possessed, and well-behaved, but in the transposed state shows great restlessness and is abusive and violent. In the natural condition she has no memory of what has occurred during the hypnoid time, and is always fatigued and somnolent on awaking from it. No unusual knowledge or attributes are manifested while in the abnormal state, but simply all inhibition seems to be removed from the evil traits that are usually kept in check.—Oakland (Cal.) Times, December 19, 1901.

The plain, old-fashioned Spiritualist would say that the child is obsessed or controlled by the spirit of the aunt. In published writings, Charles Dawbarn contends that many similar cases to this one can be accounted for in another way. I am curious to know how that able thinker would explain the above. R. A. Good News

FOR THE AFFLICTED.

Dr. Peebles, with His Able Staff of Assistants, Has Originated a System of

PSYCHIC, HYGIENIC, AND MEDICAL

DR. J. M. PEEBLES.

Treatment that is Curing Thousands Who Have Been Pronounced Incurable.

This wonderful system of treatment has actually revolutionized the healing of disease that it can almost be said there are no hopeless or incurable cases. Geo. H. Weeks, of Cleveland, Ohio, sends heartfelt thanks for restoration to health after suffering from nervous prostration and insomnia for years; he says he now enjoys excellent health and restful sleep every night. Mrs. J. A. Rust, of Ithaca, Minn., cured of uric acid poisoning in two months' treatment, writes: "I am better than in years and each day brings new strength and health. I will refer all ailing ones to you." Mary A. Earl, of Crawford, Mich., suffering from pronounced female difficulties and kidney disease, says: "I took your treatment three months, and it has been a success in my case. I am indeed grateful to you for my recovery." C. E. Davis, Woodman, N. H., who suffered all the miseries of a dyspeptic, writes that as a result of Dr. Peebles' treatment he has not missed a meal since last March.

If you are in poor health, no matter how long you have suffered or what your complaint is, just write the Doctors a plain letter about your condition and they will confidentially consider the same and send you FREE OF CHARGE a full diagnosis of your case, together with valuable Literature, explaining fully this grand science and their wonderful methods of treatment which gives hope to all the afflicted and special advice in your case, which in itself would be worth more to you than countless sums of money, for Health is above all price. If you are suffering, do not delay a moment, but write at once and receive, ABSOLUTELY FREE, their opinion on your case and the literature to acquaint you fully with their method of treatment.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

Passed to spirit life, Nov. 28, 1901, from her home at Sturgis, Mich., Clara B. Gardner, aged 83. She leaves one son, two daughters and two sisters. She had been a Spiritualist for forty years.

Passed to spirit life, Dec. 30, 1001, in Bath, N. Y., Andrew J. Van Duzee, aged 73 years. He yearned for spiritual glory all through his long physical illness. The philosophy of Spiritualism brought light and cheer to him in his sufferings, and he passed away from this earth radiant in smiles. He leaves surviving him Mrs. Carrie C. Van Duzee, the well known trance lecturer. Banner of Light and Light of Truth please copy. AL SULLIVAN.

Carroll Bronneberg passed away December 24. The funeral services were conducted by Willard J. Hull, at the residence of the deceased, Anderson, Ind. Mr. Bronnenberg was in the 75th year of his age, and well known throughout central Indiana as one of the founders of Chesterfield camp. He was an earnest and consistent Spiritualist, and was a liberal contributor to its support. A wife and two daughters survive him. FLORA HARDIN.

Passed to the higher life, at Homer, Minn., Prof. J. W. Hurlbut, at the age of 80 years. Prof. Hurlbut was a Spiritualist for years, and met the change with a full understanding of its conditions. A wife and daughter are left to mourn the absence of the familiar form, while they rejoice in the freedom and presence of the arisen husband and father. Services in the Methodist church of Homer, conducted by the writer. WILL J. ERWOOD.

Passed to spirit life, December 20, 1901, Mrs. Eva Baird, wife of Mr. W. H. Baird, 106 Elbron avenue, Cleveland, O. Mrs. Baird was a true Spiritualist, and leaves many friends who miss her sweet words of love and comfort. C. H. Figuers officiated. COR.

Passed to spirit life, December 20, 1901, in Prophet's Town, Ill., Sarah A. Wallingford, aged 79 years, wife of Benj. Wallingford. On a visit East, the past summer a year ago, through her son, she investigated Spiritualism and became a firm believer in the beautiful truth, that there is no death, only a birth to a higher life. The aged mother leaves a large family; there are 58 grandchildren and 12 great-grandchildren, with a host of friends. She was a devoted mother, always looking after the poor and afflicted with a kind word of comfort to all.

Esoteric Lessons.

An Argument Against Physical Causation.

The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely physical health upon a purely psychical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom, insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief in which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

In her trances she lives the dual existence of an Indian princess and of an inhabitant of the planet Mars. Professor Flournoy and his fellow scientists have for more than five years experimented with these astounding physical phenomena."

This is a work of thrilling interest. It has excited great attention in this country and in Europe. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

INVISIBLE HELPERS

A Very Excellent and Comprehensive Work.

One from the Theosophical Standpoint.

This work, "Invisible Helpers," written by C. W. Leadbeater, the remarkable English psychic (whose lectures have graced the columns of The Progressive Thinker), is certainly very interesting and suggestive throughout. It treats of the "Universal Belief in the Invisible Helpers," the "Angel Story," "Work Among the Dead," "What Lies Beyond." The work is neatly bound in cloth, and the price is 55 cents.

The Bridge Between Two Worlds.
BY ABBY A. JUDSON.

With portrait of the author. Deeply spiritual and instructive. An excellent work. Price, cloth, $1.00; paper, 75 cents. For sale at this office.

VISIONS AND REVELATIONS.

Moses Hull Has Had Other Visitants From the Other Side of Life.

I believe that there is something more of man than flesh and blood, animated by breath; and that if we did not confine our living and our thinking so closely to material things we might often ascend into the more occult phases of life. That inspired heathen, Elihu, was right when he said, "For God speaketh once, yea twice, yet man perceiveth it not. In a dream, in a vision of the night, when deep sleep falleth upon men, in the slumberings upon the bed; then he openeth the ears of men and sealeth their instruction, that he may withdraw man from his purpose and hide pride from man."—Job xxxiii:14-17.

Yes, these "visions of the night," often come to "withdraw man from his purpose." Sometimes they come to strengthen man in his purpose. In any case it is a glorious thought that we are not orphans in this cold, dark, and sometimes seemingly heartless world—that we are not all of us entirely deaf and blind to all things spiritual.

In II. Cor. xii:1, Paul said, "It is not expedient for me doubtless to glory. I will come to visions and revelations of the Lord." While visions and revelations may not be as universal as humanity, I doubt whether there is a human being on earth, who could not, under proper conditions, develop more or less of that power. It is a power which belongs alike to all ages and nations; and it has always been regarded as a calamity when this power has been withdrawn.

When the Hebrews, under their judges, lapsed into speculation, sensuality and debauchery, this power for a time entirely departed from them, and they literally realized the truth of what their King Solomon afterwards said, when he told the people that "where there is no vision the people perish." Prov. xxix:18.

When a vision came to Samuel, as a small child, the recorder of that fact said: "And the word of the Lord was precious in those days, there was no open vision." I, Sam. iii:1. The last verse of the same chapter says: "The Lord revealed himself in Shiloh to Samuel by the word of the Lord." That term, "word of the Lord," in the Bible always refers to visions and revelations made directly to mediums and seers.

I said it has always been regarded as a calamity when people have been deprived of these visits from those who dwell in the celestial life.

The prophet Amos saw the wickedness of Israel, and described it, and foretold the result. Among the charges brought against Israel, for which they were to be deprived of visions and revelations, were the following: They sold the righteous for silver, and the poor for a pair of shoes. Fathers and sons committed the same sins and with the same persons. They were profane alike, and visited the same maid and for the same evil purpose. They were accused of treading upon the poor; of laziness and indolence; of swallowing up the needy; of using different scales when they bought and when they sold; of buying the poor for silver and the needy for a pair of shoes. The result of all this was, there was to be a great famine. The prophet states the matter as follows: "Behold the days ——saith the Lord God, that I will send a famine in the land, not a famine of bread, nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the words of the Lord; and they shall wander from sea to sea, and from the north even to the east, they shall run to and fro to seek the word of the Lord, and shall not find it." Amos viii:12,12.

In this famine they were not to hunt for Bibles, but for "the word of the Lord." That is, for visions and revelations from the other world.

In what is commonly called the Babylonish captivity—a captivity brought on by the sins above described, a psalm was written describing the desolation of the land of Israel and their city. In that psalm the writer says: "We see not our signs; there is no more any prophet; neither is there among us any that knoweth how long." Psa. lxxiv:9.

After the Jews went into captivity as Jeremiah had predicted, the prophet laments as follows: "Her gates are sunk into the ground; he hath destroyed and broken her bars; her king and her princes are among the gentiles; the law is no more; her prophets also find no vision from the Lord." Lam: ii:9.

These ideas and this argument might be extended to many columns, and all of them backed by scripture quotations, but it was not for that purpose that I took my pen.

Last winter I tried to obey that scripture which said, "write the vision and make it plain upon tables, that he may run and readeth." Since that time I have been visited several times by these intelligences. Much that they have said was for me only; and hence will perhaps never be written out. At other times they have given me things which, it will at least do no harm for the world to know. I think when we all unfold to that condition where we can be our own prophets—where we can see and hear for ourselves, nothing but private messages will be given. Then they shall not every man teach his neighbor saying, "know the Lord," for all will know from the least to the greatest, as predicted by Jeremiah. See Jeremiah xxxi:31-34. When that time comes—and we can bring it about—then no one will need to go on a mission or write a message for another. When one can get what is for him directly from wise influences, then no one will need to take their messages second-handed.

Be that as it may, I know it is a blessed condition to occasionally rise into that altitude where friends can come "in the visions of the night," and prove to us that we can be led by a wiser power; and that even now spirits and mortals are co-operating to bring heaven and earth nearer together, even as John saw the holy city, the new Jerusalem, come down out of heaven, so that the tabernacle of God should be with men.

On the night of September 22, I was sleeping in one of the spacious rooms of what is now the Morris Pratt Institute Building. I had agreed to be one of the trustees, and the president of the institute, and had assisted in the arrangement for the transfer of the property. About midnight I was awakened by a presence in my room; I at first wondered who would venture in without so much as rapping at the door. In a moment I was made to see that it was not one in the mortal form.

The first word spoken was, "I have come to talk to you about the step you are about to take. Have you looked at it in every light?" I confessed that probably I had not. Then the intelligence went on to say, "Morris Pratt has not been understood; he is a grand old man; he does this because of his love for the cause, and because of his confidence in your integrity and ability. Your spirit friends wish to caution you. You have now lived two-thirds of a century; you have all your life been an active man; you should now, instead of loading yourself down with that which must shorten your earthly existence, begin to seek rest.

"The little church you serve appreciates and loves you; you can find more work in and around Buffalo than you can do. In taking this additional burden there is great danger of your overloading and breaking yourself down."

This intelligence went on with this kind of talk for fully thirty minutes, and thoroughly converted me. I fully made up my mind to have nothing to do with the college; and was so impatient for daylight to come, so that I could make my decision known that I could not lie in bed. I arose and walked the floor for nearly an hour.

At last I lay down and almost immediately went to sleep, and slept, perhaps an hour, when I was suddenly awakened again by an influence, which said: "And so you are going to give up the college are you?" I answered, that I was; that I felt compelled to do so; it was entirely too great an undertaking for one of my age; I must save myself for other important work.

This visitant then replied, "You have been praying for a college for many years. Nearly two score of years since you began your earnest efforts in this direction. Now the signs are portentous; a building and teachers are at your service; your prayers are answered; the blessings come for which you have so long and continuously asked; the thing for which you have said many times you would willingly give your life, and you refuse to take it. Please do not pray any more. If you do not mean business, steer clear of all aspirations in that direction."

I tried in vain to reply. I said, "My life is in danger." I had hardly finished the sentence when I was answered, "'He that would save his life shall lose it.' What is the life worth which has been saved by shirking your duty?" Other equally as pointed sayings were quoted to me, until I really became ashamed of my position.

The influence then said, "Your prayer was really heard years ago, and would have been answered had you been prepared for the answer. Even this college building was ready for you ten years ago, but neither you nor the cause had ripened sufficiently for it. We brought it to you at the earliest possible moment. Accept it—thankfully accept it. You are one of the stewards divinely appointed to take and use this property for the benefit of a higher and more educated Spiritualism. If you fall or rise in the work, that will be better for the cause, and for yourself than anything else that can be done. You have prayed for this college; if those prayers are not answered now the answer will come too late; the answer must come while you are prepared to receive and act upon it."

"But," said I, "I am not prepared financially or otherwise, to take such an institution and run it."

"Then you have prayed wrong; you should have asked for ability to manage an educational institution, rather than for the institution. But how do you know that you are not prepared? Could it surprise you any more to receive help in that direction, than it has to receive this college? After all the experience you have had, can you not trust?"

This vision caused me to resolve to "walk by faith, and not by sight," and to take the college. Since then I have been working day and night. Plan after plan of raising money and running the college have passed through my mind.

On Tuesday night, November 26, I went to my bed very tired from over-work; about 2 o'clock in the morning I awoke fully sensible of a presence in my room. I first received impressions of some things she had to say, and then a strange kind of clairvoyance came to me, and I saw a lady in my room—one whom I had never seen in earth-life, and yet I was made aware in some way that it was an old worker in the cause. She seemed to be supported by a spirit band, none of whom I could really see or know.

About the first thing she informed me was, that the spirits who first took hold of Spiritualism, knew or thought but little more about what was to be the final outcome of Spiritualism than did the mortals who went into it. Many embraced it from sheer curiosity; others went into it from a desire to let their earth-friends know that they continued to live after the event called death; few realized that Spiritualism was to be a great lever to move the world; and that it was to be a factor in introducing the new dispensation.

She told me that as a spirit she had come to see me many times in the past; but at the time she used to visit me she had not thought of Spiritualism ever becoming a great co-operative movement on the part of two worlds to usher in the New Era, which was to wholly over-top all other movements.

She said she tried to be social with me; to give me a few beautiful thoughts to take the place of those I entertained up to the time I became a Spiritualist, and to teach me the music to some of her songs.

By this time I knew that the presence in my room was that of the almost forgotten heroine in our cause, Miss Achsa Sprague. She then came and sat on the side of my bed and said, "Several of us are here; we have come to give you a brief retrospect, and then a kind of prospective view of the work in which you are engaged.

"The National Association of Spiritualists may not in the past have been just what it should have been. You upon the earth-plane have made your mistakes, and we have made ours. We, on this side, are far, very far from infallible; but we had come to where we could see that there must be something more in Spiritualism than test hunting, or glowing descriptions of what is called the spirit world. Later, we began to throw upon susceptible minds the necessity of a grand co-operative Association. This resulted in an imperfect organization—an organization which still retains many of its imperfections; but which, it is hoped, will not be so overloaded with imperfections as to fall of its own weight. There is that honest sincerity on the part of both earth and spirit workers which it is hoped will bring order out of chaos. I as a messenger to you, do not fully understand how these things are coming out. Perhaps no spirit fully understands that. I partially understand my own division of the work. The building of the Pacific Railroad will partly illustrate the case. When gold was first discovered in California, that country was practically farther from the United States than it was from Japan or China.

"The task of reaching the gold regions from here seemed to be so great that the one who accomplished it was in a certain sense of the word a hero. It was a six-months' dangerous sea voyage around Cape Horn, or a dangerous and almost impossible journey through the plains and over the mountains.

"When it was first decided to build a railroad over, or rather through the mountains, no one knew just how it could be done—no one knew how many men would be killed in that work; they only knew that the road could and must be built; whether it would take five or fifty years made little difference; and at it they went. They made hundreds of mistakes, some of which cost many lives and millions of money; yet the work was done; you yourself have gone over those roads several times, and always found yourself about as much rested at the close as at the beginning of the journey.

"This is equally true of this great work; there is, perhaps, not one superintending angel who knows the minutia of all that is to be done, nor exactly how many things are to be done which they clearly foresee among the coming events. This will not in the least prevent the work being accomplished.

"You have now come to where your school is a necessity, and you will be able to get many Spiritualists to see it in that light. You will also be able to get many of the spiritually minded to see that they can make no investment that will pay them more in real wealth than to place their means in the development of the educational department of this work.

"All will not see this in this light; many spirits, as short-sighted as most mortals, will not see it; it is not necessary that they should, more than it was necessary that every dirt-shoveler, or rock-breaker who helped to build railroads over the mountains should have understood all the final results of their work. As these Irish, Italian and Chinese laborers were only interested in doing their work and getting their pay for it, so many ignorant mediums and Spiritualists have thought that about all there was of Spiritualism was the production of various phenomena, which prove the ability of spirits to return. As many who made excavations in mountains and who shoveled or wheeled dirt to fill low places in the road-bed did not know what all this was for, so many spirits and Spiritualists are in profound ignorance of their work. In each case their overseers looked farther ahead and foresaw many of the results.

"I told you that a company had been formed which had worked many years to bring all this about. Although I have been in this company from its first inception, I know little of the details of any part of the work except my own. Why should I? I know that every part of the work is in competent hands, as others know that I can take care of my part of the business. A kind of civil service reform has led the superintendents of the different divisions of this enterprise to search thoroughly for those who are the most willing and the best qualified to handle their part of the business.

"In this work you need not expect that your path will always be strewn with roses; you will find many thorns. Sometimes those upon whom you rely with the most assurance of co-operation and assistance will fail you; and that just where you the least expected. All this will serve to further develop your resources, and lead you to better appreciate the tried and true workers.

"You do not know the source of your supplies; nor do we. We know the supplies will come. An epidemic of giving is now rapidly developing among the larger hearted Spiritualists. While new avenues are hourly opening, to do philanthropic work, new workers are coming to the front with their means.

"You, individually, fall or rise in the work; that will make little difference either to the work or to yourself. When Garfield fell General Arthur was ready to take his place. McKinley fell, but Roosevelt is quite as able as he was to carry on his work. Should you step out of the ranks of mortal workers, others will take your place, and you, after having been given a luxurious rest, until even rest will seem fatiguing to you, will take your place among our workers on this side, and will from time to time be promoted as you prove yourself qualified for advancement.

"Now, my dear friend, I must leave you; the power which has enabled us to have this little season of communion is nearly exhausted. You seem more and more distant with every passing second. We both feel that; it is because the magnetism between us is so nearly exhausted. Another must now talk to you.

I said, "If you cannot talk to me, how can another?"

"Because," she answered, "another coming into your atmosphere with a different magnetism causes a chamical change which will help both you and the one who is to talk to you. Good bye. I will now go and talk to Mattie."

At that instant she was gone; but I was not alone. She had only just gone when I heard a familiar voice say, "Dress up, dress up." Those words contained a test which could be understood only by myself, and in an instant my old friend Jim G. Anderson was with me. He took up the conversation where Miss Sprague dropped it, and carried it on for about an hour. I cannot now go into the details of that talk. Suffice it to say that the talk was mostly personal. It threw great light on many of my personal experiences. It related mostly to his work and methods in raising the unjust quarantine which at one time existed against me. He gave many interesting details about Dr. H. F. Gardner, S. S. Jones and himself—he told the methods they had adopted to accomplish the work already done. In glowing terms he told his visions of future success. I may say something more of this vision at a future time.

When Mr. Anderson was through, the clock struck five, and he was gone as suddenly as he came. I immediately got up to go to Mrs. Hull's room and tell her what had happened. The moment I opened her door, she said, "Is that you, Moses? Achsa Sprague has just been here and given me a poem; she has this moment left me."

The poem she gave Mrs. Hull is in her "Spirit Echoes," page 99, and is entitled "The Lost Voice."

For all that I have here said, I may be regarded as a fanatic; be it so. It is a sweet kind of fanaticism—one which I hope will call again.

CANNOT EXPLAIN POWER—MANY LANGUAGES FLOW FROM HER PEN, THOUGH GIRL'S EDUCATION IS SAID TO BE LIMITED.

To the Editor:—As related by the Chicago News, with her bare foot on a cold register, a slender girl with big brown eyes, long brown hair falling over a brow of unusual pallor, awoke early today at the home of Dr. Rimes, 6331 Wentworth avenue, and a pearl necklace which she held in her hand and the upturned corner of a carpet, solved a problem which had agitated the household for weeks. The cold iron had broken the spell of somnambulism, and the hiding-place where the young woman had concealed her jewels was disclosed.

WORKS WHILE SLEEPING.

Thus it became known that Miss Euretta D. Metcalf, much of whose fiction has been published in Western newspapers, relies not on her own ability to weave plots and extend them in novel form, but does all her work while sleeping. She is now engaged on a serial story, "Her Other Self," of which several chapters are complete, but has no idea how soon "finis" may be written, for the reason that it is a dream plot, and when she does not dream she does not write.

WRITINGS ARE OF SCHOLARLY FINISH.

Some of this young woman's writings are of a scholarly finish, despite the fact that she is comparatively uneducated, having progressed no further than her first year in a high school in Kansas City, Kan. But in her dream writings she quotes authors of whose existence she professes to have been unaware and accurately describing scenery that is absolutely strange to her. German, French, Italian, Latin and Greek flow freely from her pen, though she knows not a word, she says, of any of these languages, save such as she might have picked up in lexicons. A case of surgery involving the transplanting of a bit of a dog's nerve into the arm of a man she described accurately, using all the terms of a technical nature that a surgeon would have employed.

Last summer while visiting in Rockford, Miss Metcalf got up in the night and, while sleeping, mounted her bicycle and rode three miles, bringing up in a ditch, the accident rousing her. "And to think of it!" she exclaimed today, "I had ridden through the city park, making myself liable to payment of a $10 fine."

CANNOT EXPLAIN THE STRANGE POWER.

"I do not know why I possess this peculiar power," said Miss Metcalf, "but it has been mine since childhood. My parents did not know at first what to make of me. They were alarmed. Things were missed about the house—my home was then in Kansas, though I was born in Elgin, Ill., and none knew where they had gone. My beads and trinkets disappeared with father's and mother's things. Then one night they were sitting by the fire after mother had put me to bed. I came downstairs and with my eyes fixed straight ahead I went to a corner of the room, took up a board of the floor and there hid my little ring. At once I went to a small table, lit a candle and began writing. It was a poem and it was my first. Since then I have written almost constantly. Some of my work has been pronounced excellent; other rubbish."

"Are you a clairvoyant?" was asked?

NOT A SPIRITUALIST.

"No, no!" exclaimed the young woman, opening wide her big eyes and holding up her hands in protest. "It is not Spiritualism. I cannot think even it is hypnotism, because when these spells began there was no one near could have suggested the things I wrote. But my mother possesses some singular occult power, and has done strange things, though she is not an educated woman."

Miss Metcalf's greatest sorrow is caused by the fact that her stories, even the short ones, are nearly all of a serious nature and all have sad endings. "I find that most publishers want stories to 'come out with much happiness,'" said she, "and for that reason mine will not do as I finish them in my sleep. So I have to change them after I wake. I rarely have to make any alterations, except for this reason, and my penmanship is always better than while I am awake."

HER LATEST STORY.

Last night, just before recovering her necklace, Miss Metcalf wrote her latest story. It tells of a sprite who has come from some far-off land of mistiness to discover whether woman is constant. He slides down a cobweb ladder and finds himself on a stenographer's desk in a physician's office. The doctor is making love to his stenographer, a beautiful young Jewess, who is about to accept him for her husband, despite religious differences, when the physician's sister brings in the girl to whom he had been engaged, but toward whom he has lately grown cold. The stenographer, promising to aid her rival to triumph, writes a letter of farewell and the sprite goes back to tell his story to the gods, and "across the blue infinite space his voice fell with musical cadence through starry aisles to distant earth 'Woman's heart is the playground of pain; woman's love a crown of angelic glory.'"

In this incident we have a comprehensive illustration of spirit power—that and nothing else. During the night, with her system in a negative condition, Miss Metcalf is easily controlled with results as above stated.

CRITIC.

Prosperity is no just scale; adversity is the only balance to weigh friends.—Plutarch.

Make life a ministry of love, and it will always be worth living.—Browning.

SELFISHNESS AND LOVE.

Who Are the "Poor in Spirit."

Such as live for this world only, would have been the answer prior to the revelations of modern Spiritualism. But with the advent of the latter a higher thought revolution was instituted, and morality or spirituality became the subject of a deeper analysis.

We do not regard surface-effects as the sum and substance of human attainment. The man of faith has been substituted by the man of knowledge. Belief has become a sentiment; in fact the fundamental principle of spiritual or soul progress. He who knows is the true reformer, for he cannot fail of reaching his aim, if consistent with that which he advocates.

But are all consistent in what they teach? Presumably so, and as far as they know law. Intention is a good foundation to start on; and adhered to honestly inspires to charity in the event of failures or acknowledged weakness.

We speak wiser than we know under the pressure of inspiration or the desire to go ahead, but often speak unwisely in our superior guiding influence or power. It is when we "cast pearls before swine."

This ancient possibility is not only effectuated on soil fallow with ignorance, but quite as frequently where prejudice rules.

It is human to reject truths emanating from those we dislike. Thus the opponents of a cause would reject the highest living truths of the same as illogical, injurious, vicious. But when advocates of one cause belittle each other's philosophy, or conjure up reasons to reject it, there is a desideratum of the principle that makes for harmony. Love has been substituted by prejudice. Such are poor in spirit. Happily but few instances of this impoverished soul-state are to be found in Spiritualism—perhaps none among the readers of this.

Of course, jealousy cannot be considered in the subject. That is but an incident in life's affairs—a phase of spiritual infancy that is sloughed off in the maturing process of the higher selfhood. It does not always indicate contraction. It is only where selfishness draws the reins, and bars out others from like privileges, that it undermines its soul progress and places itself in the category of this reading.

Jealousy thus may lead to prejudice, for selfishness is love turned down—reversed. Its impulse is naturally made to vibrate in the opposite direction. Consistently carried out, whether through false pride, the dictum of another's suggestion, or personal feeling, increases the vibration for an unloving effect, and finally blossoms as an unflavored influence that governs the individual in all his dealings with mankind. Poverty of spirit is the reaping.

Men and women who feed their minds on false ideas or notions about persons and things, and make that their standard of judgment, come under the same category. There is wholesome food for the soul as well as body. Mental dyspepsia is not without its victims; and what false conceptions does for the mind or spirit, prejudice does for the soul. But a soul-dyepeptic is more difficult to cure, for its curative, love, has been shut off at the fountain-head, and will not flow without removing the obstacles put there—that is, undoing the selfishness committed.

The higher conceptions of spirituality cannot be theirs, and whatever they advocate, must partake of their impoverished soul influence—thus minus the potency needed to create converts. Without love in the motive there is no enthusiasm aroused; and without sacrifice there can be no love. The soul burdened with care finds its way to other souls, for in its philosophy lies the keen-edged sympathy that touches the reader's or listener's heart.

The comforted do not seek spiritual teachings. The discomforted want it undiluted by glittering generalities, fair promises or unfelt word-paintings, as it emanates from the minds of those who cannot conceive of the needs of the suffering.

True spirituality can only come from the soul of the true reformer—one who practices what he preaches, whatever the issue; for only in such vibration or influence exists the nourishment that feeds the soul hungering for truth or the higher light.

THE GOD QUESTION.

How It Is Viewed by a New England Lady.

To the Editor:—As my subscription for the dear old Progressive Thinker expires with the old year of 1901, I will renew it on this New Year's day of 1902. For indeed we should feel lost, my dear companion and myself, without welcoming The Progressive Thinker in our home every Thursday evening. It would indeed seem as though an old friend had neglected to make us his weekly visit. It has become very dear to us in the last year. It is the best Spiritualist paper printed, to us. And one can learn many profitable lessons by reading its columns.

Spiritualism is very dear to me. It is my religion based on knowledge. I was very much interested in No. 631. The God question. I have been a public medium fourteen years, and have occupied many platforms in the towns and cities of old New England, and I cannot give up my belief in God and the Bible altogether. That God is love for all humanity; and as we love humanity, giving proofs by sympathy, or material aid according to our ability, so we elevate ourselves here and hereafter. That God neither here or in the next sphere forsakes the most ungrateful.

The Bible to me is the Basic Stone of Spiritualism. It promulgates God as Supreme Ruler of the universe, a God of Love Universal.

The greater majority of intelligent humanity have and are adopting its truths.

Spiritualism teaches us to be Godlike.

The Bible also teaches that our elder brother Jesus was a humanitarian; the founder of no sects; his church was the broad universe, as high as the heavens, and the canopy of heaven was its dome, ornamented by day by the grand solar system, and its walls by night frescoed by the stellar world. His pulpit the grand old mountains, the beautiful gardens, the seaside and on the waves of the grand old ocean. His teachings, universal love, universal fatherhood, and brotherhood of all humanity.

And to-day the greater majority of intelligent humanity have and are adopting its truths.

I had no thought of writing, only a line, but sometimes you cannot help yourself, and that is just my case now.

Practical Hints and Queries.

For the past fifty years we have been hearing of the beautiful things that are to happen over there in the sweet by and by. If we hope for recognition in this stage of our existence, it is time to begin working for the here and now.

At the first indication of a revival in Spiritualism, the talk is getting quite common of having a building of our own, a church or temple being usually spoken of. Having a theory differing from that, I would like to have the matter brought before those having had practical experience and getting their practical experience and get their views.

I believe that a large part of the trouble in churches to-day is in trying to pay running expenses and back debts on property that pays no income. The burden is usually more than the society can stand.

Since Spiritualists are in the habit of meeting in halls, and usually very inconvenient ones, I think the proper thing to do would be to buy a lot and pay for it, then borrow money if necessary and build business buildings whenever the size of the town would justify it, using one floor for hall and rooms suitable for society needs, renting the remainder of the building and applying the income as well as all money raised by the society, above expenses, to paying off the debt. As soon as that was accomplished, the income could be applied to society work, which would enable them to employ the best talent to be had. The expense would then be so light that the poorest member would not feel it a burden. In fifty years there could be enough income-paying property in the hands of Spiritualists to make them one of the most powerful religious bodies in the United States.

Will those who have had practical experience in a society of Spiritualists that has built a church or other building give us the benefit of their experience through The Progressive Thinker or privately. ALEX CAIRD, M. D.

BIBLE SPIRITUALISM---MOSES HULL ANSWERS DR. SWERINGEN'S OPEN LETTER

H. V. Sweringen, M. D.—Dear Brother:—Your Open Letter, in The Progressive Thinker of November 14, came out at just the wrong time. I was at that time so busy arranging matters connected with our new college that I should not even have known the letter was written had not friends called my attention to it. Even then I happened to be so overloaded with work that I could not find opportunity to write.

If not too late I will now offer a few thoughts suggested by your letter. I think you, in your correspondence with various papers, and with numerous ministers, are doing much to set the world right on the great subject of Spiritualism. I hope the so-called orthodox ministers will continue to keep you busy. I think, however, you will find the most of them, like Rev. Henry Irving Rasmus, "rather poor correspondents." It is much easier to attack Spiritualism from the pulpit or through the press than it is to maintain a straightforward correspondence with an intelligent and cultivated Spiritualist.

You say, your correspondent said:

"I do not believe you can produce a single instance in the Bible where a once embodied spirit came back and spoke to men. You may cite the woman of Endor episode as a case, but there is grave doubt in my mind that this event is anything but a record of what 'seemed' to have occurred, rather than an actual occurrence."

This poor fellow is a fair sample of that portion of the clergy which is determined, at all hazards, to oppose Spiritualism. But, my dear brother, you must not be too hard on this man, and others of his ilk. Something must be said, and as there is no possibility of making a sensible argument against Spiritualism, they must do the next best thing.

Before I talk about the case of Samuel, Saul and the Woman of Endor, I must reply briefly to that other remark, "I do not believe you can produce a single instance in the Bible where a once embodied spirit came back and spoke to man."

That makes one wonder if this reverend gentlemen ever read Mark ix:4, which says: "And there appeared to them Elias, with Moses; and they were talking with Jesus."

How a man can pretend to believe the Bible and at the same time so flatly contradict such a plain declaration as the one just quoted I cannot understand.

Even Jesus manifested as a spirit separated from his earthly body. After his death, he appeared to Saul of Tarsus, afterwards called Paul, in the ninth chapter of Acts. Paul was at this time in a company of men, yet he alone saw Jesus. Verse 7 says, "And the men which journeyed with him stood speechless hearing a voice, but seeing no man." Paul being a clairvoyant saw Jesus, while others who were not blessed with that power did not see him, as they would had he been in a physical body.

The Greek of Acts xvi:7 positively represents Jesus as a departed spirit—a separate independent entity. Our version of the matter says: "After they were come to Mysia, they essayed to go into Bithynia, but the spirit suffered them not."

Now, if you will turn to your Greek Testament, you will see that the translators, for reasons best known to themselves, in translating this text, left two words out; those are, pneuma Iesou—Spirit Jesus.

That I am correct in this, no scholar, Catholic or Protestant, will deny. The Revised Version renders this, as it should, "The Spirit of Jesus suffered them not."

The Emphatic Diaglott New Testament, which Zion's Watchman calls "the best translation extant," renders this text, "And the spirit of Jesus did not permit them."

Thus, Moses, Elias and Jesus have returned as departed spirits, and communicated.

The writing which came from Elijah the prophet, to King Jehoram, is equally as positive as the two above mentioned cases. This case will be found in II. Kings, xxi:12.

I know a late editor in fixing up his Bible to fit his theories has inserted in the margin of this text: "Which was written before his death." But that is not true. As a warrant for this wild assertion this interpretor refers to II. Kings ii:1. But that text does not give the slightest information on the subject. Turn and read it.

I now come to what this man calls "The Woman of Endor episode." There is "grave doubt" in his mind about this being an actual fact. Do you not see, my dear brother, that this is the only position this minister could take? When he acknowledges that the statement is true, as written, he is compelled to acknowledge Spiritualism, for the text says, "The woman saw Samuel." I. Sam. xxviii:12. "And Saul perceived that it was Samuel." Verse 14. "And Samuel said, Why hast thou disquieted me to bring me up?" Verse 15. "Then said Samuel, Wherefore, then, dost thou ask of me, seeing the Lord is departed from thee, and become thine enemy?" Verse 16. "And the Lord hath done to him as he spake by me." Verse 17. [See chapter xv:28] "To-morrow shalt thou and thy sons be with me." Verse 19. Finally Saul "was sore afraid because of the words of Samuel." Verse 20.

How is it possible for one to acknowledge these sentences to be true and yet reject Spiritualism? The fact is, when Spiritualism is denied there can be no possible explanation of this case, without rejecting the Bible, or at least this part of it.

The one who acknowledges these statements to be true, acknowledges Spiritualism; on the other hand the one who denies them jumps, as it were, out of the frying-pan into the fire by denying the Bible. These statements cannot be denied without virtually saying they are absolutely false. What minister will dare to say that, and then ask his congregation to receive anything merely on the testimony of that book.

The logic of this case is this: In one case the Bible falsifies; or, in the other case Spiritualism is true. In either case the argument against Spiritualism is surrendered.

The only thing left for the minister to do is to express his "grave doubts." In these "grave doubts," he has landed nowhere, and leaves himself room to dodge in either direction. Certainly orthodoxy has invented no finer samples of dodging than this.

It happens that the Catholics have a Bible with fourteen more books than are contained in ours. While our Bible was literally taken out of the Catholic Bible, the Westminster Assembly rejected fourteen of the books which had been placed in the Catholic canon, at the Council of Trent, one hundred years before.

For our purpose that makes not the least difference; a text could not have been placed in what we, Protestants call the Apocrypha, and been with that book, translated into Greek about three hundred years before Christ, and remained in the scriptures, as used by Jesus and the Apostles, unless it had existed at that early day.

In the forty-sixth chapter of the book called Ecclesiasticus, is a kind of biography of early Old Testament heroes; among them Samuel comes in for his share of praise. The writer after giving a running history of Samuel's life, says: "And, after death he—Samuel—prophesied and showed his—Saul's—end, and lifted up his voice from the earth in prophecy to blot out the wickedness of the people." Verse 46.

This fixes this matter as far as ancient writing can fix it. If Samuel was not there, and did not speak to Saul, this Jewish writer was mistaken; the woman was mistaken; Saul was mistaken; the writer of this part of the Bible, inspired as he was, was mistaken. He, without note or comment, says, "Samuel said unto Saul," etc.

In conclusion, Doctor, let me advise you, and all other readers of this to consult Josephus on this subject. You know that Josephus was not only a Jewish historian, who was born in A. D. 37 or 38, but he was a Jewish High Priest, and spoke with authority on religious questions. He was, perhaps the greatest student that ever existed in the Hebrew nation; in so much that their learned men, when he was only sixteen years old, consulted him on all the great questions of the day.

He takes the ground most emphatically that this lady was not a witch; but that she was a necromancer. By that term he means just what the Greek term means, out of which comes the word necromancy. That is, one who consults the dead.

The account will be found in chapter 14 of Book VI. I will abridge as much as I can and present the salient points.

This woman has been terribly slandered and abused, as have modern mediums, by the clergy. On this case Josephus says, at the place indicated above:

"He bid his servants to inquire out for him some woman that was a necromancer, and called up the spirits of the dead, that so he might know whether this affair would succeed to his mind; for this sort of necromantic women that bring up the souls of the dead, do by them foretell future events to such as desire them. As soon as he had induced her by this oath, to fear no harm, he bid her bring up to him the soul of Samuel. She, not knowing who Samuel was, called him out of hades. When he appeared, and the woman saw one that was venerable, and of a divine form, she was in disorder; and being astonished at the sight, she said, 'Art thou King Saul?' For Samuel had informed her who he was. When he had owned that to be true, and had asked her whence her disorder arose, she said that she saw a certain person ascend who, in his form was like to a god...

"But Samuel seeing that the end of Saul's life was come, said, 'It is vain for thee to desire to learn of me anything further, when God hath forsaken thee; however, hear what I say, that David is to be king, and to finish this war with good success; and thou art to lose thy dominion and thy life, because thou didst not obey God in the war with the Amalekites, and hast not kept His commandments, as I foretold thee while he was alive. Know therefore that the people shall be made subject to their enemies, and thou, with thy sons shall fall in the battle of to-morrow, and thou shalt be with me" [in hades].

Josephus continues: "Now it is but just to recommend this woman because when the king had forbidden her to use that art whence her circumstances were bettered and improved, and when she had never seen the king before she did not remember to his disadvantage that he had condemned her sort of learning, and did not refuse him, as a stranger, and one that she had no acquaintance with; but she had compassion on him, and comforted him, and exhorted him to do what he was greatly averse to, and offered him the only creature she had, as a poor woman, and that earnestly and with great humanity, while she had no requital for her kindness, nor hunted after any future favor from him, for she knew he was to die; whereas, men are naturally either ambitious to please those that bestow benefits upon them, or are very ready to serve those from whom they may receive some advantage. It would be well, therefore, to imitate the example of this woman, and to do kindness to all such as are in want; and to think that nothing is better, nor more becoming mankind, and such a general beneficence, not what will sooner render God favorable."

Here I must for the present leave this matter. I hope, Doctor, that you will continue your efforts to convert the clergy. Be sure your efforts will not be entirely lost. As ever,

MOSES HULL.

Explanation from Charles Dawbarn.

To the Editor:—I was startled to notice in your report of W. F. Jamieson's fifth speech, in his debate with Moses Hull, that I am quoted as having "'confessed' that no spirit has really communicated."

This is a strange misapprehension of my position. To deny spirit return is to-day a mark of mental weakness. It means that the unbeliever is incapable of weighing evidence that has convinced even the skeptical officers of the S. P. R.

I affirm that both returning spirit and mortal medium are in an abnormal condition when they meet in what I have called "fog land." My task has been to analyze spirit teachings received under such conditions, and discover how far they are reliable. I have especially sought most earnestly to discover how much reliance we may place upon the details given us of spirit home life in such communications.

Spirit return and human immortality are now proved to every unprejudiced mind. Prof. Hyslop has recently given us 600 pages of evidence in proceedings published by S. P. R., proving to scientific demonstration that his father and other relatives have returned through Mrs. Piper. His detailed report should convince any man worthy to sit on a jury, and return a verdict from the evidence presented. But, all the same, it illustrates most painfully the befogged condition of the spirit Hyslops when they attempted to re-enter earth life. I claim that all returning spirits are, and must be subject to these limitations, which have resulted in contradictory communications on almost every important point. This has been my position and statement in my published articles, which, most certainly, Mr. Jamieson has no right to call my "confession" that no spirit has really communicated.

My most earnest effort, both in my Ego Series, and in my present Man's Aural Self, is to discover the extent of the power inhering to man the mortal, whereby he may rise above these contradictions, and discover truth for himself. CHARLES DAWBARN.

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

LIGHT, LONDON, ENGLAND.

REINCARNATION AND METEMPSYCHOSIS.

Having wearied you with a "bitter pill" of preaching, may I offer the sugar-plum of a homely story as a homely answer to your "homely question," for it touches, although indirectly, on that field? It was related to me by the lady to whom this experience happened some years ago.

She lived with her three young children and a Swedish maid, at her own country home not far from the shores of the Baltic. Her children, of various ages from about four to seven, began suddenly to become uneasy and restless every evening when they were put to bed, crying and begging to have "the great big dog" removed, that lay, they declared, at the foot of their cots.

At first they were scolded and told not to tell such "stories," but to be quiet and go to sleep, as there was no dog in the room. But at last the maid said that she, too, saw a large white dog, with black spots all over its body, lying on the floor at the foot of the children's beds, just as they had described before.

A few days later the lady herself likewise saw the figure, which probably became more and more substantialized as it drew more force from the members of this family, all more or less mediumistic.

She being herself an excellent drawing and writing medium, felt impelled to take a pencil and write. Words to this effect then came:

"I was a man, but I was an unfaithful servant. I cheated, robbed and deceived my master, and now in the form of a dog I am forced to learn what fidelity means. I suffer; but God is just and I repent. God is good; oh pray to him that he will let me return to human form once more—Pray for me, pray for me."

This request was complied with, and every evening for some weeks prayers were said for this suffering soul. The appearance became fainter and fainter until at last it vanished altogether, and some writing came to the effect that their prayers had been heard and that the soul had obtained pardon and repose, itself grateful for the aid that had been given it.

This is the only story I have heard as relating to metempsychosis in these times; and it opens a field for speculation as to the reasons of the various characters that we remark in animals and of their likes and dislikes; but I myself once had a horse that so disliked me that it deliberately endeavored to injure or kill me during the few hours that I kept it in my possession. Its whole behavior was most extraordinary, uncanny; only in those days I knew nothing of the hidden forces and workings of Nature, so was but strangely struck by its evident malice and vice, and most thankful to return it to the horse-dealer who had sent it to me on trial.

Regarding "fleas," etc., Wm. Blake's deductions and instructions are to the effect that all bloodthirsty souls in course of retrogression land eventually in the outward forms of such parasites. His drawing of the "Ghost of a Flea" is still extant, as likewise his relation of his personal encounter with this terrible spectre.

It occurs to me while writing this, that possibly those souls only just emerging from "the animal stage" being found immature to advance, and failing in the tests given them, are returned to the "Infant School" of growing humanity, in order to study more closely the alphabet and easy spelling lessons of justice, honesty, unselfishness, and all the virtues, equally evident in both man and beast, that are necessary to be marked and digested before entering into new and heavier responsibilities, or the passing from the stage of man-animal to man-human. Hence, too, the "Father forgive them, for they know not what they do," or a prayer for mercy to the ignorant, undeveloped souls who have passed onward too rapidly, and who fall in their tasks. For "Men rush in where angels fear to tread." HESPERUS.

THE TWO WORLDS, MANCHESTER, ENGLAND.

A WARNING VISION.

La Stampa, the leading journal in Turin, translates from the Novosti, of St. Petersburg, the following narrative of an incident which has naturally created a profound sensation in that city, where so many of the educated classes are avowed Spiritualists:

"Count Souwazoff, President of the Tribunal of the first section, was passing sentence in a case of great importance, assisted by two judges, when, all of a sudden, he turned pale and the pen fell from his hand. The two judges hastened to his assistance. The Count kept his eyes fixed upon a particular spot in the hall, and, raising his hand with some difficulty, he pointed thither. The judges followed his gaze, but could see nothing except the perfectly white wall, with a gas-bracket in the center of it. An usher, who had been summoned, brought the Count a cordial which revived him somewhat. When he had slightly recovered he exclaimed, 'What a vision! my God! That wall appeared to me transformed upon the instant into a white vessel, on board of which were my wife and my two young daughters. Darkness was all around the vessel. A storm had arisen. The flashes of lightning and the pealing of the thunder rendered the scene still more terrible. One flash ran along the deck and entered through a port-hole the cabin where the three beings dearest to me in the world were. My wife and her youngest daughter were instantly killed, while the eldest was seriously injured. She neither spoke nor cried; she only raised her arm and thought of me with such an intensity that I felt as if I were close to her, and was like to swoon. I am calmer now. My family cannot have gone to sea today; and it was doubtless a cruel hallucination I experienced.'

"And the President resumed his duties, but not without feeling greatly oppressed by the vision. In the evening he received a telegram from Kief, where his family resided, apprising him that Madame Souwazoff and her two daughters had made an excursion on the sea in the steamboat bearing his own name—an elegant vessel entirely white in color—that it had encountered a sudden hurricane; that a flash of lightning had entered the cabin in which the three ladies were sleeping, and had killed the mother and her younger daughter. The elder had survived, but had been stricken dumb. Perhaps it was that last incident that had been made manifest to her father.

"It appears that the young lady who survived was exceedingly fond of her father, and thought of him from the first outbreak of the storm with so much power and intensity as to constrain him to concentrate upon the vessel all his attention and all his psychic force."

IF I WERE DEAD.

If I were dead you would not blame
And censure me as now you do,
You would not curse me for the shame
I've brought to you.

If I were dead you would forget
My sin, my weakness, and my fall,
And think of me with sad regret
Remembering all.

And so, I die, that you may grow
To think of me forgivingly;
But do not grieve—'tis better so
For you and me.

THE MAKING OF A MEDIUM.

I have been an investigator into psychical phenomena now for about fifteen years, and a constant reader of the literature bearing on the subject, modern, medieval, and ancient, so I don't think Mr. Hector Waylen can justly accuse me as well as Mr. Flower of being ignorant respecting psychical manifestations. With all due respect to your contributor, it appears to me that the young lady Mr. Flower referred to is more fortunate in having him as her guide, philosopher, and friend than if she had Mr. Waylen.

If Mr. Flower had been the means of introducing her to the earth-bound spirit in question, I would have concurred with Mr. Waylen in his criticism; but the spirit introduced himself, and her mediumship originated quite spontaneously.

Mr. Waylen, if I understand him, would have advised this young lady to suppress her mediumship and repel the spirit.

Now I maintain that suppressed mediumship is far more dangerous than developed mediumship. I remember reading of many instances wherein refusal to heed the importunities of a spirit led to great distress of mind on the part of the sensitive, with a decided tendency to insanity or suicide. I think Mr. Flower would have done wrong in counselling his friend to exercise repulsion. I should have thought that any one conversant with the history of similar cases would have known the cruelty of refusing to give these poor unfortunates the opportunity of releasing themselves from the chains that have galled them often for long periods.

Moreover, I think Mr. Flower acted far more in accordance with psychical laws in his endeavor to dissipate the fears of the medium, than if he had allowed such morbid ideas as Mr. Waylen seems to be possessed of to add to her dread. The tendency of the human mind to build up a bogey and diabolism out of the unpleasant phases of spirit intercourse has been far too great in the past. The world would be much better to-day, and the sum of human happiness much greater were there less of it.

Morbidity and fear grows on what it feeds, and if this young girl had been frightened all the more by Mr. Waylen's fears of the undeveloped spirits, it would only have deepened the hold of the spirit on her organism, and angered by her refusal to listen to him, he might have injured her considerably, it is hard to say to what extent.

I have yet to learn that sympathy and gentleness, tempered with firmness and common sense, in dealing with the unfortunate of the spirit world have ever led to the injury of a sensitive; so when Mr. Flower told her that she need have no fear of this spirit he told her the truth, and in inspiring her with cheerfulness and courage he made her all the more immune from danger and harm. From a comparison of many similar instances I am of opinion that the spirit in question has had special permission from the guides of the sensitive to visit her, with the hope of thereby being released from his earth-bound condition, and I shall be surprised if the sequel does not show this to be a fact. From every point of view Mr. Waylen's position is at variance with the lessons we ought to learn from the study of psychical facts, and I maintain that Mr. Flower has acted wisely under the circumstances. GEORGE COLE.

Sir:—Will you allow me to very heartily thank Mr. Hector Waylen for his outspoken protest against the craze for "experiments" in Spiritualism. I suppose I may call myself a Spiritualist, for I believe in the influence of the spirits of the departed upon our minds and lives, and in the possibility of their communicating with us under proper conditions; or in the words of the creed, "I believe in the communion of saints." And it is because I believe that Spiritualism may be the greatest power for good in the world that I deeply deplore the insensate folly of the experimenters in the movement, who, in their hasty curiosity, have determined to make it a thing to be shunned by all sensible people.

How Mr. Sydney Flower could have the heart to encourage a young girl to hold communication with an unknown spirit of most forbidding appearance I cannot understand. I should have thought that such an unpleasant experience would have led to earnest prayer to the Great Spirit that he would give power to the attendant good spirits to drive away so uncanny a visitor. It is this unwise experimenting for the sake of satisfying curiosity which brings the movement into contempt and causes religious people to treat it with suspicion.

The Church of Christ needs Spiritualism to re-enforce and breathe life into her almost unheeded declaration of the continuity of life after death, and just as much, if you will permit me to say so, does Spiritualism, if it is to be a force for good in the world, need the Church of Christ. I do not mean that it must adopt the doctrinal system of the churches, but that it needs, if I rightly judge, more hesitancy, more care and reverence in its dealings with the other world, more of the spirit of true devotion, if it is to do the work which God has given it to do, and prove to the world that it does not exist to satisfy curiosity or afford amusement, but to combat the forces of materialism and promote religion.

HARBINGER OF LIGHT, MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA.

THE ASTRAL BODY.

Dr Constantin Alexandrowith Bodisco, who, in 1892, published in French a book which we reviewed at the time of its appearance, entitled "Psychic Researches Between 1888-1892, Dedicated to the Incredulous and the Egotists," has just addressed to El Spiritualista, of Valparaiso, a letter in which he describes a discovery of the highest importance in connection with the science of Spiritualism. As the value of a statement of this kind depends to some extent upon the intellectual capacity and attainments of the author of it, it may be mentioned that Dr. Bodisco's father was the Russian Ambassador to the United States, married an American lady, that the son was born in the United States, that the son became in course of time secretary to the Embassy at Washington, and Russian Commissioner to the Philadelphia Exhibition in 1876, likewise married an American wife, and on his return to St. Petersburg was appointed Chamberlain to the Emperor, by whom he was entrusted with several confidential missions of a diplomatic character; and it is well known that Russian diplomats are reputed to be the ablest in Europe. For the last twelve years Dr. Bodisco has devoted himself to psychic researches, and has especially investigated the nature of the luminous matter which forms what may be called the "substance" of the astral body, aura, or perispirit of every human being. He has done so, he says, in the presence and with the co-operation of persons worthy of the utmost confidence, and under strictly scientific test conditions. In the work above referred to he expressed his conviction that that substance would prove to be the link or mediator between the visible and the invisible world. He has now satisfied himself that it is so, and is certain that "when the laws to which it is subject have been discovered it will produce an enormous moral revolution in the whole of humanity."

We will now let Dr. Bodisco describe the discovery in his own words:

"In Esarkoie, one of the suburbs of St. Petersburg, we met, to the number of five persons, in a darkened habitation. Two of these persons fell into a deep and tranquil sleep, merely under the imposition of hands, and without any passes, and in a few minutes we all of us saw a luminous white spot enveloping the hand of one of the sleepers, which gradually increased in intensity. This brilliant substance had all the appearance of a snow-flake with a certain blue tint in it, and through it we could clearly perceive the hand of the subject. The point of departure of this luminous substance appeared to be the palm of the hand, and its light was sufficiently intense to illuminate perfectly the various objects we brought near it. The hand of the medium began to move over the table until it reached a pencil, which, likewise illuminated, was enveloped in the astral, and began to make attempts to write upon the table independently of the hand, which continued illuminated. Suddenly the medium, without coming out of trance, pronounced the following words:

"'This is the astral body; you have been witnesses of its power of attraction.'

"The substance separated itself gradually from the pencil, and at the same time considerably augmented in volume. Then the subject, taking a part of this spongy and imponderable substance, formed a ball of it, and placed it in my left hand, and in my right hand a hard and heavy body, intensely white in color, which had been formed in my sight.

"The subject again spoke to the following effect:

"'You hold in your right hand a portion of the astral fluid, and in your left another portion, which is astral matter condensed. You hold in your hands the immaterial part of the human body; that which is indestructible, and out of which the material world has been created. That which you touch at this moment is indestructibly bound up with my being, yet you could not perceive it by itself; for to your sight they are two separate things.'

"I continued to observe these bodies with the liveliest interest, when I began to feel that the "stone" I held in my hand emitted a powerful heat, at the same time that it diminished in luminosity. Presently the medium took these objects from my hands, laid the "stone" upon the table, and with the spongy substance lightly brushed my head and face; and, at the contact, it felt something like a hank of cotton or of very fine tulle. Then he blended this latter substance in his hand, which liquified, and placing it on the stone he presented it to our view. I observed for five minutes, with the greatest attention, this extraordinary body. I touched it, admiring the constitution of its brilliant texture, and watching its progressive diminution in light and volume until it finally disappeared. Then I lighted a candle, and observing that the subjects were still in trance, I proceeded to awaken them by means of passes. The experiment had lasted for more than an hour. After tea we seated ourselves at the table, and in about two minutes one of the subjects fell into a magnetic sleep. He walked behind the curtain and told us to light a magnesium lamp. The sudden glare forced us to close our eyes, and when we opened them again we saw the medium immersed in a luminous substance analogous to that seen in the previous experiment, which softly illuminated the whole room with the effect of moonlight. The medium arose from the arm-chair in which he was seated, slowly gathered together around his head the marvelous garment of light which covered him, and, approaching the table, enveloped the whole of us in this veil.

"Three of the persons present saw and heard what took place, and can verify the accuracy of my statements. The fourth and fifth were in trance."

"THE ATOMIC WORLD"

Is the title of a series of articles by C. C. Ross, of Wellington, which have recently appeared in the New Zealand Times. They profess to be a condensation of a lengthy paper forwarded to him by Alfred Russel Wallace, F. R. S., and are strictly scientific in character, but from the ordinary scientific standpoint, are unique, inasmuch as they extend the operation of the theory beyond the recognized physical limits, and follow its operations into that terra incognita of the scientist, "the spiritual world;" and when Dr. Wallace's paper comes on for discussion in England it will be for the physical scientists to disprove (if they can) the soundness of his position. Referring to the naturally evolved Bequerel and Uranian rays, and the artificially evolved Cathode and Rontgen rays, the new science of Radiology (Dr. Wallace says) "deals with a class of phenomena fixed midway between the molecular and aethereal worlds." The decision as to the real nature of these radiations is not at present unanimous, but the weight of opinion, headed by no less an authority than Professor Thomson, holds them to be "a minute atomic discharge of emanations from the molecular body," and that in many inorganic substances and all organic bodies there is a constant interchange amongst the atomic particles composing the molecules of which the substance is formed, protoplasmic matter possessing the highest radio-activity. It is further mentioned that Professor Lenard has quite recently discovered that when an ultra-violet light is allowed to shine on objects charged with electricity, "they lose their electricity and Rontgen rays are generated in the air."

The argument goes on to show that the various "allotropic, isomeric, and polymeric transformations carry with them the evolution of a corresponding invisible atomic body, enveloping and permeating the molecular body, and of such a nature that it remains undestroyed through the action of those forces which dissolve the molecular body." In other words, that the soul form which clairvoyants see within the physical body, and recognize as the spiritual body, is the natural result of evolution and the substance of the permanent persistent Ego. This is in entire accord with the revelations of the most gifted seers, and in harmony with the most reliable spiritual teachings. It is shown that the growth of the primordial protoplasm in the embryo consists in molecular nutriment derived from the capillaries of the matrix, and that the atomic and molecular growth of the Homo and Ego are synchronous, and under ordinary circumstances they balance each other, excessive stimulation or either tending to loss of equilibrium, and when this occurs to any considerable extent the atomic body disintegrates and the molecular or etheric body becomes a denizen of the etheric world. The physically embodied Ego is denominated the Bond Ego and the liberated one the Aether Ego.

It has been affirmed that all matter in its different forms of aggregation, of which the human organism is composed, is possessed of radio-activity to a greater or less degree and it therefore follows that the Ego would have a correspondent in its invisible atomic condition (its body still being substance) of all the molecular, morphological and functional differentiations manifested in the Homo—some analogy to the grey and white nerve matter of the denser physical structures through which it would manifest itself in consciousness and thought.

In dealing with the question of consciousness a parallel is suggested between the effect of etherial undulations, which cause the subjective phenomena of light, and the reactionary reception by the Homo of etherial motion from the Ego in producing the phenomena of consciousness. The processes are said to be identical, and harmonize with the conclusions reached from a different standpoint by Professors Clifford and Romanes.

Much argument follows, tending to exhibit the higher powers of the Ego and its possession of a superior consciousness by reason of its capacity to absorb intuitionally ideas from the etheric world which can only measurably be assimilated by the Homo, and in corroboration of what has been advanced the fact "That clairvoyants can see magnetic aura and atomic radiations invisible to the normal eye is strong presumptive evidence of our hypothesis that the Ego is of a radiant atomic nature."

In a brief summary of the scientific argument it is shown that the writer started with hypotheses based on acknowledged and well-established physical analogies, which were found to be in complete accord with the processes of biological and psychological phenomena, and that where each science threatened to merge into the inexplicable, by means of his hypothesis he was enabled to pick up the threads and establish the missing connective links between inorganic, organic, psychical and ultra-psychical phenomena. In doing this it would be seen that "the operations of nature are an infinite series of connected changes, of which human life is merely a passing phenomenon, or histological event, leading through what we call decay and death to a form more closely connected with the basic and ethereal element."

We shall look with interest to the public presentation of these ideas by Mr. Wallace. Coming from so eminent an authority in both physical and psychic science, they cannot fail to produce a profound impression on the thinking world and strengthen the scientific basis of Spiritualism.

How One Mourner Was Comforted.

Mrs. Will Weakly gives the following interesting experience:

"My mother at an advanced age departed this life, and I sat by the side of her inanimate form. Having always been true to her responsibilities, noble in thought and self-sacrificing, she was dearly beloved by all. To compose my mind I began to read in The Progressive Thinker, but after a while I laid down the paper and said, 'O, loved ones, can't you draw near me and tell me that she is not out alone, and that you are near me?' I sent out the prayer of love to them, and I laid my head back and to one side, thinking perhaps they will touch me as they often do to let me know they are near, when right in front of me stood my father and mother. My father took my darling mother in his arms, folding her close to his heart. She put her dear thin arms around his neck, and he laid his cheek on her head, and they floated from my sight.

"My father has been in the spirit world 36 years and mother has lived in his memory waiting for reunion with her loved one. She is now living in the full strength of his love; the one who took her as his bride fifty-nine years ago, and thirty-six of those years spent alone, rearing a large family by herself and doing her best. She was folded in the arms of her dear husband, with their love as fresh as on the day he took her as his bride, and the bright, happy smile on my dear father's face seemed to say to me 'Don't worry, I will care for her now;' and I know they are together. Mother looked weary and dazed, but father was as bright as the noonday sun that was shining into the window.

"The sting was taken from me. I was so happy that I could only sing with joy. Some will say I had fallen asleep and dreamed. I never was so far from sleep as I was at that time.

"I have had a great many experiences with fraud and the truth, and if I never see or hear anything more in my life, I know the truth of spirit return now. I am sure my father brought my dear mother to comfort me for it seemed as though I would die, for my love for my mother is very strong. She has been a mother and father both in one to me. I was young when he went into the spirit world, but I would know him anywhere.

"If I had expected anything like that picture, I would have thought it was imagination. I only asked them to come near me and touch me, that I might know they were with me. I asked for so little and got my heart full for opening the door of my home to the loved ones."

OCCULT MYSTERIES.

DREAMS THAT HAVE COME TRUE; CERTIFIED TO BY DREAMERS

Romeo—I dreamt a dream to-night,
Mercutio—And so did I.
Romeo—Well, what was yours?
Mercutio—That dreamers often lie.
Romeo—In bed asleep, while they do dream things true.—Shakspeare.

In a book upon "Dreams and Their Meanings," just published by Longmans, Green & Co., Horace G. Hutchinson relates a score of marvelous telepathic and premonitory dreams.

The dreams are of all sorts, from the simplest hallucinations of falling downstairs to premonitory visions of death and crime.

From a mass of data collected from people in every part of the world Mr. Hutchinson concludes that:

1. The human mind in sleep is able to peer into the future and to predict events years before they take place.

2. A man may accurately dream the circumstances of his own death long before it happens.

3. Communication is possible between the minds of persons in sleep thousands of miles apart.

4. In sleep the human mind may receive messages and warnings from the dead.

Many of the remarkable dreams described in Mr. Hutchinson's work are taken from the records of the Society for Psychical Research in England and America.

All of them are certified to by the dreamers themselves or by reputable persons acquainted with the facts.

One of the most uncanny dreams is that by H. W. Wack, a lawyer, of St. Paul, Minn.

"About midnight one evening," says Mr. Wack, "fatigued by poring over a law text, I fell into bed for the night. My brain buzzed with myriad fancies, and the weird intonation of an old kitchen clock fell upon my ears faintly as it donged the hour of 2.

"It had hardly died away when I became conscious that I was in a passenger coach on the St. Paul, Minnesota and Omaha Railroad, journeying from St. Paul to Duluth.

STARTLED BY PIERCING SHRIEK.

"I was near Shell Lake, Wis., about eighty miles from St. Paul. As I peered through the coach window I recognized in the moonlit scene features of country I had seen before. We were plunging on, when I was startled from my reverie by a piercing shriek, protracted into piteous moaning and gasping.

"Then I felt the train grind heavily to a stop. There was a sudden commotion and trainmen with lanterns hurried through my car.

"A minute later I was out upon the road itself. A brusque and busy search was going on. Everybody moved and acted in a spirit of stealth, and each, it appeared, expected a horrible 'find.'

"Blood splotches were discovered on nearly all the bearings under the entire train. When the gang reached one of the forward cars all lights were cast upon a truck which was literally scrambled with brains—human brains, evidently, for among the clots were tufts of human hair.

"This truck particularly must have ground over the bulk of a human body. Every fixture between the wheels was smeared with the crimson ooze of the crushed victim. The trucks were covered only with a pulp of mangled remains.

"The search for what appeared to be the killed extended five hundred yards back of the train and all about the right of way, with no more satisfactory result than to occasionally find a blood-stained tie. All hands boarded the car. Again I felt the train thundering on through the burned pine wastes of Northern Minnesota.

"As I reclined in my berth I reflected upon the experience of the night and befuddled my sleepy head in an effort to understand how a train pushing along at the rate of thirty miles an hour could so grind and triturate a vital bulk, staining only trucks behind the engine, unless the killed at the time were upon the track or huddled closely by it.

"Horrible! I shuddered and awoke, relieved to comprehend it was all a dream. I heard the clock strike 3."

HOW THE DREAM CAME TRUE.

The next morning Mr. Wack related his dream to his family and to friends. That afternoon the St. Paul evening papers (Dec. 30, 1892) contained the horrible details of the grinding to death of an unknown man on the St. Paul, Minnesota and Omaha Railroad at the place pictured in Mr. Wack's dream, Shell Lake, Wis., and at the hour (most probably) when he had seen the vision in sleep one hundred miles away.

"Every truck on the incoming Omaha train from St. Paul was splashed with blood," read the despatches from Duluth that day. "Trainmen did not know that there had been an accident until they arrived in Duluth. A man's leg has been found at Spooner. Portions of the body were also found on over one hundred miles of the railroad, and apparently the accident took place at Shell Lake, Wis. There is no possible means of identification."

"I am convinced," writes Mr. Wack, "that in sleep one hundred miles distant I had the phantom sight of an actual occurrence on the Omaha railroad that night."

Here is another dream, scarcely less weird, by a woman who lives in Kensington, near London, England:

"I dreamed very distinctly that I saw a crowd and I heard a voice saying, 'She is quite dead; I've cut her throat; I've cut her throat!'

"I was very frightened, as it impressed me as being so real.

"I awoke and noted the time—4 a. m.

"Next morning when I arrived at my place of business I saw a crowd outside the house next door. On inquiry I found that a man had murdered his wife by cutting her throat about 4 o'clock that morning, in the house."

Col. A. V. S., of Texas, a prominent Southern gentleman, furnishes the following strange story of his little daughter's dream through Prof. Royce, of Harvard University:

"Five years ago I lived with my four children, one boy and three girls, on a farm in Massachusetts. My son lost his life in an accident.

"About six months after his death I bought each of my little girls a small knife two and a half inches long. The youngest one, eight years old, was so delighted with this, her first knife, that she carried it with her all the time. In a children's party one afternoon the knife was lost in a haymow in the barn.

"The terrible loss nearly broke my little one's heart, and all hands tried without success to find her treasure.

"The party broke up in gloom.

"The little girl went to bed that night crying and refusing to be comforted.

"In the morning she waked her sister joyfully and said that her brother had been there in the night and showed her where to find her knife. Both girls dressed hastily and slipped out to the barn. The little one walked directly to a certain spot in the haymow.

"Here brother picked the knife out of the hay,' she said.

"Sure enough, there lay the penknife in plain view in a spot which the children had searched again and again the evening before."

Frederick Greenwood, the author, is authority for the following dream:

"One night I dreamed that, making a call on some matter of business, I was shown into a drawing-room and asked to wait.

THE VISION OF THE WOMAN'S HAND.

"I went over to the fireplace and lounged with my arm upon the mantelpiece, but only for a few moments, for, feeling that my fingers had rested on something strangely cold, I looked and saw that they lay on a dead hand—a woman's hand, newly cut from the wrist.

"Though I woke in horror on the instant, this dream was quite forgotten—at any rate for the time. I did next day make a call on some unimportant business, was shown into a pretty little room adorned with various knick-knacks, and then asked to wait.

"Glancing by chance toward the mantelpiece, what should I see but the hand of a mummy, broken from the wrist! It was a very little hand, and on it was a ring that would have been a 'gem ring' if the dull red stone in it had been genuinely precious. Wherefore I concluded that it was a woman's hand."

Lady Q., an Englishwoman, gives the following strange premonitory dream. The account was furnished to the Society for Psychical Research:

"My father died when I was a child and I went to live with an uncle, who became like a father to me.

"In the spring of 1882 I dreamt that my sister and I were sitting in my uncle's drawing-room. In my dream it was a brilliant spring day and from the window we saw quantities of flowers in the garden.

"But over the garden there lay a thin covering of snow. I knew in my dream that my uncle had been found dead by the side of a certain bridle path about three miles from the house, a field road where I had often ridden with him and along which he often rode when going to fish in a neighboring lake.

"His horse was standing by him, and he was wearing a dark homespun suit of cloth made from the wool of a herd of black sheep which he kept.

"I knew that his body was being brought home in a wagon with two horses, with hay in the bottom of the wagon, and that we were waiting for his body to arrive. Then in my dream the wagon came to the door and two men well known to me, one a gardener, the other the kennel huntsman, helped to carry the body up the stairs, which were very narrow.

"My uncle was a very tall and heavy man, and in my dream I saw the men carrying him with difficulty and his left hand hanging down and striking against the banisters as the men mounted the stairs. This detail gave me in my dream an unreasonable horror. I could not help painfully thinking, "Oh, why they did not prevent his hand from being bruised in this way!'

"I determined not to tell my uncle of the dream, but in the morning I looked so changed and ill that I could not escape his affectionate questioning, and at last I told him of my vision of him lying dead in that field road.

"I had no anxiety about his health. He was a robust man of sixty-six, accustomed to hunt to his own pack of hounds and to take much exercise. He listened to me kindly, and although he was not himself at all alarmed he offered to do anything I liked which might calm my mind.

"I begged him to promise me never to go alone by that particular road.

"He promised me that he would always make an excuse to have a groom or some one with him.

"Two years passed by and the thought of the dream was becoming less frequent, when I dreamt it again with the same profoundly disturbing effect.

"I told my uncle and said to him that I felt sure that he had been neglecting his promise and riding by that field road alone. He admitted that he had occasionally done so. 'Although,' he said, 'I think I have been very good on the whole.'

"He renewed his promise, and again the impression grew weaker as four years passed by, during which I married and left his home.

"In May, 1888, I was in London, ill. I dreamt the same dream again, but with this variation. I knew in my dream that I was lying in bed in our London house. But from that bedroom, just as from the drawing-room in the former dreams, I seemed to see my uncle lying dead in the same well-known place, and I seemed to perceive the same scene of the bringing home of the body.

THE MAN IN BLACK APPEARS.

"Then came a new point. As I lay in bed a gentleman in black, but whose face I could not see, seemed to stand by me and tell me that my uncle was dead.

"I woke in great distress.

"As I grew better I began to wonder greatly at not hearing from my uncle, who generally wrote to me every day. Then my dream came back to me and I was certain that he was ill or dead.

One morning my husband said my stepfather had come and wished to see me, and I at once guessed his errand. He entered the room dressed in black and stood by my bedside.

"At once I recognized that this was the figure I had seen in my dream.

"I said, 'The Colonel is dead; I know all about it; I have dreamt it often. And as he was unable to speak from emotion I told him all about it—place, time of day (morning) and the clothes my uncle wore.

"The cause of his death, it seemed, had been heart disease, of whose existence neither I nor, I believe, any of those near and dear to him had been aware. He had been found half-stunned in that very field road where I had three times seen him. He died and his body was brought back as I have described. He was dressed in the same homespun suit in which I had seen him in my dream. He had evidently felt faint and slipped from his horse. I thought of that scene on the staircase, which had always remained in my mind. I asked if there were any bruises on his hands.

"'No bruises,' said my stepfather, 'either on hands or face.'

"Soon after my sister came to see me and brought me a ring which my uncle had always worn on his left hand.

"'I only came just in time,' she said. 'They were just going to close the coffin. 'Was there any bruise on the left hand?' I asked.

"She said she thought there was a bluish discoloration across the back of the first joints of the fingers. She did not know how it had been caused.

"But when I asked my old nurse, she admitted that the left hand had knocked against the banisters. She seemed afraid lest I should blame the men who carried the body and did not like to speak of the incident. The same two men whom I had seen in my dream as helping to carry the body had in fact done so."—New York World.

THAT OCCULT FEELING

On the Part of the Engineer.

HOW A FRIGHTFUL RAILROAD DISASTER WAS PREVENTED—THE MAN WHO NEVER FORGETS

The difference between a train dispatcher and a railroad engineer is—the train dispatcher may forget and yet save himself; the engineer never does without fatal consequences. Romance has served to give the train dispatcher an importance in railroad work to which he is more or less entitled, but never at the expense of the engineer, who, after all, is the man "on the road" protecting the traveling public.

The particular train dispatcher who guided McFadden regularly over his route was not loved by the various engineers of the division. He was a dyspeptic to begin with, and a man with a bad stomach is to be feared, no matter what position he occupies. But more than being a dyspeptic he was a misanthrope. He looked at the world through dark-hued glasses and saw everything from the crooked point of view. In consequence the railway men with whom he came in contact were made to feel his displeasure at every opportunity, and there was never an engineer on that division who did not long for an opportunity to balance accounts with this man.

His name was Randall. He was unmarried and prided himself on his reputation in railway circles of never having given a wrong order or of having made a mistake. It is a fatal thing for a train dispatcher to believe himself infallible. McFadden never discussed Randall without saying:

"He's so cocksure that he is always right that some day he is going to forget, and pile us all up before we know it."

One morning lounging about the round-house, waiting to receive his engine, McFadden met Peters, one of the old engineers of the road. Peters was in a great hurry, but stopped long enough to say to McFadden:

"I am out with the special to-day, going 120 miles west and back again this evening. Some of the eastern directors are here looking over the property."

"What time do you come back to-night?" asked McFadden.

"Oh, I understand that we leave the west end at 7 o'clock."

"Then," said McFadden, "I will meet you or you will meet me at Lee's siding."

"That will be our passing point," said Peters, and hurried on.

During the day McFadden had one of those uncomfortable feelings that overtakes everyone some time or other. It can hardly be called a premonition of danger, yet it manifests itself through depression in the stomach and the mind. The body seems very heavy. One hesitates in doing things; there is a disposition to always look back over the shoulder as if one were being followed. Railway engineers suffer much from this manifestation.

McFadden battled with himself, but found that it grew stronger as the day progressed. He told "Johnny" Forbes about it and remarked that he was willing to wager a great deal there was trouble ahead of them that night, and when toward evening he found his train nearly an hour behind time and his engine not steaming as it should he was still more convinced that trouble was ahead of him. Peters had come into his mind during the day. He only dimly remembered that if the special had adhered to the original program it must meet him at Lee's siding and then pass on.

McFadden and his train were probably twenty or thirty miles from Lee's siding when his mind suddenly awoke. Where he had been dull all day he became preternaturally sharp. It flashed into his mind that in his train orders no mention had been made of Peters and the special. At first he concluded that the train had been laid up somewhere. It was really absurd for him to think about it at all, for if it was on the division the train dispatcher would certainly be taking care of it and advise all opposing or conflicting trains.

Yet McFadden's mind was not satisfied with this explanation. He kept asking himself over and over again, "Where is Peters?" At his next stop, which was ten miles from Lee's siding, when the conductor came ahead with the orders and McFadden noted still no reference to Peters, he carelessly asked that official if he had heard anything of the special. He replied that all he knew was that it was out on the line and had been out all day. When the train left the station McFadden called Fireman "Johnny" Forbes over to him and said:

"If I feel, 'Johnny,' at Lee's siding as I do now, I am going to slow up there and go in without orders."

"What in the devil will you do that for?" asked Johnny.

"I can't explain it to you. There has something got me by the throat and there is something stirring in my stomach, and I don't believe that I can take this train by the siding without a stop. We are running into danger. Where is Peters?"

"I don't know. That is the business of the man on the wire. He'll take care of that."

"Yes, that is true, and that smart man with the bad stomach is on the wire, and I think he has made a break somewhere to-day. If I slack up, Johnny, at the siding, you drop off, open the switch and we will slide in. I may get laughed at and it may cost me my job, but I'll do it if I feel when we get there as I do now."

Forbes said no more, McFadden kept his train up to the top notch speed, doing his best to make up lost time, but the nearer he got to Lee's siding the greater the impulse of him to stop. It was contrary to all railroad rules and regulations that he should do so, but when in the moon light the siding came into view McFadden suddenly set his brakes and Forbes dropped off and opened the switch and the Limited rolled in. The rear brakeman, not just understanding what was up, closed the switch, and then, with a roar, a flash of fire and a rattle of wheels and mechanism, Peters came out of the night with the special and went by. He was running with two coaches and going at fifty miles an hour with great ease. He gave two jubilant shrieks through his whistle at meeting McFadden's train, but did not slacken his speed.

The cold sweat broke out over McFadden's body as Peters went by. All that he had feared through the day had nearly come true. His conductor came running ahead with the exclamation on his lips:

"For God's sake, where did that train come from?"

"That was Peters," answered McFadden, hoarsely.

"Yes, why in hades didn't he know he was coming against us? Why did you take that siding?"

"I don't know," said McFadden. "It has simply been on me all day that we were going to have trouble, and I told Forbes at the last stop that I would very likely pull in here. I was certain Peters was on the line, and he told me this morning that if he was he would pass at Lee's siding. I guess the train dispatcher forgot all of us this time."

"Well, thank God," said the conductor, "that you didn't forget. If you hadn't come in here you would have met a mile east of here head-on, and what a mix-up we would have had."

All of McFadden's bad feelings were now gone from him, and he brought on his train through the remainder of the night with ease and without trouble. A little investigation of the failure of the train dispatcher to notify the Limited that Peters was on the road or to notify Peters that he was to take the siding at Lee's siding and let the Limited pass showed that through some slip of memory orders to both of the trains had gone astray and each had been approaching the other in a space of ten or fifteen miles without the train dispatcher knowing just where.

If it had not been for McFadden's singular warning, as he chose to regard it, and his taking his train onto Lee's siding without an order there would have been a bad wreck and great loss of life. As it was, harm came to no one except that the dyspeptic train dispatcher lost his position and McFadden received no reward for acting as he had, but as he believed that he had saved his own life in doing so he was entirely satisfied. He and Peters had a long talk about it the next time they met.

"I guess," said Peters, "the old man in the moon did not want us that time, but he was after the job of that train dispatcher mighty hard, and he got it."

HAS UNCANNY POWERS.

Elkhart, Ind., Girl Can Make Household Articles Fly About Room.

UNCONSCIOUS OF THE ACTS—FAMILY BEWILDERED BY THE MYSTERIOUS HAPPENINGS ATTRIBUTED TO BESSIE CURRIER.

According to Mr. and Mrs. James McCarthy, of 130 Pratt street, Elkhart, Ind., several boarders and ten or twelve neighbors, some very peculiar and mysterious things happened at the McCarthy house between 8 o'clock Tuesday morning and 4 o'clock in the afternoon and for want of a better explanation they ascribe the manifestations to some unnatural power possessed by 13-year-old Bessie Currier, the daughter of a woman who lives with a daughter-in-law, Mrs. William Currier, just south of that town.

QUEER THINGS THAT HAPPENED

The manifestations occurred only in the presence of the girl and ceased when, at 4 o'clock, the girl was sent away, going to her sister-in-law's home. Chairs turned over on the floor; a stick of wood found its way to the center of a room twice; a joint of stovepipe came up the cellar stairs and stood in the room; plates rolled off the dining-room table; a sewing machine tipped over gently and rested on its side on the floor; a pail emptied its water three times; the clothesline broke three times and further efforts to fix it were abandoned; a lamp chimney floated from its place on the lamp to a bed and the lamp followed and various other things equally as puzzling happened, according to the apparently sincere statements of the witnesses mentioned.

GIRL DENIES RESPONSIBILITY.

Bessie Currier had been with the McCarthys about a week, and nothing unusual occurred until after Mrs. McCarthy had angered the child by mildly reproving her for shirking her work. The girl denies responsibility for the unnatural antics and declares her ignorance of the possession of any supernatural abnormal power, declaring that she was scared herself at the manifestations and glad to be sent away. She was seen by a reporter at her sister-in-law's home and seemed surprised that the mysterious happenings should be laid at her door.

STRANGE RAPPINGS HEARD.

Her relatives say that on Thanksgiving day and for several subsequent days repeated rappings were heard when she was about and the matter was investigated and two men confirmed the opinion of Mrs. William Currier that the girl was producing the sounds out of a spirit of devilry. Her mother, however, joins the girl in declaring that while the noises were always in the child's presence she was innocent of their cause. The feeling over the girl's supposed trickery became so strong that Mrs. Currier declared she should leave the house and it was then she went to Mrs. McCarthy's residence.

GIRL IS STRONG AND RUGGED.

The girl is large for her age and has a strong, rugged appearance, evidently possessed of unusual vitality. Her complexion is fair, clear, with blond hair and dark eyebrows and calm blue eyes.

All the statements made above were vouched for by half a dozen witnesses to whom the Daily News correspondent has talked. All who saw the strange happenings declare that they could not be deceived as to what occurred.—Chicago Daily News.

It has remained for a prominent business man of Cincinnati to discover that in the application of Hot Air to the skin and its resultant perspiration lies the secret of good health, vigor, freedom from disease and beauty. He proved beyond the question of a doubt that the Romans and Greeks had but Hot Air and Vapor Baths, and that they owed their splendid health, fine physique, strength and beauty to vaporized air or "sweat baths," and so he set to work to invent a method by which the American people could secure all the marvelous benefits of these baths without expensive apparatus, bath rooms and at smallest expense.

The now famous Quaker Bath Cabinet was the result of his efforts.

An Enormous Business.

Invented and patented six years ago—the demand has been so great that over 500,000 Cabinets, were sold during the past year, and hundreds of men and women are growing rich selling them, as the makers offer splendid inducements to hustlers.

It is an air-tight inclosure, a rubber-walled room in which one comfortably rests on a chair, and with only the head outside, enjoys at home, for 3 cents each, all the marvelous, cleansing, curative and invigorating effects of the famous Turkish, Russian, Roman, Finn Air, Hot Vapor Baths, medicated or perfumed if desired, with no possibility of taking cold afterwards, or in any way weakening the system.

Clouds of Hot Air or Vapor surround the entire body, opening the millions of sweat-pores, causing profuse perspiration, drawing out of the blood and system all the impure acids, salts and effete matter which if retained, cause sickness, debility, and affliction.

Astonishing is the Immediate improvement in your health, feelings and complexion. There is not a single person living who should not possess one of these Cabinets.

Famous Physicians believe in it.

Hundreds of well-known physicians have given up their practice to sell these Cabinets, and today over 27,000 physicians use and recommend them, and every well equipped hospital and sanitarium in the World use these Cabinets with the most wonderful and beneficial effects—curing even the worst chronic cases. It beats a trip to Hot Springs.

Thousands of remarkable letters have been written the makers from users, some refering to

Rheumatism, La Grippe and Kidney Troubles

Will be interesting to those who suffer from these dread maladies. W. L. Brown, Oxford, O., writes: "My father was down in bed for months with rheumatism; this Cabinet did him more good than $50. worth of drugs. It cured my brother of sleeplessness, of which he had long suffered, and his wife of lagrippe in one night." G. M. Lafferty, Covington, Ky., writes: "Was compelled to quit business a year ago, being prostrated with rheumatism and kidney troubles, when your Cabinet came. Two weeks use cured me; have never had a twinge since." Rev. Geo. H. Hudson, of Mich., says: "I gave up my pastorate on account of nervous prostration and lung troubles; my editor so highly recommended your Cabinet, I tried it; I commenced growing better at once; am now well; nervousness gone; lungs strong; am a new man." Mr. Simon Tompkins, a retired capitalist of Columbus, O., says: "I am satisfied it saved my life. Was taken down with a hard cold which developed into a dangerous case of pneumonia. The first Bath relieved me, and I quickly recovered. It is far superior to drugs for curing lagrippe, colds, inflammation and rheumatism." Hon. A. B. Strickland, of Bloomington, writes: that the Cabinet did him more good than two years' doctoring, cured him of catarrh, gravel, kidney trouble and dropsy, with which he had long suffered.

Hundreds of Ministers

write, praising this Cabinet. Rev. Baker Smith, D. D., Fairmount, N. J., says: "Your Cabinet rids the body of aches and pains, and as "Cleanliness is next to Godliness" it merits high recommendation." Rev. J. C. Richardson, Roxbury, Mass., was greatly benefited by its use, and recommends it highly, as also does Hon. V. C. Hay, who writes: "Physicians gave me up to die, was persuaded by friends to try this Cabinet, and it cured me. Cannot praise it enough." U. S. Senator, Hon. Chauncey M. Depew, Congressman John J. Lentz, John T. Brown, Editor "Christian Guide;" Rev. C. M. Keith, Editor "Holiness Advocate," as well as hundreds of clergymen, bankers, governors, physicians and influential people recommend it highly.

Physicians are unanimous in claiming that colds, lagrippe, fevers, kidney troubles, Bright's disease, cancer; in fact, such has this Cabinet that no disease can gain a foothold in your body if you take these hot Thermal Baths weekly. Scientific reasons are brought out in a very instructive little book issued by the makers.

To Cure Blood and Skin Diseases

this Cabinet has marvelous power. Dr. Sheppard, of Brooklyn, states that he has never failed to draw out the deadly poison of snake bites, hydrophobia, blood poison, etc., by this Vapor Bath, proving that it is the most wonderful blood purifier known. If people, instead of filling their system with more poisons by taking drugs and nostrums, would get into a Vapor Bath Cabinet and steam out these poisons, and assist Nature to act, they would have pure blood, and a skin as clear and smooth as the most fastidious could desire.

Another Important Feature is the astonishing benefit in diseases of women and children. It removes the inflammation and congestion which causes much of the pain to which women are slaves. Heat is the greatest known relief and cure for these ailments, if rightly applied. Dr. Williams, one of New York's most celebrated physicians says: "The best remedy for the prevention and cure of all troubles peculiar to the female sex is Hot Air Baths. Your Cabinet is truly a God-send to women." Thousands of children's lives have been saved, as it is invaluable for breaking up colds, fevers, croup, congestions, etc.

With the Cabinet if desired, is a

in which the face, head and neck are given the same vapor treatment as the body, producing a bright, pure, brilliant complexion, removing pimples, blackheads, skin eruptions; cures catarrh, asthma and bronchitis.

O. C. Smith, Mt. Healthy, Ohio, says: "Since using this Cabinet my catarrh, asthma and hay fever, with which I have been afflicted since childhood, has not returned. Worth $1,000 to me. Have sold hundreds of these Cabinets. Everyone was delighted. My wife finds it excellent for her ills and our children."

Whatever Will Hasten Profuse Perspiration

everyone knows is beneficial, but other methods of resorting to stimulants and poisonous drugs are dangerous to health. Nature's own method is provided by the convenient, safe and marvelous power of this Quaker Cabinet.

We find it to be a genuine Cabinet, with a real door, opening wide. When closed it is air-tight; handsomely made of best durable goods, rubber lined. A heavy steel frame supports it, making it a strong and substantial bath-room within itself. Has the latest improvements.

A splendid stove for heating is furnished with each Cabinet, also medicine and vaporizing pan, valuable recipes and formulas for medicated baths and ailments, plain directions and a 100-page "Guide Book to Health and Beauty." Cabinet folds flat in 1 in. space when not in use. Easily carried. Weighs 10 lbs.

After investigation, we can say this Quaker Cabinet, made by the Cincinnati firm, is the only practical article of its kind. Will last for years. Seems to satisfy and delight every user, and the Makers Guarantee Results.

They assert positively, and their statements are backed by thousands of letters from persons of influence, that this Cabinet will cure nervous troubles, debility, purify the blood, beautify the skin, and cure rheumatism—(they offer $50.00 reward for a case not relieved.) Cures the most obstinate cases of women's ailments, lagrippe, sleeplessness, neuralgia, malaria, headaches, gout, sciatica, eczema, scrofula, piles, dropsy, blood and skin diseases, liver and kidney troubles. Reduces obesity.

It Will Cure a Hard Cold with one bath, and for breaking up symptoms of lagrippe, fevers, pneumonia, congestion, etc., it is invaluable—really a household necessity. Gives the most and even those enjoying the best of health should use it at least once or twice a week, for its great value lies in its marvelous power to draw out of the system impurities that cause disease, and it is truly proving a God-send to humanity.

How To Get One.

All our readers who want to enjoy perfect health, prevent disease or are afflicted, should have one of these remarkable Cabinets. Space prevents a detailed description, but it will bear out the most exacting demand for durability and curative properties.

Write the only makers, The World Mfg. Co., 177 World Building, Cincinnati, Ohio, and ask them to send you their valuable illustrated booklet, describing this invention and these remarkable baths. The price of these Cabinets has always been $5.00, but the makers offer to our readers for 60 days this Cabinet for $3.50 complete, or their $10.00 finest and best double-walled Cabinet for $6.10. Face and Head Steaming Attch. if desired, 65 cents extra, and it is indeed difficult to imagine where that amount of money could be invested in anything else that would bring so much good health, strength and vigor.

Don't Fail to Write Today for full information; or, better still, order a Cabinet; you won't be disappointed, as the makers guarantee every Cabinet, and agree to refund your money after thirty days' use if not just as represented.

We know them to do as they agree. They are reliable and responsible; capital $100,000.00.

The Cabinet is just as represented, and will be promptly shipped upon receipt of Money Order, Bank Draft, Certified Check or Registered Letter.

Don't fail to write at once for booklet, whether you intend to buy or not, for you will receive great benefit by doing so.

$150.00 A Month and Expenses.

This Cabinet is proving a wonderful seller. 20,000 were sold last month by agents, and the firm offers special inducements to both men and women upon request, and to our knowledge many are making from $100. to $150. per month and expenses. Don't fail to write them.

SEEK AND YE SHALL FIND.

In the Domain of the Occult World.

The New York World of December 1, has a page devoted to the experiences of the famous French dramatist Sardou, with Spiritualism. Similar to the like article of two weeks before, it betrays on the part of the paper and the person whom it quotes an unaccountable paucity of mystic experience.

For example, the manifestation which the famous Frenchman lays most stress upon consists in the delivery to him on his desk, as he sat alone writing, of a bouquet of roses, with a card attached bearing the name of a deceased lady friend. No living person, he affirms, could have delivered the flowers, which appeared to fall from the ceiling.

To one wholly unfamiliar with occult phenomena the receipt of a bunch of flowers under such circumstances must seem so marvelous as to be almost unbelieveable. Yet it can be duplicated right here in Stockton any night that any serious-minded person wishes to witness the experiment.

Within a fortnight this occurred in Stockton: A gentleman sitting in a circle of seven requested that a flower be brought in from a garden in the rear and handed to him. The request was made orally, in the midst of a protracted conversation carried on in that manner. An affirmative answer was given instantly, and a few seconds later a flower was delivered by an unseen hand (the room was dark) to each of the seven present. The hand was plainly felt by all except a lady, who received the flower in her hair. Some were chrysanthemums, some roses, and all were wet with a drizzling rain which at the time was falling. The room was small and every opening way closed and fastened.

The question therefore is, how were the flowers brought in from the garden? It was not a "put up job," as the uninformed are so quick to allege in cases like that, for the present writer is the person who asked, as a test, that a flower be produced and delivered to him.

In the similar experience of Sardou there were no witnesses present, and the value of the experiment rests on faith in the integrity of the man. In the Stockton instance seven persons were witnesses, at least three of whom are not professed Spiritualists.

In France the communications were all written. In Stockton they are always by word of mouth, the voice of the spirit being generally as clear and distinct as that of any of the living persons in the room. When a spirit joins in the singing (which frequently happens) his voice is distinctly heard above all the others.

These things are mentioned because they are considered to hold an interest for the general public. They ought at least to be as interesting to readers of the Mail as the great Sardou's experiences are to readers of the New York World.

Yet what has been related is but a fraction of what has been witnessed, under conditions which preclude the possibility of deception. In no instance was there a professional medium present. The best results were obtained with but three or four investigators in the room no one of whom possesses any mediumistic power that he is conscious of.

Under such circumstances solids have apparently been passed through other solids. That is to say, with every opening in the room closed and fastened, material objects have been instantaneously delivered from another apartment, and in one notable instance from another part of town.

Doubtless some readers will be surprised to find a subject of this character treated editorially in a daily newspaper. It is unusual, we confess, for the reason that most editors know nothing about it and would lack the courage to say anything if they did.

Yet we have a chair of Psychology in our State University, and these manifestations constitute the highest possible object lesson in that science. G. M. Stratton, a brother of the Collector of the Port of San Francisco, and a scholarly and elegant gentleman, is the professor. The state pays him $2,400 a year for service in the headship of a department maintained for the purpose, as its name implies, of conducting researches in this very realm.

Stanford University has a psychic department also, as have all the other universities in the country. The subject has also a rather voluminous and somewhat recondite literature.

Why, then, should not a newspaper take cognizance of it? Should it be shunned because it is not orthodox?

Who, if not the editor, shall have regard for the fact that what is heterodox to-day may be orthodox at some future time?

Our universities are too timid when it comes to this borderland of inquiry. They are afflicted with a conservatism which does not make for the advancement of knowledge. They are too conscious of the side of their bread upon which the butter is spread, too willing slavishly to conform to the Established, that they may not offend.

Stanford was invited some months ago, when the Stockton phenomena were at their height, to make an investigation, but second thought evidently persuaded the head of the institution that it would be dangerous ground to enter upon, being under the taboo of society.

Such is the humiliating tribute which Expediency compels dependent Learning to pay to comfortable Ignorance.

We shall expect some sprig of a recent graduate violently to combat these statements, but we notify him in advance that we shall not be averse to the conflict. Any person who will take the trouble to read the books of the professors (all of them instructive and many of them highly interesting) will be bound to reach the conclusion expressed above.

Why, on the very subject under consideration, one of them wrote a book which so antagonized the churches that he felt compelled to write another one designed to prove scientifically that man has an immortal soul.

That was the time he was "holding his job," as they say in politics.—The Mail, Stockton, Cal.

Lake Helen Camp, Florida.

There are many people in the North that will want to seek a warmer climate. Lake Helen is one of the healthiest locations in Florida. The camp is located on high, rolling pine land, with a clear, dry climate; no malaria here.

The camp is filling early this season. Mr. Eber Bond and wife are pleasantly settled in a cottage.

Mr. Clark is busy putting his house in order for parties from New York.

Mr. A. A. Butler, Mr. J. D. Palmer, Mr. Ira Hatch have enlarged the library building, also ceiled it, which is a great addition to the building.

There is a grocery store on the grounds. The building was presented to the association by Mr. S. Hodgkins. The gift was received with many thanks by the officers in behalf of the association.

Mr. White and wife are in their pleasant cottage.

Mr. and Mrs. J. D. Palmer, Mrs. Francis, Mrs. Dr. Brigham, Mr. and Mrs. Spencer are all settled in their homes on the camp grounds.

Mrs. J. Rodes Buchanan has purchased the Webster cottage; will have a winter home here.

Mr. and Mrs. Lee Morse, of Lily Dale, have charge of the dining-room. Their Thanksgiving and Christmas dinners were as fine as any that could be served, and received much praise.

Mrs. Mary Northrop and Mrs. Sage, of Lily Dale, have charge of the hotel. The guests will find them very pleasant ladies, and will be well cared for. Mrs. Northrop had charge of the hotel last year and made many friends by her kindly acts. She makes all of the guests feel at home.

Mrs. Elizabeth Thompson, of Lily Dale, has rooms in the Budington cottage.

Mrs. C. D. Greenamyer, Mrs. M. Estep, of Cincinnati, have rented Mrs. Emma J. Huff's cottage for the season.

Mrs. E. G. Keck, of Cincinnati, will arrive this week.

Miss Amanda Cole, of Michigan, has purchased the Sperry building, and fitted it up for a photograph gallery.

Mrs. Huff is visiting friends in Philadelphia and Washington. She will be with us later.

J. Clegg Wright expects to come the middle of this month. He will conduct his classes as usual. Subjects will be given when he comes.

Mr. and Mrs. Twing are expected this week.

Judge Underhill and son are at the Hotel Cassadaga. Judge Underhill is an old resident of Canton, Ohio.

Mr. Sweet, of Brooklyn, is at the hotel. His wife will join him in about ten days.

Mr. and Mrs. Bartholomew have rooms in the Apartment house.

There are several guests expected at the hotel in a few days.

The prospect is good for a successful camp. All are doing what they can to that end, with perfect harmony. The beautiful sunshine and clear, bright sky, with the song of the birds, the sighing of the wind through the pines, like the whispering of the angels. It must be a very unhappy soul that could not be happy here. All letters of inquiry should be sent here with stamp.

Religion in the Public Schools.

Every little while we read of some antediluvian fossil theologian, who is entirely misplaced in the environments of modern times and modern ideas, and wants to return to the methods of past ages.

Such an one is President Thwing, of Western Reserve University, according to reports of his address before the State Teachers' Association at Springfield recently. In his address he argued in favor of religious education in the public schools.

Of course, by "religious" he meant distinctively Christian, for it is not to be supposed for a moment that he would in any degree or manner favor the religion of Buddhism, or Zoroastrianism, or Babism, or any other religious ism than the Christian.

Furthermore, being a Protestant, he would not favor a distinctively Roman Catholic religion.

More than that, being of the evangelical orthodox type of Christian himself, he would object to a Jewish or a Unitarian type of religious education. Nor would he favor an education in simple Deism. It must, of course, to fulfill his notion of a religious education, partake of the orthodox type of religion.

How President Thwing can harmonize such religious education in the public schools, with the American principle of equal human rights, is a problem. But it would seem to be the idea of such as he, that non-orthodox and anti-orthodox people, such as Unitarians, Deists, Jews, Agnostics and so forth, have no rights in this matter which orthodox Christians are under moral obligation to respect. In their opinion the Jews and others named are all wrong, and so have no rights in the matter, that need be taken notice of at all. Orthodoxy is right, and ought to be taught in the schools, even though Jews, Unitarians, and skeptics of all kinds pay a large share of the taxes that support the public schools. That they are thus made to pay for a religious education directly opposed to their views, counts for naught in the estimation of such as Mr. Thwing.

Really this proposition of President Thwing argues a sad lack of correct ethical principle. It shows a mean disregard of the just claims and rights of others.

Progressive Spiritualism.

There is subject matter for earnest thought by Spiritualists, in the following suggestions by Hy. A. Copley, on Progressive Spiritualism:

I wish not to dwell on Spiritualism as it is, but as it will be—you may term it prophesy if you will, but to me there can be no true prophesy without present knowledge. By a close observation of passing events it is possible to foretell the future. Nature works by "means;" understand this and you will know past, present and future; for example, when you see a man, you by knowledge know that he was once a baby. Is not that in every case so? Yes. And thus it is with all nature's phenomena; everything, from raindrop to the largest ocean, has a beginning and an ultimatum. As this is so, am I trespassing too much on your senses when I assert that everything in the course of a man's life is of the same principle? The life a man leads is the outcome of his "means;" if he knew this, he would govern himself to a nicety, but, being ignorant, he goes with the tide, and often, in the end, gets taken out of his depth and is drowned.

The Spiritualism of the past and the present is barbarism to the Spiritualism of the future. Spiritualism of to-day is the sun dawning; it is the light showing up the viciousness and hollow rottenness of existing religious and political mockeries.

As an angel, with the gentleness of a dove and the wisdom of a serpent, it is commencing to use its influence on the "fallen"—and how are they receiving its teachings? Like the selfish boy who refuses to be taught. Although much kindness is shown to him, the kindness is accepted for selfish purposes, and he still goes his wayward course; then he receives the birch, by which he is persuaded to travel the right track. The world is a wilful boy; as he will not accept the responsibility of manhood; he will have to bear the birching, and by this means of paining the physical, the latent spiritual faculties will be awakened and brought into action. But as time progresses, the inert faculties of humanity will be awakened; then will the sun be blazing in all its glory. Even now there is a wave of universal advancement sweeping over Spiritualists; the new dispensation is now taking place. An inner meaning and development is discovered, and it wants but encouragement for it to unfold its beauties; the subtle spirit in mortal man is beginning to possess its body—not the body possessing the spirit, as it has been for the last few centuries. This spiritual awakening is beyond the conception of those who have not realized it; it is like the opening of a green bud, the magnificence of a variegated flower. It is not an haphazard attainment, for it comes from one source only—the living for it. As you cultivate a plant so does it become either a success or a miserable failure. To attain this inner consciousness you must live the life of goodness, and desire to possess it, and that desire must be ever present, whether in the home or in the workshop; for "what we think we are we gradually become."

Is not this inner realization worth having? Are you satisfied with being a straw gliding around the whirlpool to be eventually sucked under? No, I am sure you are not! Therefore brace yourself up and make the determination to be honest. Once this resolve is gained, then begin to sum up all your faults; let the virtues be—they will look after themselves—and judge yourself. Do not be lenient; put hard punishments for all faults. As you begin to judge, your sense of justice develops, and your "little tricks" become viewed under the heading of "crimes." It is truly wonderful to learn that we, who always considered ourselves honest and straightforward, are not so white as we thought we were. After this balancing, the big task commences. Take one punishment at a time (begin with the small ones first, for the wiping out of the lesser makes the way easier for the greater ones) and "work it out." It may take years to accomplish it, but in the end you stand a man "reborn;" for with the curbing down of the animal the spiritual becomes strong, until you realize the spirit and not the body, as now. The spirit, to the majority of the world's inhabitants, is a myth; but to the one "reborn" the body is a myth.

As we attain this state trouble and sorrow become unknown to us, for we are on the outer edge of the vortex that swallows up the generality of the humans, therefore experience not their unhappy feelings. Humanity in general follow their likings without a moment's consideration as to the happiness or sorrow to be derived from the gratification of their likings; they are like children playing with fire, and the wisdom comes with the burning; and even one such experience is not sufficient for the majority; hence they burn themselves till they are one mass of wounds and scars.

The way to live is to do your duty and never mind what your neighbors do. You are not responsible to them, but to yourself; everyone is a law unto himself, hence he must understand that law for himself; no one can teach him it. The sooner one begins to study himself, the sooner will he realize the sinner, and with the awakening comes contentment; and what is better than contentment? Contentment brings knowledge; and with knowledge all pain and sorrow ceases.

The spiritual man could no more steal than a horse can jump over the moon; he is honest because he cannot be otherwise; he is kind because he cannot be cruel; he works because he works for work's sake.

What a grand world this will be when Spiritualists attain this state of their evolution! Is it not the millennium? Many think it a "castle in the air." It is! But the foundation is already under the castle, and the cement is nearly set that will bind the structure forever.

The Pope and the Bible.

The announcement [as set forth in the New York Sun] that the Pope has appointed a special Pontifical Commission to "consider all questions connected with Biblical studies" is of great significance at this time of complete revolution in the Protestant world, so far as concerns its attitude toward the Bible, the sole source from which Protestantism derives its religious authority.

This Vatican commission, we are told, is to afford "Catholic scholars all over the world the fullest opportunity of stating their views and difficulties and bringing them to the direct notice of the Holy See." The Pope having already championed the absolute verity and supernatural inspiration of the Bible as the Word of God, such difficulties submitted will be explained away, of course, in harmony with that positive and uncompromising Catholic decision. That is, the purpose of the commission is not to stimulate criticism of the Bible after the fashion now so general in Protestantism, but to silence it and oppose to it the final Pontifical judgment. The appointment of the commission, however, seems to suggest that this new criticism has brought "difficulties" to Catholic scholars, as it has also to the great body of Protestant scholars, if not to them universally, and that the Pope feels impelled to remove the stumbling blocks.

Undoubtedly, if Christian theology is to stand at all, belief in the Bible as supernatural inspiration must continue. Even for Catholics belief in the miraculous authority of the canonical Scriptures is essential, for if it is destroyed the authority of tradition also will be involved in the destruction. The assault is on all miracles, all supernaturalism. The present critical method applies to the miracles a scientific test, or a purely natural test, which, necessarily, discards the supernatural as scientifically undemonstrable.

The resolution of doubts of supernatural Biblical authority, however, is essential for Protestantism rather than for Catholicism. The position of the Church of Rome on that subject is determined already and is irreversible; but in Protestantism, though it has no other foundation than belief in the Bible as absolute and Divine truth, as "the Holy Spirit speaking in the Scripture," to use the words of the Westminster Confession, there has been of recent years a very complete rejection of that belief. A school of criticism has arisen which practically reduces the Bible to a human authorship no more inspired than were Shakspeare, Dante and Goethe, and its seat is in the foremost theological seminaries. That is, it is inside of the Church, and thus wields the profoundest influence in undermining Christian faith.

At this time a Presbyterian commission is engaged in an attempt to revise the Westminster Confession in response to a demand which had its origin in the skepticism induced by the scholarly criticism of the Bible called the "higher." Of course, the effort will be vain, for the General Assembly in appointing the commission timidly avoided the essence of the question in controversy, or the authority of the Bible, whether it is Divine or human. But that pivotal question will yet have to be met by Protestantism as squarely as it has been met by the Pope. Mere verbal changes in creeds built wholly on the theory of the inspired and inerrant authority of the Bible, are child's play at a time when religious thought has been revolutionized by destructive criticism of the validity of that authority by Protestant theologians and scholars of world-wide repute, men whose teachings are not repudiated, and anathematized by their churches, but who are suffered to remain in the ministry without reproach.

It is not the Pope, then, but the great churches of Protestantism, which need to appoint a commission, or commissions, "for the consideration of all questions connected with Biblical studies." The time is coming, if, indeed, it has not come already, when these churches must take their stand definitely and decidedly on the question whether the Bible is of God or only of man. As it is now, the Pope is the sole bold, positive and uncompromising champion of the Bible as the word of God.

The Greedy Old Octopus.

Washington, D. C.—Cardinal Gibbons, Archbishops Ryan, of Philadelphia, and Keane, of Dubuque; the Rev. Father Ketcham, of the Catholic Indian Bureau of this city, and Dr. Dyer, of New York, composing the Hierarchical Committee on Catholic Indian and Negro Schools, met at the Catholic University.

The most important business was the Catholic Indian school fund question. Father Ketcham reported that information from all parts of the country justified him in saying that, with proper efforts put forth, an appropriation for the Catholic Indian schools could be obtained from the incoming Congress.

After careful investigation the committee decided at once to organize a movement throughout the United States for the purpose of securing from the next Congress the funds desired.—New York World.

The greedy old octopus is reaching out its slimy tentacles to secure a big donation from the United States treasury. Not content with the millions extracted from the none too well filled pockets of its millions of ignorant, superstitious, miseducated and misled communicants, it still pursues its hereditary policy of robbing the overtaxed public of money's paid into the Government's treasury for civil purposes, and using the same to build up the Romish Church—the worst and most dangerous enemy of our free institutions.

It is to be hoped that there will be virtue enough in our nation's legislators to thwart the insidious nefarious designs of these Romish prelates to use the money of the people for purposes of Romish propaganda, which is what the movement means.

GIRL SINGS WHILE DYING.

WITH BETROTHED AND FAMILY AT BEDSIDE, JULIA STEELMAN, 20 YEARS OLD, ASKS FOR MUSIC THAT IS NOT SAD—TALKS OF DEATH CALMLY, AND CRYING OUT THAT SHE SAW A BEAUTIFUL RADIANCE AND HER FATHER WELCOMING HER, SHE PASSED AWAY.

The following clipping from the Chicago Tribune of December 30, 1901, deserves a place on the pages of history, especially when taken in connection with all the attendant circumstances:

Surrounded by her betrothed and the members of her family, Julia Steelman lingered for five hours between life and death early yesterday morning in a flat at 749 Wells street, where she conversed with those about her and urged them to sing songs that were not sad.

Before she breathed her last she exacted a promise from them all that they would not weep for her, and, crying out that she saw a beautiful radiance and that her father was welcoming her, she passed away.

She was engaged to Benjamin B. Moore, who fought on the battleship Oregon at Santiago. The dying girl had this in mind, and called out:

"Let us sing something patriotic for Ben. Sing the 'Star Spangled Banner.'"

The weakness of her last illness had left her, and she seemed possessed of sudden strength. She raised her head and shoulders a trifle and led in the singing, which the others tried to follow with voices choked with emotion.

MOTHER TELLS SAD STORY.

"I have seen many people die," said Mrs. Julia Nichols, the girl's mother, last evening, "but I never saw a death like Julia's. From 11 o'clock until 4 she was dying, and all the time she knew that her end was approaching. She had been wasted and worn by illness, but this fell from her, and she seemed to be possessed of health and strength. We were all around her bedside—Dr. W. T. Nichols, my husband; Ben Moore, Stewart and Hosea Steelman, her brothers, and myself. She knew us all perfectly well, and said she was perfectly happy and willing to die.

"'I only regret leaving Ben,' she said, 'but I know I will not lose him.'

SING "GRANDFATHER'S CLOCK."

"She led in the singing and picked out the songs. 'Home, Sweet Home' and 'Grandfather's Clock' were among them. She said the latter just suited her case.

"Toward morning the end neared and she remarked that her sight was failing and she spoke with difficulty. She saw this was a sign of the end and told us she could just see the outline of our faces. Then this grew dim and she had us move about to see if she could distinguish us. When her eyes grew dim she had us come near so she could feel of our faces and she remarked that one of her brothers had a rough beard.

SEES BEAUTIFUL RADIANCE.

"Just before the last she asked us if we saw anything peculiar about her eyes.

"'I see the most beautiful radiance,' she said, 'more beautiful than I can tell. O, mamma, here's papa. He has come for me.' These were her last words."

Miss Steelman was 20 years old, and lived for some time in North Evanston, where she had many friends. Last April she had an attack of the grip, which resulted in nervous dyspepsia, and this ended in a complication of diseases which caused her death. She had been seriously ill for four months.

The funeral will be held at 3 o'clock to-day, and the remains will be taken to Cincinnati for burial. Hosea Steelman, her grandfather, was one of the pioneers of Cincinnati. Miss Steelman was a daughter of Edgar Steelman, who died ten years ago.

The guides of Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond officiated at the above named funeral, and it truly seemed more like a beautiful and solemn festival than a sad and mournful occasion; for although the friends—especially the affianced—of the young girl felt the mortal parting keenly, there was such triumph in the passing on of her lovely spirit, and the sermon was so replete with the knowledge of things usually unseen, that the occasion seemed a part and portion of the kingdom of heaven on earth, in which all participated who were permitted to be present.

Too much cannot be said in praise of the rare qualities of this young girl, so early called to the higher life. Reared a Spiritualist, all her immediate companions were members of the Epworth League and other orthodox beliefs; still her life was pervaded by her knowledge of Spiritualism, and she absorbed all of its highest teachings.

Her passing on must be noted, for such experiences, as the guides of Mrs. Richmond truly said, form a chain of complete evidence of a future life.

The skeptic and scoffer would find it impossible to explain away these open revealments of a higher world.

The friends and companions of Miss Steelman were wont to call her "Jewel"—instead of Julia—so fully did they appreciate the rare spirit that had her form for its tenement. She was the light and life of the circle in which she moved.

The mother and step-father are Spiritualists. The young brother and lover cannot doubt the beautiful life into which she has entered.

Her transition most beautifully illustrated the closing stanza of one of Mrs. Richmond's choicest poems:

"O Beautiful White Mother Death;
We spring to thine arms unafraid;
One with thee are our glad spirits made
We are born when we drink thy cool breath—
O Mother of Life, Lovely Death."

The Bangs Sisters Deline.

The Bangs Sisters decline to accept Mr. Mangasarian's challenge, for the following reasons:

1. Because we deem it beneath the dignity of a lady, and below the plane of a spiritual medium to offer or accept a bet.

2. Our mediumship does not need any test of this kind to establish its genuineness and power. We are convincing bright, intelligent people every day of this, who have volunteered their written statements, that can been seen any time at our home, nor does our personal integrity require any such method of vindication; nor would our success in winning this bet prove that we are true instruments of the angel world, or have any influence in establishing our claim to be truthful and honorable women.

3. We do not believe that to convert Mr. Mangasarian to belief in spirit phenomena would be any greater triumph for our cause than to convert the humblest member of his congregation.

Odd Discovery in Yukon.

An Ottawa correspondent writes intelligence has been received from the Yukon of a strange discovery that the language of the Nulato Indians who live within the Arctic circle and that of the Apaches of New Mexico and Arizona are the same. The facts have come to light through the return to Dawson City of Father John Rene, prefect apostolic of the Roman Catholic church in Alaska, from a journey to the fathers working among the aboriginal tribes of the lower Yukon.

If this report shall be confirmed it will make real the speculation that the cliff dwellers were anciently some way connected with the people of Asia.

For President of the Iowa State Association of Spiritualists.

The Iowa State Association of Spiritualists meet in convention in Oskaloosa, January 16 to 20. The work in Iowa depends upon a president who will be active and can address an audience—one well-known for zeal and ability. Such a person is the earnest secretary of the past year, who has been efficient, and is the secretary also of Clinton Camp—beloved by all who know her—Mrs. Stella A. Fisk, of Keokuk.

Many friends of the cause in Iowa are anxious to see her elected, and have urged the writer to make this appeal in her behalf.

Extraordinary Story of the Utica Mine.

This is an extraordinary story in more ways than one. Extraordinary as a spiritual fact, and yet more, because of its appearance as a leader in Everybody's Magazine for November, which is published by John Wanamaker, the exceedingly orthodox Sunday-school teacher. It is written by Bailey Millard, and there is not a doubt cast in the article on the spiritual revelations which led to the wonderful development of the mine. It is said that the "Utica Mine" is the greatest gold mine on the Pacific Coast; one of the wonders of wonderful California. It is a place of potent fascination to the traveler, and it well repays a student of mining to make careful observations of the methods preserved in taking out and treating the quartz. In fact a "gold mining kindergarten" has been established in connection with the mining operations.

To fully present the spiritual part, a brief history of the mine must be given. It was first staked by John Selkirk, who single-handed worked with pick and shovel until his capital was gone, and although he had great faith in the enterprise, the rock was so hard, and the difficulties so great, he at last sold out for fifty dollars, or as he said enough to get him home, for he was sick of the country and of mining. Had he been possessed of capital he would have soon ranked with the millionaires of the Golden State. But those who bought it of him did not learn its great value, and although they took out a good deal of gold, they on the whole lost, and at last abandoned the mine.

James G. Fair soon after came into the mining camp, in search of something valuable in mines. He was then young and had not entered on his remarkable career. He saw the abandoned shaft, examined it and soon began to work it on a larger scale. He received large returns, but the difficulties he met with, of flinty rock, perpendicular, and treacherous places, were disheartening, and when he took up the Comstock ledge, he abandoned it entirely. The mills and shaft went to ruins, and no one cared to take up an enterprise the sagacious Jim Fair had abandoned.

In 1880 Charles Lane bought it for $10,000, and his friends solemnly assured each other that he had gone crazy. But he had a knowledge they knew not of. He had taken a piece of quartz from the shaft and consulted Mrs. Robinson, a medium, and she or the spirits told him, "That is your fortune. There is not any doubt about it. Stick to that mine and you will be a millionaire."

He was not convinced and secretly sent quartz specimens to the medium by different persons. In every case the spirits declared the mine to be rich and so Lane finally set himself about to raise the money to buy the Utica."

But he was not to have a royal road to wealth. The same difficulties that had discouraged others met him, and as he proceeded, increased. For years he worked on, taking out a good deal of gold, but at a cost that ate up his capital and even exhausted his credit. At this critical moment Alvinza Haywood, a shrewd old-timer came to visit the mine. Lane wanted to sell a part of the mine, but could get nothing definite from the reticent prospector. He took away a specimen with him. He did not even seem to hear what Lane said about what the spirits had revealed, that there was a great quantity of gold there. After a time he came back with a partner, and after the three had contracted to go on, each having a third, and then he said, "My medium told me just what yours did about the rock!"

"I knew she did," said Lane. "You wouldn't have come in if she hadn't. It's a big thing. Now we'll go to work in earnest."

Of the uses of the fabulous sums taken from the Utica, it is said:

Haywood, under the advise of spirits has invested in various other mines, nearly all of which have been productive. He bought large acres of land in California, buildings and lots. He owns one of the tallest skycrapers in San Francisco, a great store and office building, erected at the behest of his spirit guides.

It is difficult to differentiate between Lane and Haywood when it comes to their belief in spirits. Undoubtedly it is the truth to say they are both devout believers. To them the occult, as a governing force, is as important as the rise and fall of the markets and as real. It enters into all their daily calculations. They are both reverent believers in Spiritualism, and the arguments for their faith, which they will sometimes advance to their friends, are many and often convincing.

As for Lane's use of the gold he so long and gallantly struggled for, it is said:

Utica gold under spiritual guidance, was directed to La Fontana Mine, in Arizona. This is one of the great bonanzas of the Pacific Coast, and from its veins were taken the largest pockets of high-grade ore ever dug from the depths of any American mine. Mr. Lane has put more money into Alaskan mining enterprises than any other man in the world. He has sailed ships to Nome, freighted with all manner of mining-camp supplies. He has built stores and warehouses and piled up mountains of coal on the Arctic beach where fuel was not, and carried much lumber there. He built and equipped the northernmost railroad in the world, that from Nome to Anvil City.

This startling article concludes:

"The spirits did it all? Who shall say? Happy spirits if they can so control the fortunes of mortals! And happy mortals if they can get for guides such benign, far-seeing spirits!"

From first to last there is not a doubt cast by the writer of this article on the veracity of the communications, or their genuineness. They are given as would have been the decisions of experts, yet it may be questioned if any earthly authority could have excelled or equalled that of the spirit guides.

The advice of these guides shows that they are of the earthly and selfish order. Not one of their schemes is for charity, or spiritual improvement. All their advice is for the accumulation of more millions. They are as insatiate as the puppets who do their bidding on this side. Lane and Haywood with untold millions and mines pouring a steady stream of gold into their coffers, are not advised by these spirits to distribute a dollar for the cause of Spiritualism, but to invest in transportation lines; railroads in the Arctic circle, and mines which will bring other millions. What for? For the simple purpose of accumulation.

The Jesuit Missionary.

"He who tells nothing exceeding the bounds of probability has a right to demand that they should believe him who cannot contradict him." So wrote Samuel Johnson something less than two hundred years ago, in his preface to an English translation of "A Voyage to Abyssinia by Father Jerome Lobo."

The Father, a Portuguese, was sent out by the Jesuits, of which he was one, to establish the faith in that borderland of Eastern Africa. It was in 1622. What did he find? Let Father Lobo tell:

"No country in the world is so full of churches, monasteries, and ecclesiastics as Abyssinia; it is not possible to sing in one church or monastery without being heard by another, and perhaps by several. They sing the psalms of David, of which, as well as the other parts of the Holy Scriptures, they have a very exact translation in their own language; in which, though accounted canonical, the books of the Maccabees are omitted. The instruments of music made use of in their rites of worship are little drums, which they hang about their necks, and beat with both hands; these are carried even by their chief men, and by the gravest of their ecclesiastics. They have sticks likewise, with which they strike the ground, accompanying the blow with a motion of their whole bodies. They begin their concert by stamping on the ground, and playing gently on their instruments; but when they have heated themselves by degrees, they leave off drumming, and fall to leaping, dancing, and clapping their hands, at the same time straining their voices to the utmost pitch, till at length they have no regard either to the tune or the pauses, and seem rather a riotous than a religious assembly. * * * They are possessed with a strange notion that they are the only true Christians in the world; as for us, they shunned us as heretics, and were under the greatest surprise at hearing us mention the Virgin Mary with the respect which is due to her, and told us we could not be entirely barbarians since we are acquainted with the mother of God."

Whether these people were clad in the costume of David when he "leaped and danced before the Lord with all his might," on the occasion of that functionary being returned from his captivity among the Philistines, because of his quarrelsome and bloodthirsty habits, Father Lobo did not inform us. See I. Samuel 5 and 6; and II. Samuel 6. The music which the Christian Abyssinians used to edify the Lord is the kind the American Indians employ in their war dances; but the latter, not worshiping the "Mother of God," would not be accepted by the Catholic Father as genuine Christians, though every tree was a church and every rock a monastery.

The Jesuit Fathers were industrious and energetic workers to extend the faith. Organized for the express purpose of resisting the encroachments of Protestants on Catholicism, missionaries bearing the crucifix were sent to every clime. They invaded America, and traversed its deep and tangled forests, wading rivers and climbing mountains, to indoctrinate the Indians; Africa was overrun by these adventurers; the slave trader with rum, and manacles, and disregard of human life, following in his trail; even far-off Cathay and Japan were visited by them, and in all places they pretended to find evidences that the early apostles had been in advance of them and established Christianity; but later generations had departed somewhat from the true faith, and it was to revive the latter they made their present visit.

These Jesuits only copied Paul, who, on Mars Hill, instead of proclaiming new Gods to the people, proposed to enlighten them on the "Unknown God" they already worshiped. This was an ingenious device to undermine the prevailing religion, without seeming to controvert that already established.

Appreciative Words From New Mexico

To the Editor:—The inclosed will renew my subscription to The Progressive Thinker, and I hope it will arrive in time to save me the loss of a single copy. A week without The Progressive Thinker would be a week of famine. I cannot too strongly express my appreciation of your truly wonderful paper, and it seems incredible to me that any true Spiritualist, or even others of any progressive trend of thought, should deny themselves such a boon as the weekly visit of The Progressive Thinker. I would that my opinion and appreciation could be made a contagion so virulent as to add one hundred thousand new and permanent subscribers! Across the space of thousands of miles I give your hand a cordial shake, and say with as much fervor as could a member of the "Godless and Devilless Club," "God" speed your good work. May peace and prosperity abide with you throughout the new year is the sincere wish of yours fraternally,

Is there a War of Races? Is Mr. Roosevelt Right?

The View of a Spirit

An Address through Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond.

Of course the mere social act of a private invitation to dinner by the President does not concern you nor us, but the expression that has resulted from a social act of this nature causes an inquiry.

When the war of the Rebellion against the Union closed in favor of the Union, it was found that the nation had taken a great stride: Slavery having been the primal cause of the war, the condition of the nation with reference to slavery had changed. First, by the change of the slave from slavery to a peculiar and anomalous condition, neither bond nor free; then by the enactment of such laws, under the Constitution of the United States, as not only made him free, but made the colored race citizens of the United States.

You know what it is to be a citizen, you understand all the privileges that it conveys. While there is carried with this no compulsory social recognition, the fact of citizenship remains, and has remained, undeniably, the endowment of the colored people, who as a race were in this country by no act of their own, who were enslaved by no act of their own, who, as a race, were set free as a matter of political economy during and following the war of the Rebellion; who, as a race, have committed no offence against the laws of the land, in their accession to citizenship, nor against the society in which they move. In other words, not only while they were slaves were these people patient, long suffering, enduring, religious and hopeful, but during the war there were no overt acts, no insurrections. They did not avail themselves of the disturbed conditions to enforce their way to freedom or to take revenge upon their previous masters. They waited with the eye of prophecy and faith the outcome of the war. With the same eye of faith they fully believed that their freedom would come. What that freedom meant, perhaps they had little idea. And who, belonging to any race or any people, has any adequate idea of what it means? Very few of the ordinary citizens have any conception of the freedom your Constitution confers in this country.

Surely these people may not have had an adequate idea, but they had an idea that they wished for freedom; that they could wait for it, pray for it. That it was not something to be gained by violence; that when it came it would bring with it great responsibility.

Your present speaker was in New Orleans the first time the colored people of New Orleans cast their votes. It was in the midst of an epidemic of the yellow fever, everybody was in a panic, almost. But these people assembled at their places of worship, in which they asked the blessing of God upon them, that they might vote intelligently and righteously, and then they repaired to the polls. Surely a very inferior and benighted race could not have acted thus. Theirs was a much more suitable place of assemblage before casting the ballot, exercising the highest privilege of American citizenship, than the corner grogshop, the favorite place of assembling of the usual body-politic.

We believe it is now going on four decades since that time. We have seen gray-haired colored men sitting by the lamplight studying out the letters of the alphabet that they might read the Constitution under which they were made free. We have seen those who were formerly slaves take possession of small tracts of lands to earn their own livelihood by the cultivation of that land, until driven away by mob violence of the not yet reconstructed rebels of the South. We have seen them attempt to take possession of farms under the homestead entry act, under the laws enacted by Congress, and we have also seen them driven away from those claims in the same way. At last better counsels seemed to prevail. As they could not be wiped out, they must needs enter into the possession of their inheritance as the result of the war.

We have seen schools, churches and universities spring up. From the Howard University in Washington alone hundreds and thousands of graduates have gone out peopling this country with as intelligent a population, as well-educated a population as you will find anywhere.

What are you to do with these people who grow up in your midst, who are married under your laws, who bear forward a population to the United States? They are citizens. This prejudice in the South certainly does not come because of color or race; for the most intimate relations as master and servant could exist. The maid who attended upon her mistress, the man who attended upon his master, could sit in the same room, could occupy the same carriage, could enter into close proximity to her or him and there was no offense. But if he or she occupies the same carriage as a man or woman, is it more of an offense than as a slave? If he or she appears in the same place as the master or mistress, as an equal, it is a very great offense? It cannot be because they are offensive personally. There was, during the existence of slavery, more personal contact by the whites of the South with the slaves, from the very necessities of the service rendered, and even more than was necessary. Since the colored people were freed, for the most part, they have preferred to keep by themselves; they have preferred their own society.

But there is no reason for this exclusion in the southern mind. It simply comes from race prejudice carrying out the idea of the former condition of servitude. It is because not yet has the desire been conquered to dominate the race. It is because of this servitude that the children's children of the former slaveholders now wish to exclude the colored man from his rights of citizenship. It is because of this that the great hue and cry has gone up against the President from the South, and no other reason.

We honor any man who has the intelligence to follow his own convictions if they do not conflict with the laws of the land or the rights of any other citizen. We honor Mr. Roosevelt at the present time for emphasizing the fact that our colored fellow-citizens are citizens. All things being equal, that race has just as great a privilege in the White House as you. It cannot be otherwise—socially, if the President elects. It is not even a question of policy; he is bound to receive any citizen who goes there well behaved, and with nothing objectionable in his demeanor, as you are bound to admit any one at this door who is well behaved.

Color does not determine the man, as you well know. In every court of Europe all such people are received—no matter of what nationality—as are qualified socially and in behavior, to appear there. The inhabitants of India, the inhabitants of China, of Japan, of Cuba, citizens of Santo Domingo and Porto Rico, who are of various shades of color, are received here. Who is it that has made this distinction with reference to the colored people of the United States? Simply the former slave-holders, or their descendants; those who were benefited by the result of slave labor.

But slavery has left no such trace upon the colored race as it has upon the white people. Slavery, as has been said by the great ethical teachers of anti-slavery, was of greater harm to the slave holders than to the slaves. The wrong and injustice done to the colored race was not so injurious; but the injury was to the man who could hold slaves. It takes years, perhaps centuries, to wipe out from any race or people the results of dominating and enthralling another race.

The Romans did not succeed in outgrowing their love of conquest and holding those in slavery whom they conquered, and the very foundation of the Roman Empire perished because of this. Any race or people that has in its veins or disposition the desire to dominate or rule its fellow beings, to hold as chattels or in servitude other human beings, requires generations to outgrow this love of power.

The fact that the colored man observes the laws of citizenship, that he understands the laws of ethics, and obeys them; that he studies in the colleges the same books and passes through a similar ordeal of scholarship, must make manifest to the most turbid mind that there is no spiritual, intellectual or moral difference between the races. Indeed! considering the generations of servitude, it is quite remarkable that this race has sprung so intelligently into its citizenship, into the acceptance of the system of life and of happiness that are offered under your Constitution, as readily as it has; the intellectual adaptation and ready taking up of the various lines of occupation. But of course in the South where the natural climate of the colored man is, there is this racial hatred. Politicians of both parties are responsible for very much of it; for, of course, whichever party is dominating the other lays it to the "slave (negro) vote,' and is against the voting of the colored man in that state.

No longer is it a question of the "slave" vote; the colored man has a perfect right to the exercise of his freedom of ballot. If he is not trained to exercise it as the white man wishes him to in the South, that certainly is no ground of complaint against him. It is the free exercise of the vote that is desired. Where the colored people are in the majority they certainly should rule, because the majority rules in this country. It is undemocratic and alien to disfranchise any race or class of people because its vote preponderates. There is no educational qualification in this country. If there was, what would become of your party politics in your crowded cities? If there were qualifications higher than that—of ethics, what would become of politics? There would be none.

Let us once for all state that this attempt to revive or in any way return to the dark ages by ostracism, persecution or any of the methods that are prevalent in the South, is such a step into the shadow as would totally eclipse all the light of this Republic.

It was wicked enough that slavery should have existed as long as it did. It was fearful enough, the cost at which it was set aside. After all it would seem that the nation had atoned for this great wrong in that war, wherein the flower of both the North and the South perished. It was enough that family was divided against family, father against son, brother against brother. But to-day, with the great issue ended, with all things moving in accord as far as the two sections of the country are concerned, that this feeling should flame up, that in certain states there should be invidious legislation, that the President of the United States should be blamed for fulfilling the spirit as well as the letter of the law, is incredible! Why, you are hunting out people whom you think do not believe in the laws of the land, of this land! You have been trying to ferret out those who you think are opposed to the spirit and the letter of the Constitution of the United States. But what is that large army of politicians and people in the South, and sometimes in the North that decry the letter and the spirit of this law concerning the colored race? There is no such distinction that has been stamped upon the human family. You may go out into the streets of any crowded city, notably the older cities, London and New York, and you will find faces white in complexion upon which the stamp of irredeemable vice and crime is set. That stamp cannot be obliterated excepting by spiritual and social growth. That stamp cannot by any possibility be taken away except by complete revolution from within.

If a "fair Cuban" is in peril and some one rescues her, the whole world is thrilled with the romance, and society in Washington and elsewhere is vieing each with the other to do her homage. If a quadroon or octoroon, not darker in color than the fair Cuban, should pass through similar experiences there would be no such attempt to do her honor. The Cuban may be received in the co-educational institutions of the North; the colored girl is not. The Cuban can be received into society. One having veins of American negro blood is ostracised.

In New England the social victory and wealth of those leading in the affairs of the world was largely made in the beginning on the labor of the progenitors of this race, but the cutting bonds of slavery cling to them still. Though it was the wrong of the nation and the wrong of the people, you make them responsible for your wrong.

No slave-holder ever claimed that his slave could not kneel in prayer and pray to the same God to whom he prayed; no slave-holder ever claimed that there was a separate door to the kingdom of heaven through which the colored race must pass. No one who preserves the prejudice against this race ever claimed that their religion was not just as white as the religion of the white man. It is simply a foolish adhering to a foolish prejudice.

Now understand us, we are not regulating your lives; we are not trying to determine what those Southern people shall do in their homes, or what you shall do in yours, but we are simply saying that the spirit and letter of the Constitution gives to every citizen that is well behaved and obeys the laws, the same privileges that are given to every other citizen, and that complexion has nothing to do with it.

Whatever may be the way in which the racial question shall solve itself, irrespective of this incident we do not at the present time declare. Certainly the negro race has entered into, accepted and mingled with your civilization, adapted itself to the customs of society and gone forward in a way that is really remarkable, and the race itself is on the increase under added opportunities and advanced circumstances.

You never offered such conditions to the red man. Perhaps he would not have survived it. Still there is every reason to believe that had your civilization included the red man instead of making him an alien, had schools, colleges, farms, the various methods of self support and improvement been offered him, they would have been accepted and there would have entered into your civilization a valuable, independent, natural element.

You must remember that the Anglo-Saxon race is not a separate race here. The Latin and various races of Southern Europe and Asia have entered into its composition. The American people are most cosmopolitan, are composed of the greatest number of races. Your southern and southwestern frontier has furnished a large amount of Spanish, Indian and French and colored blood to your nation. A large proportion of the colored population of New Orleans were never enslaved. Alexander Dumas was related to Major Dumas in New Orleans, of whom there was nothing in his race to prevent his receiving as a commander of a volunteer regiment one of the highest positions in the army. All these things in the course of a few decades wipe out these former distinctions.

A lady living close to the Howard University in Washington, said: "Why, these are the best behaved college students I ever saw. There is no 'hazing,' no outrageous action one against the other, none of that spirit of marauding that is too common among the colleges and universities of the white men. The students of other colleges could take lessons in good behavior from the students of the Howard University in Washington." What constitutes a good citizen? Obedience to the laws, social and legal, under which one lives. There is scarcely any kind of outrage against society and the laws of the land that has not been perpetrated, at one time or another, by the students of the universities and colleges, that send out, perhaps, some of the best intellects in the country.

Nevertheless, through periods of upheavals all the nations of the earth are growing nearer and nearer together.

Even the Mongolian is being included in the possible future. The numerous Mongolian, what will be done with him? No one knows. But the twentieth century, perhaps, is to grapple with even that difficult problem.

Young Japan is rearing her head in the East. We said a few Sundays ago that Japan is the guardian angel of the future Oriental empire. It will include China, and possibly India. All those people will find out at last that their interests are in common, and they will hold themselves as one against the aggressiveness of these western empires of the world.

Shall we set an example of ignorance in our own nation against all this onward march of fraternity? Shall we ostracise a race while we are claiming to clasp hands with the most distant people. Why, if Aguinaldo himself admits our laws, he is accepted, and no doubt would be courted and feted, under suitable circumstances.

Let us remember that in our hour of national darkness these people aided us to the light. Let us also remember that, taking humanity as it stands, there is less crime, less violation of the law among them than any other race in our midst. Let us note that the percentage of criminals in our prisons, in our police courts, is notably less of this race than any of those races that have lately come to be a portion of our body politic, of our social life. Let us also remember that the thinking, reasoning people of the earth will not commend us if we refuse to extend our hand of approbation to the President, who perhaps means to execute the laws as they stand. It would be refreshing if this could be done once. We recollect when Mr. Roosevelt was in an official position in New York there were laws against gambling and vice; he enforced those laws. It was not, perhaps, intended that the laws should be carried out. Would it not be refreshing if some such thing should occur in national politics? If real citizenship would be recognized in this unofficial way, and the unlawful uprising of the past few months against this race should be suppressed; if there should be a real tidal wave of reform, a return to the spirit and the letter of the Constitution. How would it be if the laws against trusts and monopolies were carried out? If those wishing to be endowed with franchises in the interest of great corporations would not be listened to in the White House?

Some such thing is to happen sometime. The words spoken by the late President in the day and the hour when he felt that he owed nothing to those who had befriended him, that his debts had been paid, that his promises had been fulfilled, that as a man he could stand free and unfettered before his people, the words that he spoke at the Pan-American Exposition, illustrate what he was ready to stand for. Was it because the people were not ready for his high policy, that he should be taken thus violently away? International arbitration instead of war; fraternity and reciprocity in commerce instead of competition and retaliation; friendliness in all the affairs of nations. It would seem that one was getting ready for the immortal world when one could blossom out, under the influences of the day and the hour, to make such promises.

May it not be that after the baptism of sorrow through which the nation has passed, that it will turn to suppressing those in high places who have dominated and have persistently violated the spirit and the letter of the Constitution. Possibly there will be a larger advancement toward reciprocity in commerce, and arbitration in all international difficulties and the unification of all the nations.

Sometimes unexpectedly these things occur. Perhaps the reception of Mr. Washington at the White House, almost the first social act of the new President, means that he will stand for whatever the Constitution implies and reads; that no political aspirants, no preponderating monetary or banking power, no pressure of an outside force will influence him against those convictions. Let us unite in the hope that, having been chastened, as by fire, having been purified, as by flame, this people may rise above their self-seeking, may understand the great issues and needs of the hour, may unite as a whole people that no appeal to race prejudice, no fictitious or assumed horror over that which is not believed in shall come; but that each and all shall believe in fraternity, in the height to which a race or a nation may attain, under the greatest and best influences. Looking forward to the time that by and by all schools, universities, places and positions shall be open to all regardless of race, or sex, or color, or "previous condition of servitude." That only criminals, outlaws, imbeciles and minors shall be disfranchised or robbed of any of the rights of following the dictates of conscience and the enjoyment of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness.

Remarks Made by the President of the Godless and Devilless Club, at Its Last Regular Meeting:

There is "peace on earth and good will toward men" in all heathen countries on Christmas.

The only peoples at war are the so-called Christians, and the only nations wherein good will is not outwardly manifest are those that have erected temples to the Christ who said, "Love your enemies."

When Jesus of Nazareth told his disciples to love their enemies, he referred specifically to the Romans and to the people of his own race, who were persecuting the new doctrine as a heresy.

He did not mean that his followers should love one another, for he took it for granted that love was already in their hearts, and that if they sincerely believed in him, hatred would be impossible.

If the man Christ, intensely human throughout, and only measurably wise, should come to-day, he would not only adjure Christians to love their enemies, but he would tell them to love one another.

If the man Christ were to come to-day, he would find the British Christian at war with the Boer Christian; he would find the American Christian at war with the Filipino Christian; and he would find the Christians of Venezuela at war with the Christians of Venezuela, the Christians of Colombia at war with other Christians of Colombia, and the Christians of Chile and Argentina on the verge of war with each other.

He would find the Christians of Germany eager for war with the Christians of Venezuela, and only deterred from war with the Christians of the United States by the fear that the Christians of the United States might be able to invoke more power than the German Christians.

It is singular, too, that the reason these Christians hate one another is because they love Mammon more than they love the man Christ.

It would seem that the money changers whom Christ drove from the temple had been "converted" to Christianity, and that their descendants professing that creed ever since have, like the Pharisees whom Christ condemned for their hypocrisy, let it go at mere profession and outward observance of the forms of the religion professed.

Greed, rapacity and a thievish desire to possess that which is our neighbor's, is at the bottom of all these Christian wars.

It is openly asserted—whether truthfully or not, I can not tell—that the Christian British are at war with the Christian Boers because the Christian British desire to possess the wealth of the Christian Boers. It is denied that the American Christians desire to possess the wealth of the Christian Filipinos; it is even said that the American Christians desire only to "civilize" and benefit the Christian Filipinos.

Christian Russia is trying to pick a quarrel with pagan Japan, but the latter being pagan and, therefore, tolerant and long-suffering, is not so eager to cut its enemies' throats or risk the cutting of the throats of the Japanese.

In this instance the Christian money changers are the inciting motive of murderous strife.

While these sentiments are not original with me, the president of the Godless and Devilless Club finds them very appropriate for this impressive occasion, and the present age of the world. Ideas are common property, and he who uses them for the benefit of mankind is a benefactor, a philanthropist, a savior. I now wish to allude to the experiences of Brother Hastings, one of our most beloved members:

The one who reposes unlimited confidence in a God, reverences him, prays to him and regards him as a kind, indulgent Father, must receive a terrible shock when he finds that his earnest entreaties are only met with a mocking response, and that his wife and children have died while his prayers, like angels of light, have ascended to the "Throne of Grace." Mr. Hastings' devoted wife and two lovely children passed serenely to the realm of souls while he was uttering a prayer for their recovery—a prayer as pure, as divinely sweet and as tremulous with pathos as ever uttered by an Angel of Light in the highest heavens. It was a prayer all aglow with pure love, and fragrant with the incense of heaven, yet the yellow fever germs gnawed at the very vitals of his beloved family, like fiends or devils incarnate, until life became extinct.

The prayer of the bandit is said to be answered when he successfully plunders some unfortunate victim, and spreads ruin and devastation in his pathway, but in the case of Mr. Hastings at Memphis, Tenn., his prayer was only answered by the dying moans and agony of his family.

Is it any wonder, then, that in after years he should seek for companionship in the sacred enclosure of the Godless and Devilless Club, where the air of freedom is serenely pure, and where each thought scintillates with the love of man, sympathy going forth like a trailing vine bearing upon it the rich fruitage of tenderness and kindness, and entwining itself around every care-worn heart, and giving fresh animation and higher aspiration to every desponding soul—is it any wonder that bereft of his family, and that, too, when sending heavenward the incense of prayer, that he should finally drift to the Godless and Devilless Club, to rehearse the sad story of his experience with a God who turned a deaf ear to his pathetic appeals?

As stated in a previous report of the Godless and Devilless Club, Mr. Hastings, after seeing his prayers come back in a tantalizing, mocking response, from the corridors of heaven, and realizing that his wife and children were locked in the cold, clammy clasp of death, he no more to realize their sweet kiss or fond caress, in utter despair he fell to the floor unconscious, and was pronounced dead by the attending physician.

During the night, while his body was calmly reposing on the bed, awaiting interment in the morning, his spirit was delightfully surveying the beauty and grandeur of the celestial spheres. The darkness of night had receded, and the morning of spiritual refulgence and glory had burst upon him like a flower in full bloom. His soul was enraptured with the magnificent scenes, the inspiring beauty and loveliness of the variegated landscapes, all real to him. There were rivers flowing with crystal pure waters; fountains that sent their spray upwards, iridescent with all the colors of the rainbow; flowers that seemed to smile in their loveliness in recognition of his presence; trailing vines gathered in a graceful manner around majestic trees; lawns and arbors, a fit reposing place for an angel—in fact, everything was simply enchanting, and his soul vibrated with the keenest interest. Then a majestic spirit approached him, and with features all aglow with the radiance within his angelic nature, greeted him most cordially, saying: "Dear friend of earth, would you like to see your darling wife and children, those whom your prayers proved unavailing to save?"

"Most assuredly I would," he quickly responded. "I prayed fervently to God to save my family from the virulent attacks of the yellow fever microbes, and so far as I could see my prayers only met with a mocking response. I am now exceedingly skeptical in regard to the efficacy of prayer, and even doubt the very existence of a prayer-answering God. I was a member of the Baptist church, devoutly reverential towards a supposed God, and loyal to truth and honesty in all my business transactions. Surely my supplications to Deity should have received a favorable response—if he answers prayers under any circumstances whatever."

"We will not discuss that question now," said the spirit. I will state, however, that a mere belief in the existence of a God never prepared a person for a high and exalted position in the spirit realms, nor does a mere disbelief in one disbar a person therefrom. We will proceed to your devoted wife and darling children."

As they passed liesurely along Mr. Hastings was too full for utterance. Scenes of bewildering, dazzling splendor greeted him on all sides. As on earth, there was a reality in all things he touched, saw or heard. The very atmosphere was vibrant with music. All things seemed attuned to sweet melody. A soul-elevating influence seemed to emanate from all things. The flowers, expressing in divine language the beauty of the celestial spheres, far surpassed in loveliness anything he had ever seen before. His soul pulsated with lofty aspiring emotions, as if an Angel of Light had a joyous home in each one, fanning into life new aspirations and thoughts, and giving him a grander idea of one section of the Universe. His uppermost thought, however, was concentrated on his wife and children, his ideals of earth, around whom clustered his unsullied affection. How are they now? How do they look? Will they recognize me? Are they near to the throne of a God? Many such questions arose in his mind as he walked tranquilly along, but to which he failed to give audible expression. He was in another sphere of existence, and all seemed like a bewildering dream to him as he passed along. After a while a large building was reached—a palatial structure, its architecture different from anything he had ever seen on earth. A band of musicians was playing in a position far above him, and it seemed as if every part of the vast structure vibrated sweetly in harmony therewith, imparting to every part of it a musical tone that baffles description. The fountains seemed to glisten with all the colors of the rainbow, and the very spray shooting upward appeared to blend musically with the band in the archway. He was about to kneel in prayer as he viewed the enchanting scene, but refrained from so doing as his request for the recovery of his wife and children had not been answered. At last they reached a room, and over its portals were the words, "Rest for the Weary Pilgrims," for it seems that spirits passing out from the dire effects of yellow fever, are weary, and need the calm repose of just such a place where ministering spirits are always in attendance to give each one the attention required. Passing in, he there met his devoted wife and children, and was allowed to remain with them alone for a time. The greetings between them were simply the flowering out of the noble impulses that had ever actuated them, and can be easier imagined than described. With his family with him, he was in heaven—a heaven of bliss to him, a heaven far more real and beautiful than his home on earth with millions of dollars to adorn it, could possibly be. For a time his bliss was ecstatic—a golden dream realized in the warm clasp of enduring love. They talked of their own vine-clad, flower-adorned, and art-embellished home where happiness, like a fairy queen, reigned supreme until it was invaded by the yellow fever germs, and compared it with the homes in spirit life, and it seemed to sink into insignificance, a mere dot on a page of material existence. For an hour they visited, and their ecstatic bliss was at last interrupted by a rap on the door, and Mr. Hastings was informed that he must now return to earth; that his body was being prepared by the attending physician for his reception; that he must still live on the material side of life for many years, before he would be permitted to rejoin his family. The attendant spirit then conducted him back to his home on earth, where he was compelled to take possession of his body again, which the physician said manifested marked evidence of life.

The experiences that Mr. Hastings passed through are familiar to Spiritualists, and they created great interest among the members of the Godless and Devilless Club, who begin to recognize the sublime fact that the spirit world is merely a continuation of this. This session was exceptionally interesting. The remarks of the president were listened to with marked attention.

OSTEOPATHY

A FREE GIFT.

We shall be glad to send to anyone interested in this work. A FREE LESSON IN OSTEOPATHY, THE NEW SCIENCE OF DRUGLESS HEALING. Also a book explaining what Osteopathy is. Address THE COLUMBIA SCHOOL OF OSTEOPATHY, 8048 Auditorium Bldg., Chicago.

EYESIGHT RESTORED.

A Wonderful Discovery Which Cures All Afflictions of the Eye Without the Knife.

If you have any affliction of the eyes, be it granulated lids, cataracts, cross eyes or even blindness, you can positively be cured, no matter how hopeless the case may seem, or how many have pronounced it incurable, there is hope for you in a mild medicine method originated by Dr. F. Geo. Curts, whereby you can cure yourself at home. Wm. M. McDowell, Hill City, Graham county, Kan., was cured of blindness, as was Mrs. M. Dugan, 815 Locust street, Dubuque, Iowa; Mrs. C. A. Robinson, Osawatomie, Kansas, permanently cured of granulated lids. The sixteen-year-old daughter of S. T. Robinson, of Corning, Iowa, was born with cataracts on both eyes; DR. F. GEO. CURTS, was at school for the blind. Cured in four months. If you are in any way afflicted with eye troubles write to-day and you will receive absolutely free a book giving in detail and with illustrations, the manner in which this eminent scientist has perfected so many seemingly hopeless cures. Dr. F. Geo. Curts, 427 Shukert Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

DEAFNESS CURED

By No Means Until "ACTINA" Was Discovered.

Ninety-five percent of all cases of deafness brought to our attention is the result of chronic catarrh of the throat and middle ear. The air passages become clogged by catarrhal deposits, stopping the action of the vibratory bones. Until these deposits are removed a cure is impossible. The inner ear cannot be reached by probing or spraying, hence the inability of aurists or physicians to cure. Ear drums are worse than useless. That there is a scientific cure for deafness and catarrh is demonstrated every day by the use of Actina. The vapor current generated in the Actina passes through the Eustachian tubes into the middle ear, removing the catarrhal obstructions as it passes through the tubes, and loosens up the bones (hammer, anvil and stirrup) in the inner ear, making them respond to the slightest vibration of sound. Actina has never failed to cure ringing noises in the head. We have known people troubled with this distressing symptom for years to be completely cured in only three weeks' use of Actina. Actina also cures asthma, bronchitis, sore throat, weak lungs, colds and headache; all of which are directly or indirectly due to catarrh. Actina is sent on trial postpaid. Write us about your case. We give advise free, and positive proof of cures. A valuable book—Professor Wilson's 100 page Dictionary of Disease, Free. Address New York & London Electric Association, Dep. ..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

Bear in mind that all notices for this page are cut down to suit the space we have to occupy when received.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Dr. T. J. Bowles, president of the National Liberal League, writes that the prospects of the Congress of Liberals to be held in Cincinnati, Ohio, on January 20, are excellent for a large meeting. He desires to extend a special invitation to Spiritualists to attend and take part in the proceedings of the Congress. President Bowles' address is Muncie, Indiana.

Laura B. Payne writes: "I desire to make engagements for the coming camp season. Also will engage with any society to lecture through the months intervening between this and opening of camps. Address me at 522 West 6th street, Topeka, Kansas."

Capt. George W. Walrond, of Denver, Colorado, has returned from the East, but unfortunately, his health is not much improved, and he will be unable for some time to continue his public meetings on Wednesday and Sunday. Due announcements of these meetings will be given later on.

The premium books were beyond his expectations. W. M. Bergen Brown writes: "I received the eight premium books in good shape. They are altogether beyond my expectations, and I regard them as a magnificent holiday present. May you enjoy many happy returns of the season, and may your generosity be appreciated at its full worth."

The New York Journal has the following from Oto, Iowa: "The suit of D. L. Frace, a business man of this city, against Dr. G. P. Van Masel, has been taken to the the district court at Sioux City for the third trial. Frace charges the doctor with practicing hypnotism on his son Charles, and thereby injuring his physical and mental constitution. The jury at the first hearing found for the physician."

Phenomenal mediums, please read the following: S. R. Arna writes from 15 Washington Avenue, Mansfield, Ohio: "There is an earnestly expressed desire for the presence of a phenomenal medium in this city (Mansfield, Ohio) by a large number of Spiritualists and other interested persons. Therefore I write to state that it is the desire of myself and others to correspond with, and to, in any way whatsoever, assist in bringing a source of phenomenal work to this city."

Investigator writes from Jackson, Mich.: "Mrs. Emilie P. Beebe and Mrs. F. V. Jackson held two meetings in this city to crowded houses. Mrs. Jackson has been for the last three months holding parlor meetings in the adjoining towns and country with marked success. She gives tests that are very convincing and satisfactory; also very fine psychometric readings."

Louise Loebel, president, writes from Milwaukee, Wis.: "The Ladies' Aid of the Golden Rule Spiritual Society gave a Christmas social Monday evening, December 30, at Fraternity hall, 216 Grand avenue, for the benefit of the poor. There was a large Christmas tree for the children, and seven families provided with clothing, provisions and undergarments. The evening exercises were opened with a prayer by Mrs. Dr. F. L. Mehrtens, of Ripon, Wis. A vocal and instrumental program followed. There were 79 bags of candy, nuts, popcorn and cookies distributed among the children present, after which the arrangement committee served lunch to all present."

U. G. Figley writes: "In regard to Dr. Caird's remarks in your paper of Jan. 4, I would say that Mr. J. H. Bickford, of Pinar del Rio, Cuba, has written occasionally for several years past for The Progressive Thinker, and in quoting him in the letter under discussion I knew nothing of the truth or falsity of his remarks concerning Lynn, Mass., and as he did not specify Cadet Hall, I do not see that the amiable Doctor should thus jump into the breach as he did, but being on the grounds, of course he knows what he is talking about. I am glad that Cadet Hall is doing nicely and congratulate the Doctor accordingly."

Henry H. Warner, of Boston, Mass., inspirational speaker and test medium, is engaged at Webster City, Ia., Jan. 12; Marshalltown, Iowa, Jan 19; Missouri Valley, Iowa, Jan. 26; Franklin, Neb., February 3. Parties desiring to engage him for week days in the vicinity of the above points will address him until Jan. 15 at Eagle Grove, Iowa; after that date at points above named. He would like engagements between Franklin and Denver, Col., of Feb. 3, and further on enroute to Oregon City, Oregon.

Mrs. Della Platt writes from Battle Creek, Mich.: "At the meeting of our society, December 22, The First Spiritual Church, the following named persons were elected as officers for the ensuing year: President, Mrs. Emma Rayment; vice-president, Mrs. M. H. Childester; secretary, Mr. H. J. Wells; treasurer, Mrs. Della B. Platt; trustees, Mr. C. P. Childester, Mr. Charles Merchant and Mr. T. M. Yale. We are to have our mid-winter meeting here the 7th, 8th and 9th of February."

Harry J. Moore, now lecturing to appreciative audiences at Rochester, Ind., writes: "Now, my subscription to the best Spiritualist paper published runs out in about five or six weeks, and I wish to renew the same. I have the premium books, so can't make a selection among them. Your offer of books as premiums is a splendid and laudable effort to educate the people, and I can't help but say I wish your efforts in this direction will be crowned with success."

S. F. Keyes writes from Worcester, Mass.: "The People's Spiritualist Society is fortunate enough to have Madame Bruce, of Boston, with it this month, and last Sunday evening the house was filled to overflowing. She is truly a wonderful medium. A larger hall than we usually have is needed when she conducts our Monday evening circles. we look forward to a very successful month."

A. W. Keller, secretary, writes: "The Englewood Spiritual Union held its annual election, Dec. 20, 1901, and the following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President, T. S. Russell; vice-president, E. Wallace; secretary, A. W. Keller; treasurer, M. B. Philps; financial secretary, S. Martin; trustees, H. Collins, G. S. Lincoln, and Mrs. M. Cochonow."

T. writes from Toronto, Canada: "On Friday evening, January 3, 1902, the Ladies' Auxiliary of the Toronto Spiritualist Association, gave to the children of the lyceum a Christmas tree entertainment, also a social to the older people, at which there were nearly four hundred present in St. George hall. The feature of the evening was the reading of an inspirational poem by Mrs. A. R. McDonald, entitled 'From a Spirit Band of Little Helpers to the Children of the Lyceum.' Oscar A. Edgerly opened with our society last evening to a crowded house, and the audience sat spellbound for over one hour listening to the inspired truths as they fell from the lips of the medium—a lecture never to be forgotten."

Mrs. L. L. writes from West Potsdam, N. Y.: "Our society here at West Potsdam has recently been treated to a rare treat by having one of our state missionaries, Tillie U. Reynolds, with us for three consecutive evenings, to lecture. Her lectures were logical, and made a lasting impression. Beside her lectures she gives fine readings."

Dr. Pearson, of Ponca City, O. T., would like to correspond with a good platform test medium with a view of permanent engagement—at least for a season.

The Gazette, of Colorado Springs, Col., has the following, which borders on the miraculous: "Pedestrians on the streets yesterday afternoon at about three o'clock were amazed by the spectacle of a carriage and two horses dashing down the streets, the driver being blindfolded, but driving at a break-neck speed. That not an accident occurred was apparently miraculous. In the carriage was a party of prominent business men, whose looks of interest and amazement caused unlimited speculation as to the purpose of this unique drive. The blindfolded driver was Professor Ralph W. Thomason, the mind reader, whose feats have caused much astonishment since he has been here. To prove his claim to his title of mind-reader, he undertook to drive to a hidden article agreed upon by the committee that accompanied him on the drive. In this committee were Judge A. T. Gunnell, Judge Miller, Warren Hendrickson, J. W. Fletemeyer, J. A. Himebaugh and J. C. Stewart. These gentlemen had previously hidden the article in a silver receptacle at the Elks Club, and then returned to the Alamo. During this time Professor Thomason was blindfolded in his room. He drove over exactly the same route as that which the committee had taken in coming to the Alamo. Professor Thomason not only found the hidden article, driving blindfolded to it, but knew before he had found it just what the article was—a knife. The committee were all obliged to think of it en route and to think of the direction of the route they had taken. Professor Thomason guided his horses through the minds of the committee. As soon as the carriage came in the vicinity of the Elks Club, Professor Thomason jumped out and, dragging Mr. Fletemeyer with him, rushed up the stairway leading to the club, and into the room where the hidden article lay at the bottom of a vase. Coming down stairs, still blindfolded, he drove over exactly the same route as he had previously taken in coming from the Alamo. The cloth covering Mr. Thomason's eyes was a thickness of six layers of woollen cloth, extending below the face. The committee examined the cloth before putting it on the face of the mind-reader, and every possible precaution was taken to insure the perfect isolation of Professor Thomason from any communication during the interval between the hiding of the article and its finding. Three of the gentlemen were with Professor Thomason while the other three hid the article. The drive was a remarkable one, and all of the gentlemen speak in high terms of the remarkable powers of Professor Thomason in being able to discover the article through the direction of their concentrated thoughts."

Moses Hull writes from Big Run, Pa.: "I am having very large meetings here. There never was a Spiritualist meeting held here before. Audiences and interest are both immense.

Nellie S. Baade writes from Detroit, Mich.: "Kindly permit me to say that although the Philosophical Society of this city has sent in no reports of its meetings, it is not dead nor dying. Our meetings have proven a decided success; spiritually never better. As speaker and medium I work early and late for the good of all concerned. At our last meeting, O. B. Eaton was elected president of the society, and Miss Lola McCarthy, secretary. Both of them are an honor to the society. We have closed our meetings for the present, so as to fill an engagement with the Jackson Association, but expect to resume meetings here again in the near future. The Philosophical society is composed of the most unselfish people, always glad to lend a helping hand to those at home or abroad, and have never yet refused us a vacation when they thought we really needed it for the advancement of the cause. Their motto is, 'Live and Let Live.'"

When writing for this paper use a pen or typewriter.

Lizzie Harlow writes from Haydenville, Mass.: "I have the time from August 10 to August 16, 1902, open; shall be in the vicinity of Chicago. Any camps wishing my services for that time, I would be pleased to hear from them. Terms reasonable, traveling expenses from Chicago."

A. W. writes from Jackson, Mich.: "The late missionary meetings in Michigan have been productive of good results in awakening Spiritualists to a sense of duty. The society in Jackson has resumed its meetings and is meeting with encouragement. On Sunday last we had Mrs. Marian Carpenter, from Detroit, speak in the morning and evening to large and appreciative audiences. Mrs. N. S. Baade, from Detroit, is the next speaker. The interest is increasing."

G. H. Brooks writes: "I am on my fourth and last month with the Newport (Ky.) Society, and my audiences are fine and the interest on the increase. The society tendered me a benefit the 7th of this month, which was largely attended and yielded a neat sum. I shall leave this band of earnest workers with sincere regret. I go to Milwaukee, Wis., to serve the Unity Society for February and March. My address while in Newport is 120 East Third street."

G. W. Kates writes of the N. S. A. benefit meeting at Pittsburg, Pa.: "For the purpose of aiding the First Church of Spiritualists of Pittsburg to pay its subscription to the N. S. A., Mrs. Kates and self remained after our month's engagement until Thursday evening, January 2, and held a meeting at which most of the time was promised to be devoted to spirit messages and descriptions. Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Sprague, en route to Philadelphia, halted over night and aided the meeting. They were enthusiastically received by the audience, and liberally contributed to the exercises. Mrs. Kates gave some accurate messages and then was controlled by spirit 'Margaret,' and well entertained the people. The missionaries made such enthusiastic remarks that a voluntary contribution of $25.50 was taken for the N. S. A., besides the door fee of 25 cents from each person. Several members for the church were also secured. The attendance was about 140. The missionaries think they had better visit places together and jointly assail the Spiritualists and develop their enthusiasm. Let it be known that the N. S. A. missionaries are all in accord and with such regard each for the other, that their joint work is harmoniously helpful to themselves, as they trust it shall be for our beloved cause. Mrs. Kates and self thank Mr. and Mrs. Sprague, Mr. Stevens and the Pittsburg friends for generosity and kind help."

Mrs. H. S. Parker writes from Summerland, California: "I have always, from my youth up, been a believer in the great salvation, but I have often thought there must be some sense of justice as well as mercy in divine love, and I am inexpressibly glad for the unfolding of the great mystery to me by the careful reading I have given this book, 'A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands.' Indeed I have read it over again and again, and now I urge it upon others to read, for it is truly as you say, 'Worth its weight in gold.' It is, I most sincerely believe, in harmony with the gospel of the philosophy of Spiritualism, and is destined to do a great work in uniting us all under the one banner of 'Christian' union or 'Peace on earth, good will to all.'"

Titus Merritt writes from New York: "Andrew Jackson Davis commenced what is known as the First Association of Spiritualists of New York City, Jan. 4, 1863. Miss Margaret Gaule closed the 39th annual session of said society, Sunday, December 29, which has been very successful; in fact the meetings have been well attended since she commenced four years ago. Mrs. Mary A. Newton is still president and with the able management of Miss Marie Fitzmaurice, secretary and treasurer, and an able board of trustees, have managed to keep out of debt. Sunday, Jan. 5, Mrs. May S. Pepper, a justly celebrated medium, occupied the platform, while Miss Gaule, at the earnest request of Pittsburg friends, was allowed to attend to their wants for the month of January. She will return the first Sunday in February. Mrs. Pepper commenced the 40th session of this society, and the opening was well attended. Inasmuch as I commenced with the society and have had the sale of literature, much of the time, at the entrance of their rooms, it is gratifying to hear the expressions of satisfaction as the attendants make their exit. This has been very decided under the ministration of Miss Gaule for the past three months, and also yesterday under the ministration of Mrs. Pepper. A peculiarity of this society, while the number of members does not increase, is an influence is brought to bear that scatters them to the churches and all parts of the United States, and thus spreads the facts and philosophy, and the glorious cause is progressing rapidly."

Mrs. E. J. Demorest writes from Williamsport, Pa.: "Having almost finished my stay for the present with the Williamsport society, this time over three months; also spending some six months two years since, helping to get their state charter, they having the charter from the N. S. A., I feel it a pleasant duty to say something of the locality, its workers and mediums. In this society there are many brave and good people who are willing workers for universal truth alone. Among the mediums Mrs. L. H. Dimich stands out first as a healer; also Mrs. Diche and several others. Mr. David Hess is a fine inspirational speaker and test medium. Your paper is a great help to all skeptics as well as Spiritualists, and loved by some, but admired by all. My address will be for three months, No 15 North Fourth street, Reading, Pa."

R. W. Bowman speaks of a beautiful vision as follows: "On the evening of the 10th of December, 1901, while in a perfectly normal state of mind and body, I saw what to me seems to have been a remarkable vision in the heavens, mostly in the northwest, which I make known in hopes that some of the wiseacres may be able to interpret it, as I believe it portends something universal in which the nations of the earth are to figure in the year 1918. I saw with the natural eyes what seemed to be the banners or flags of all nations of earth suspended as it were in the clear heavens, by cords, or lines. The whole heavens seemed to be dense with the beautiful national emblems, among which Old Glory occupied the position of prominence in the galaxy of splendor, which was the head of the column, or center around which the other emblems were positioned in proper order, some of them appearing so low as to almost touch the earth in the northwest horizon. These emblems were very beautiful in their individual selves, and gorgeous and splendid in their collective capacity. As I was beholding these emblems, in wonder as to the true meaning of all this display, I turned slightly to the southeast and saw there a splendid train of cars, drawn by steam, moving rapidly through the air. The train seemed to be moving towards the southwest. It entered a bridge and was lost to my view thereafter. In the midst of the vision I saw clearly the date, 1918, with no figures nor words about it, only the gray heavens for a background."

L. M. Barrick writes from Canton, O.: "When I receive this book, A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands, I will congratulate myself that I have all the eight premium books, substantially given as premiums to all subscribers of The Progressive Thinker. I have been a subscriber and reader of The Progressive Thinker for several years, and it is impossible to describe the peace of mind and comfort, experienced by reading the grand truths of spiritualism as promulgated through its columns, and when I think of how I have been disenthralled from ignorance and superstition thereby, my joy knows no bounds. If the people of the United States who profess belief in Spiritualism, and yet read no Spiritualist paper, would read The Progressive Thinker only six months and thus realize the elevating and educating influence of the blessed truths of our philosophy, I have no doubt that your list of subscribers would be counted by the millions."

Mrs. Alice Baker, lecturer and message medium, writes from Cleveland, Ohio: "The West Side Spiritual Progressive Thought Society held its annual business meeting, Sunday, January 5, electing D. A. Smeaden, president; Fred Hays, vice-president; Mr. R. Roselle, secretary, and J. C. Hemeter, treasurer, and Mrs. Alice Baker, pastor. We are commencing the year with renewed energy, zeal and effort on the part of all, and we are seeking for wisdom and a higher inspiration. We realize that unity of purpose, harmony and a seeking for the higher truths will bring to us help and success from the angel world. I will answer calls for meetings through the week, and engage with societies for Sunday, one or more, as desired, by having two weeks' notice. I will officiate at funerals. I am also open for camp-meeting engagements for 1902. Home address, 261 Pearl street, Cleveland, Ohio."

Mrs. Maria Bitters writes from Rochester, Ind.: "I am more than pleased to inform you of the good work accomplished in our city for Spiritualism, through the efficient labor of our young brother, Harry J. Moore. He is the right man in the right place, doing the work of the spirit world in an intelligent and comprehensive manner. Our lyceum is well attended and the interest growing, the young grasping the beauty of our happy religion. We are proud of our speaker and his noble little wife who stands firmly by him in all his efforts, and we hope to be able to retain them another year. It takes a man with intelligence to interest a Rochester audience, and Brother Moore fills the bill to perfection."

L. writes from Detroit, Mich.: "Last week the dailies of this city gave flaring headlines to a most pleasing incident that occurred at the residence of one of the leading mediums. For a long time a class met weekly to assist in developing Mrs. Sarah Williams as a trumpet medium, and succeeded so well that an evening was set for the closing of her band, and for the general enjoyment of this important event. This took place at the parlors of Mrs. Mollie Ladell, on Congress street, who in the trance state dedicated the new medium and her band of ten spirits to the work. This was responded to by Mrs. Williams in a most touching and earnest address, all in words most fitting and inspiring to the large company present. After this ceremony, refreshments were served, and then followed a trumpet seance that was decidedly convincing that the spirit voices, too, were in most happy accord. The papers made out of it the usual misleading reports, intimating among the rest that the usual bride and groom wedding ceremony had been performed. The new society of Earnest Workers, at 333 Michigan avenue, hold two meetings each week, Thursday and Sunday evenings. Mrs. Ladell and Mrs. Avery spoke at the last two meetings. Mrs. Crawford will be the speaker at the next Sunday meeting. All the meetings are largely attended. At a recent meeting Mrs. Sharlow, the secretary, held in her arms a most promising and interesting little girl, and introduced her as the 'youngest medium in this city.' The happy little lady displayed pretty dimples in her plump cheeks, but did not otherwise respond. She is Miss Margaret Carlson, whose papa and mamma are active members of the Earnest Workers. President William Mishler, of the society, sends thanks to The Progressive Thinker, for recent mention of the occasion when their charter was presented."

S. Ita writes from Davenport, Iowa: "Dr. J. A. Bailey, of Clinton, Iowa, is doing a good work in Davenport, and is endeavoring to reorganize the scattered society formed a year ago. His Sunday meetings are well attended, and he is doing good missionary work for the cause in Davenport and vicinity along the higher spiritual lines."

Nellie S. Baade, of Detroit, Mich., 411 Thirteenth street, would be pleased to make arrangements or dates for camp-meetings for 1902, upon reasonable terms. Will also officiate at funerals, or perform marriage ceremonies at home or abroad. Please preserve this notice as it may not appear again.

U. G. Figley writes: "Emanuel Ryder, an old-time lecturer in the Spiritualist ranks, has re-entered the field, and lectured in the G. A. R. Hall, at Bryan, O., Jan. 12, on 'Has the Religious Problem Been Solved?' January 10, 'If a Man Die Shall He Live Again?' and Jan. 26, 'Our Country.' He is a vigorous thinker and speaker, and his addresses always teem with brilliant gems of thought and true eloquence and philosophy."

Frank T. Ripley has the Sundays of February and March open for engagements upon liberal terms. He can be addressed during January, at 48 West Rich street, Columbus, Ohio.

Correspondent writes: "J. Frank Baxter, through December, 1901, labored with very gratifying results to both Spiritualists and the public in Worcester, Mass., under the auspices of the First Association; lectures marked and timely; spirit demonstrations noteworthy and weighty and the large Sunday evening audiences much interested and enthused. This month of Sundays, January, 1902, he is serving the Spiritualists of Willimantic, Conn. So far great interest is aroused. Mr. Baxter has lectured and practiced mediumship in this place hundreds of times in years past, but that he has never been more entertaining and effective than now, notwithstanding excellent satisfaction has always been previously given, is generally conceded."

"The Gospel of Buddha, According to Old Records." Told by Paul Carus. This book is heartily commended to students of the science of religions, and to all who would gain a fair conception of Buddhism in its spirit and living principles. Spiritualist or Christian can scarcely read it without spiritual profit. Price $1. For sale at this office.

"Nature Cure." By Drs. M. E. and Eosa C. Conger. Excellent for every family. Cloth, $1.50 and $2. For sale at this office.

WHAT IS THE USE OF YOUR SLAVING LONGER FOR SOME ONE ELSE.

Why not start a business for yourself, reap all the profits and get a standing in your locality.

If you are in some one's employ, remember he will not continue to pay you a salary only so long as he can make profit out of your labor.

In this era every bright man and woman is looking to own a business, to employ help, and to make money.

It is just as easy to make money for yourself as it is to coin money for some grasping employer, who pays you a small salary each week.

If you are making less than $30 weekly it will pay you to read this announcement, for it will not appear again in this paper.

If you read it and take advantage of the opportunity offered, you will never regret it. To own a business yourself is certainly your ambition.

We start you in a profitable business. Teach you absolutely free how to conduct it.

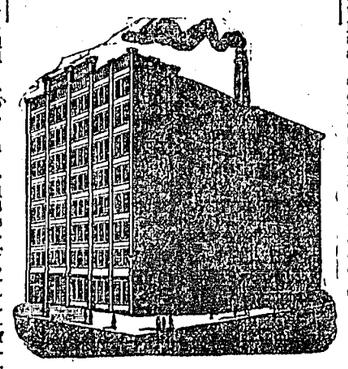
$20 to $35 weekly can be made at home or traveling, taking orders, using, selling and appointing agents for PROFESSOR GRAY'S Latest improved, Guaranteed Plating Machines and Outfits. NO FAKE OR TOYS, but genuine, practical, complete, scientific outfits for doing the finest of plating on WATCHES, JEWELRY, KNIVES, FORKS, SPOONS, CASTORS, TABLEWARE OF ALL KINDS, BICYCLES, SEWING MACHINES, SWORDS, REVOLVERS, HARNESS AND BUGGY TRIMMINGS, metal specialties; in fact all kinds of metal goods. HEAVY THICK PLATE. GUARANTEED TO WEAR FOR YEARS. No experience necessary.

There is really a wonderful demand for re-plating. You can do business at nearly every house, store, office or factory. Almost every family has from $2 to $10 worth of tableware to be plated, besides watches, jewelry, bicycles, etc.

Every boarding house, hotel, restaurant, college or public institution has from $5 to $75 worth of work to be plated. Every jewelry, repair or bicycle shop, every dentist, doctor and surgeon, every man, woman and child you meet has either a watch, some jewelry, bicycles, instruments, or some articles needing plating.

Besides the above there are hundreds of patentees and manufacturers of metal goods, bicycles, sewing machines and typewriter repair shops who want their goods plated, or to whom you can sell a plating outfit, furnishing them supplies for doing their own plating.

Retail Stores which handle hardware, harness, tableware and plated or metal goods all need a plating and polishing outfit for refinishing goods that become worn, soiled, rusty or tarnished.



Every Undertaker requires a plating outfit for repairing and finishing coffin and hearse trimmings which are soiled, tarnished or worn.

Manufacturers are making and selling tons of new tableware, jewelry, bicycles and various kinds of metal goods every month which has only a very thin plate, which, in a few weeks, wears off, making the goods unsightly, unfit for future use unless plated.

Manufacturers of new goods do no re-plating on old goods whatever, but try to force the public to throw away the old and buy new at high prices, but this only makes the plating business better.

The more new thinly plated goods sold the greater will be the demand for plating. Plate some articles for your friends and neighbors by Professor Gray's Process, and it quickly proves to them its genuineness and merit and that your plating is much thicker, will wear better and longer than a large percentage of the new goods. Your trade is then established, and within a short time you will have all the goods you can plate.

Plate a few articles for your friends, call a few weeks, a few months, or five years later, and you will find the plate satisfactory, and they will give you every article they have needing to be plated.

Factory and Warehouse of Gray & Co., Cincinnati, Ohio. Capital $100,000. Employ 200 to 300 people daily.

When you deliver the goods plated to customers they will be well pleased, in fact, delighted with the work, will pay for it promptly, and you will be given on an average twice as much work to be plated as they gave you the first time you called.

YOU CAN DO PLATING SO CHEAP

that every person can afford to have their goods plated

No tidy housekeeper will allow worn and rusty tableware to go before a guest when it can be restored and made equal to new.

No person will wear jewelry or a watch, or ride a bicycle, or use a typewriter, sewing machine, or any machine made of metal from which the plate is worn off when they see samples of your work and hear your prices. People in this day and generation are too sensible and economical to throw away their old goods and buy new when they can have their old goods re-plated for so small a cost, making them, in many cases, better than when new.

The best part of the plating business is that it increases fast and is permanent.

Put out your sign, secure your outfit, do a little work, and quickly you will be favored with orders. If you do not wish to do the plating yourself you can hire boys for $3 to $4 a week to do the work the same as we do, and solicitors to gather up goods to be plated on commission.

It is not hard work, but is pleasant, and especially so when your business is netting you $20 to $35 a week for 5 or 6 hours' work a day.

TREMENDOUS PROFITS.

The profits realized from plating are tremendous.

To plate a set of teaspoons requires only about 3c. worth of metal and chemicals; a set of knives, forks or tablespoons about 5c. worth. The balance of the price received for the work is for the agent's time and profit.

Agents usually charge from 25c. to 50c. per set for plating teaspoons, from 50c. to 75c. for tablespoons and forks, and from 60c. to $1.00 for knives.

We allow you to set your own price for plating. Get as much as you can. You will have no competition. You know what it costs to plate the goods, and all you get over cost is profit. Some agents charge much more than the above prices, while others do the work for half and still make money.

Let us start you in business for yourself at once, don't delay a single day. Be your own boss. Be a money maker. We do all kinds of plating ourselves, have had years of experience, and are headquarters for plating supplies. We manufacture our own dynamos and outfits, all sizes, and send them out complete, with all tools, lathes, wheels and materials; everything ready for use.

We teach you everything, furnish all receipts, formulas and trade secrets free, so that failure should be impossible, and any one who follows our directions and teachings can do fine plating with a little practice, and become a money maker.

THE ROYAL SILVER OUTFIT.

Prof. Gray's Famous Discovery.

THE NEW DIPPING PROCESS is the latest, quickest, easiest method known. Tableware plated by simply dipping in melted metal, taken out instantly, with the finest, most brilliant, beautiful plate deposited. All ready to deliver to customers. MAKES THICK PLATE EVERY TIME. GUARANTEED TO WEAR 5 to 10 YEARS. A BOY PLATES 100 to 300 pieces tableware daily, from $10 to $30 worth of work, profits almost 1000 per cent. Goods come out of plate finely finished. No polishing, grinding or work necessary, neither before or after plating.

You will not need to canvas. Agents write they have all the goods they can plate. People bring it for miles around. You can hire boys cheap to do your plating, the same as we do, and solicitors to gather work for a small per cent. Put a small advertisement or two in your local paper and you will have all the plating you can do. The plating business is honest and legitimate. Plating on our machines gives good satisfaction. Wears for years; customers are delighted and recommend you and your work.

We are an old established firm, have been in business for years, know exactly what is required, furnish complete outfits and materials, the same as we ourselves use, and customers always have the benefit of our experience. We are responsible and guarantee everything. The above firm is thoroughly reliable and do just as they agree. The outfits are just as represented, and do fine plating, and after investigation we consider this one of the best paying businesses we have yet heard of.—Editor PROGRESSIVE THINKER.

From Elmira, N. Y.

To the Editor:—Knowing you are interested in the good of the truth and desirous of knowing regarding the advancement of the same among the people, we take great pleasure in reporting the progress of the First Spiritualist Unity Society of this city, the membership of which is increasing with the earnest and enthusiastic zeal of officers and members.

Sister Wreidt, of Detroit, Mich., the well-known trumpet medium, gave great satisfaction and proof to many doubters of the return of their loved ones, before the holiday season.

Sister Tillie U. Reynolds, of Troy, N. Y., second vice-president and missionary of the N. Y. S. S. Association, is with us for a few days, giving a grand feast of the good things of spirit.

Sister Mary C. Von Kanzler returns to us for the month of February, followed by Sister Reynolds for March. Later, Sister Wreidt returns for a week in May, again followed by Sister Von Kanzler, who will return as permanent pastor.

There is a brick edifice, formerly a church, now empty, which we aspire to possess, and we see, in the near future, a realization of our hopes.

Now, do you think this is a "God-forsaken hole," as one of the shining lights designated it a few years ago? If it was then, He has returned to us and the Queen City of the Southern Tier will prove her metal.

Our president, Sister Duhl, says: "Tell Brother Francis, The Progressive Thinker is an ever welcome and anxiously-looked-for visitor, and is a great stimulant to the zeal in her work for the upbuilding of the society and enlightenment of humanity.

MRS. L. E. ZIMMERMAN, Secretary.

Holiday Time in San Francisco.

Friendship Hall, where Mrs. C. J. Meyer gives tests or communications, was beautifully decorated for the holiday season with evergreen, and pictures, and all the tinsel of a Christmas tree, and the proceedings in a spiritual way were notable. The decorations were mainly the work of Mr. and Mrs. Meyer themselves, assisted by a few willing friends, and the beauty of them was greatly appreciated by all.

The program for Friday evening of holiday week, in charge of Philos Cook, was, besides songs, Reading of poetry, by Capt. Stout; recitation of original poem by Prof. Thos. H. B. Cotton; address, "Jesus, the Jew," by A. Mark Stoddard; addresses and tests by Mesdames Seeley, Bird, Wrenn, Stoddard, and C. J. Meyer; and the exercises referring to Christmas—historical introduction by Mr. Cook, original poem by Mrs. Darms, introducing Mrs. Santa Claus on the occasion of her first appearance, personated by Mrs. Renne, who gave psychic readings in costume; the whole interspersed with songs led by Mrs. Dunkel and Capt. Stout, and closing with a social reception and refreshments to the friends by Mrs. Meyer and husband, the latter of whom returned thanks for his wife and himself for the kindly reception their efforts had met.

On New Year eve a Spiritualist watch meeting was held, with tests and communications by the above mediums and Mrs. Hodgson, and on New Year night psychic character readings by Mrs. Renne, tests by Mrs. Bird and Mrs. Meyer, and by "Nita," Mrs. Darms' little Indian control.

For nearly three years now Friendship hall, at 335 McAllister street, has been open, with but few exceptions, every night in the year for the simple, unassuming, effective delivery of the gracious gospel of life, and truth, and love to an ever-changing panorama of human life, reaching at almost every meeting everyone present, though the audiences frequently fill the full seating capacity of the hall. It is quite possible that at the beginning of the coming summer Mr. and Mrs. Meyer will take a trip as far east as New York, stopping at various points of interest on the way for spiritual purposes. Mrs. Meyer's work here for the past three years in Friendship Hall, has shown her to be a most successful and reliable medium.

PHILOS COOK.

Don't Make a Wager.

To the Editor:—In your last issue which lies before me, appears in glaring headlines a challenge by Mr. Mangasarian, of Chicago, of the integrity of the slate-writings obtained through the mediumship of the Bangs Sisters. It seems that he is willing to wager $100 to $25 that these writings are produced by purely mechanical means, and only asks as a test that he be allowed to hold both ends of the slates, and then if any writings appear he will forfeit his money; and in same issue your paper vouches for his integrity and hopes that some one will accept the bet and win his money and thus convince him.

Well, from my point of view I sincerely hope that no Spiritualist will go into the business of betting on the honesty and integrity of our mediums. If this man, professor and lecturer though he be, desires to be convinced of the truth of spirit return and communication, let him do as I and thousands of others have done, make his experiment himself.

Go the Bangs Sisters' home, make an appointment, take his own blank sheets of paper, and hold the slates between which the sheets are placed in his own hands all the time, in plain view and broad daylight, and do not permit the medium to take them at all in her hands, not only hold both ends of the slates, but hold the whole slate as I did; and if he approaches this fountain of spiritual knowledge in that manner, and with a heart full of desire for the truth, his spirit friends will write for him on those sheets of paper, just as they have for myself and others. But if he approaches with a heart full of distrust, and with a feeling that the whole thing is a fraud, he maybe will not receive any communication.

I hope that we will not trail our spiritual religion in the mire and dirt by accepting bets on its truth. If it is true, and the medium is honest, manifestations will take place, and a bet will not make it a success under any circumstances.

In my opinion the mediumship of the Bangs Sisters rests upon too solid a foundation of fact, to be shaken, or doubted, or strengthened by winning a bet. This doughty Professor can be easily convinced, even though he come like "Nicodemus by night," to know the truth. Yours for honest mediumship.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

A Legrner: Q. I am told that platinum is nearly as valuable as gold. Why is it so costly?

A. Platinum has recently advanced in price until it is more valuable than gold, being now quoted at $21 an ounce. It exists only in few localities and in limited quantities, and the demand is constantly increasing, as no other metal has been found to take its place in the arts. It is unchangeable by air and corrosive acids, and until the invention of the ox-hydrogen flame by Prof. Hare, was thought to be infusible. With the electric current it is now readily fused and is thus made available for uses which its refractoriness prevented.

The greater portion comes from the Urals of Russia, the lesser from Brazil, Borneo and California.

It is always found associated with gold in placers, as flakes or nuggets, and being of even greater specific gravity it is retained with that metal in washing. It is of a steely-gray color, resembling silver, of about the hardness of copper, and magnetic in its native state like iron, and always found in its metallic state. Unless some substitute is discovered it will reach a much higher price, as practically the supply cannot be greatly increased.

"American": Q. What think you of the summary laws proposed to punish or exile Anarchists?

A. We repeat, that it was most fortunate that Congress was not in session when that deplorable assassination of President McKinley occurred. Had it been, under the heat of passion which was then master, the traditional freedom of our forefathers would have been swept away, and not only anarchy, but liberty itself would have been endangered.

The definition of anarchy may be made to cover the utterance of honest opinion, and it is the right of every American citizen to discuss public questions and criticize. No citizen has the right to instigate violence in any form against the government. If the government is wrong, it must be borne in mind that the people have the power to change it. The people constitute the government which is made by the people.

When Garfield was assassinated laws were passed against allowing certain classes of foreigners to enter this country. It was proposed to legislate anarchists out of the land. It was a failure. The proposition to exile them from all nations to some island is the scheme of a child. How are anarchists to be distinguished. The most insidious are not known until they startle the world by their crimes.

The same may be said of punishment by imprisonment or death. Anarchists cannot be prosecuted on mere suspicion. And furthermore, who are they who most disturb the peace and prosperity of the country? There are the "yellow" journals, that by attack on the government, by falsehoods, and ridicule, do more to instill the doctrines of anarchy—of repudiation of law—than all the Emma Goldmans or John Mosts. There are the over wealthy, whose gain has come from robbery, flaunting their luxurious waste, their diamonds, equipages and ten-thousand-dollar dinners. These are object lessons of anarchy.

Let us adhere to the American idea, that the people make the government, and not the government the people. We want law and order, and the right of every individual, to do as he pleases, so far as he does not interfere with the rights of others. To protect the individual in these rights, is the province of government. The foreigner comes here with his traditions that government is something above and beyond the people, which can be reached only by destruction. When coercive legislation is resorted to, this foreign idea of government is tacitly admitted. To enforce it, other nations have armies. Behind their laws stands the soldier with his fixed bayonet. A constable from a justice's court is obeyed in these United States, as implicitly as though he led a company of soldiers. He has more power than in any other country because seventy-five millions of people are interested in having him obeyed.

If it is folly to attempt to legislate directly for the expulsion of anarchists, what must be done? We as a nation believe in the power of education. We believe that the government is shaped and sustained by the intelligence of the people. It then becomes imperative that the people be educated. This education means a great deal more than acquaintance with the "three Rs." One may have that and be stolidly ignorant. As a part of the government, responsible for its laws and management, every voter should be able to understand the somewhat intricate subject of what may be distinctly called American governmental policy. I say American, for it is wholly unlike European or any other ancient or modern. Before a foreigner be allowed to vote, whether he has been in this country five or twenty-five years, he should be able to speak the English language, interpret the constitution, and define the functions of the officers for whom he votes. It might be well to apply the same rule to American-born voters as well. The greatest danger, all the danger it may be said, of our republic lies in the power of the ignorant vote, and there is no justice or right in allowing a man the high privilege of participating in the government who has not interest enough to learn the principles on which the government is founded.

Hence it is that I regard a thorough educational test as the best safeguard against anarchists, and of all other disturbing causes. And here it occurs to me to represent the grandeur of the scheme of American government, unlike any other the world ever saw, and which may be perfected and sustained by the demands made on it from age to age. It is said that the idea of this government came from the New England town meeting. The little community met, elected its officers for the year, and obeyed them, until new ones were installed. That is the government of the town. As the country grew, and there were larger interests, several towns organized into counties, the town yielding some of its rights and privileges for the common good to the larger government of the county. Then came greater interests which involved many counties, each county yielding some privileges in favor of the state, that was organized. But it was found that a multitude of states could not be prosperous, unless united by a common bond. The thirteen colonies had this lesson taught them by the war which gave them independence. If each had stood by itself, they would have been easily conquered. United, they were invincible. The states had opposing interests, but they yielded these for the greater advantages of union, in which the great Republic has become so strong, that it has no foe to fear.

Arthur McCowen: Q. What is the Press Association, I have heard mentioned several times?

A. The questioner probably has in mind the "American Press-Writers' Association," which has been quite recently organized, mainly by the persistency of Mr. A. C. Armstrong, of Dorchester, Mass.

It is an association of those who are willing to give their services free, whenever occasion calls, or opportunity offers, in sending to the secular newspapers and journals, articles that will interest and instruct. Especially when reformatory ideas are attacked, is it their duty to reply in the same paper if it will allow, or in another that will, if it refuses. The expenses of the Association, for circulars, membership, etc., is defrayed by voluntary contributions.

The last published list contains the names of 173 members. These are classified under the subjects to which they have given or are giving special attention. Among these are agnosticism, anarchism, anti-vivisection, Ingersoll defenders, occultism, peace, socialism, Spiritualism, Sunday-school cialism, Spiritualism, Sunday question, woman's rights, and many others.

Whenever a member meets in a newspaper an article reflecting on any of these questions, it is his duty to reply himself, or send a marked copy to one who will do so.

There is also a list of leading journals that give a free platform to well-written articles on reformatory subjects. It would be well for those intended, to write the secretary, A. C. Armstrong, Dorchester, Mass., for a list of members, and then when they find an opportunity in their local press for replying to articles, or presentation of such ideas as they think desirable for publication, they can send clippings with requests for answers, or original articles to such press writers as in their judgment are best qualified for the task. Any one desirous of assisting in this good work may become a member. It costs nothing, for it is on the plan of doing all you can for the enlightenment of others for the pure love of doing. That your torch burns none the less brightly for lighting your neighborhood.

No association has the possibilities of a greater educational work, and a large number of leading newspapers have opened their columns to the writers of the association.

A THOUGHT OR TWO.

That $100 Offer to the Bangs Sisters.

The proposition to test mediumship on a wager has been tried and failed more than once, when the honesty of the medium could not be denied. It has also succeeded in some strikingly illustrative cases. Some mediums appear to be helped or hindered in honest work by causes that do not seem to affect others.

Some spirits, too, seem to refuse to act under some conditions that do not disturb others.

We have to count on many subtile agencies in the production of phenomena. Some of them physical, or semi-physical; others mental, or psychical. I believe the Bangs Sisters can satisfy Prof. Mangasarian's demands; but a failure, or a dozen failures would be no proof that the Bangs Sisters "perform their independent slate-writing by a purely mechanical process."

The kind of test demanded is no more conclusive than I have had with these mediums, yet I might fail in getting anything under the conditions stipulated.

The presence of his hands at both ends of the slate might be a neutralizing agent that would prevent any phenomena. It was one of the early lessons in Spiritualism, that the mere quiet presence of some persons neutralize the power employed by spirits, and with some mediums render any manifestation impossible. Other mediums might subdue this intrusive agency and succeed in spite of it. I believe the Bangs Sisters can do this, but they might require a number of sittings to overcome the debilitating magnetism of the investigator. On the other hand, his influence might act favorably and help, rather than hinder manifestations. Some people fail to get any writing under any conditions; others get it readily under the most (apparently) adverse conditions.

Mrs. Howe was acquainted with a medium over fifty years ago, who had raps as loud as the blow of a hammer. She was not a professional. She was regarded as dull, rather below par in mental qualities. When sitting for raps her hands were like ice, and she in a sort of a stupor. A man and wife visited her for a sitting, with others. It was discovered that the wife brought an influence into the circle that hindered phenomena. She went out and in about ten minutes the raps came, feebly at first, but grew in strength until Mrs. S. could hear them in the next room. She opened the door quietly and looked in, and the sounds instantly ceased. But her husband got remarkable manifestations from his seven children—of whose existence no one in the room but himself had any knowledge.

I had had several sittings with the Bangs Sisters, and with two other noted mediums, and failed to get any writing; but the first sitting with P. L. O. A. Keeler I got a slate full. There many ways that the genuineness of the writings can be established just as perfectly as to hold the slates by both ends. I got writing in a sealed envelope between two slates, at a sitting in which the medium did not touch either envelope or slate from start to finish.

But when I applied a certain condition that I contrived to make it look strong, I failed to get anything. Why, I do not know; but the failure did not change the facts of other sittings. Another critical investigator, acting on my suggestion made the same condition that I tried, slightly varied, but in no way weakened, and got several pages in a sealed envelope. Of this I may have more to say sometime. I am glad to see intelligent men looking after these realities, even though they be sure it is all fraud. Investigation honestly and thoroughly persisted in, is sure to convince the most skeptical. I hope the Bangs Sisters will give this proposition a trial.

FROM THE N. S. A.

A Wonderful Spirit Production Presented to the N. S. A.

To the Editor:—I am sure the readers of your valuable paper will be interested to learn that the N. S. A. has recently been presented with a large and handsome painting, or portrait, of the three Fox sisters, which was painted in thirty minutes, by spirit power, in the presence of the well-known mediums, Mrs. Paul, of Chicago, Miss Margaret Gaule, of New York, and the gentleman for whom it was produced, and who presented it to this association. The latter is a well-known business man, a staunch Spiritualist and philanthropist; for reasons of his own he does not wish to be known in his numerous benefactions, and in this instance of the picture, he does not desire to be mentioned by name. The donor of the picture selected his own canvas, and placed it close to a window in full light—another piece of canvas between it and the window—and kept his eyes upon the sheet until the three portraits were finished. In his statement made before a notary, this gentleman attests to the fact that the time consumed from the first moment of the work to the finishing touch, was not more than half an hour. As a piece of spirit art and manifestation, this is a marvelous production, and the thanks of the N. S. A. and its friends are due to the generous soul who has placed it in this establishment.

Again, Mr. Editor, kindly allow me to state that the N. S. A. has no longer any such branch as was formerly known as Contributing Membership; this was abolished by vote of the last convention, as it was misleading to many, who thought by paying a dollar a year they were individual members of this association and also personally indorsed to the public as such. The N. S. A. thankfully receives any contribution for the aid of its good works, but it has no contributing—or individual membership. It now desires to push the work of getting its Home for mediums, at Reed City, into shape for occupancy, and begs the public to help it with contributions towards that end. Spiritualists have been calling for a mediums' home for years, and now we have the building purchased—with no encumbrance of any kind upon it. It will cost a thousand dollars to put it in shape including apparatus for steam heating it, and to make it ready for occupancy, after which of course it will have to be supported. The sick can have the best of sanitary and medical care there, and altogether this can be made an ideal home for our destitute and worn-out mediums; therefore we see no reason why the philanthropic Spiritualists should not send their contributions to this office to aid in such a glorious work. We trust the tide in that direction will prove a glorious one.

In regard to the National Spiritual Lyceum, charters to local Children's Lyceums are issued from this office. Applications for the same must be sent to the undersigned, as the National Lyceum is now under the auspices of the National Spiritualists Association. The cause of the children is one that should be dear to all hearts, and the work and care of the Children's Progressive Lyceums should be of interest to us all.

The work of Spiritualism in Washington is advancing; three societies hold services here each Sunday. Mrs. Sarah Byrnes, Mrs. Loe F. Prior and Prof. W. F. Peck have nobly ministered to the attendants at Masonic Temple so far this season. J. Clegg Wright is the able speaker for the present month. Mrs. M. T. Longley, and Mr. P. L. O. A. Keeler, the well-known medium, will serve the society in February, while Moses Hull in March, and Clegg Wright again in April, will give solid truths to the public from that platform.

Cordially, with wishes for a Happy New Year to all,

MARY T. LONGLEY,

A NEW YEAR.

Time and Eternity, as Viewed by the Editor of the New York Herald.

A thousand years in thy sight are but as yesterday when it is past.—Psalms, xc., 4.

Time and eternity! The one is the beautiful porch to the great temple, the other is the magnificent temple itself, whose spaces are immeasurable even by the imagination.

In very truth we begin the eternal life with the first breath we draw in childhood. As a matter of convenience, however, we cut off a small section of eternity, just long enough to encompass our earthly life, and call it time. Dividing it into years and months and days, we are able to keep our varied experiences in mind, telling ourselves that at such a moment we suffered defeat, at such another we won the victory and at still another some dear one came into the household to add its little voice to the domestic chorus, or perhaps some dear one suddenly became silent and left us to wonder in what clime she is now wandering.

It is a beautiful and profitable custom, this which we celebrate as the cold sun shines on each successive first of January. There are seventy hillocks in the short journey of human life, and as we reach each one in turn we lay our burdens down for a short respite, gather our friends together, recall the past, forecast the future and with kindly greetings wish each other a happy arrival at the next hillock, then take up our burdens once again and enter the valley that lies between the two elevations. It is a day of good cheer, of fraternal assembly. The air is full of happy thoughts and good wishes. The whole world is brighter for it, for heart goes out to heart, and universal sympathy lifts us for a time to a higher level. Earth is a little more comforting and heaven a little dearer.

Some new faces have come and some of the old faces have disappeared, but love welcomes the one and faith still catches an occasional glimpse of the other. It is the day when we stop for a moment to listen to the keynote of a better life. Dissatisfied with what we have done, the soul bids us be braver, truer and nobler. We heed the warning, and though the cares of the coming days may diminish the force of our resolution a subtle something remains which points to possibilities unattained, while it reminds us of the ability to attain them. With the capacity to be great, we are still strangely small of soul, and on each New Year's Day we chide ourselves for our weakness. A sense of shame mingles with the consciousness of power, and we annually promise ourselves better things.

Amid the hilarities of the hour there come to us serious thoughts. Laughter, amusement, pleasure have a conspicuous place in the religious life. Be sad when you must, but be glad whenever you can. The sadness will come of itself, unbidden, but the gladness must be sought, and it is a duty to search for it until it is found. But behind the smiles, the frivolities, the gayeties, every reasoning soul finds food for grave questioning.

To the youth come moments when the vision of great possibilities visits him. Life is stern, grave, laborious. He dreams of success and stirs his inner depths with the determination to make it his. But what shall the success be? Wealth, fame, position? These are well enough and quite worthy our utmost effort. Still, if we have only wealth or fame or position, yea, if we have all three in our grasp, they are not enough. Without manliness, honesty, self-respect, the ability to look back on the path we have traveled without a sigh, they count as nothing when the soul criticises and measures itself. A life of moral principle, of honor, of even handed justice, is the only life worth living. Therefore, with all your striving, let nobility of heart, an unblemished career, be your guiding star.

To the man in middle life the question asks itself on such a day as this, What have I done to make the world better for my living in it? Peasant or merchant, learned or illiterate, that question must be answered, and the answer comes with an armful of joy or of regret. One can make his character great and noble in whatever station he may be placed, and character is the only thing that lasts. Death cannot change it, for it walks through the valley of shadows to the throne of God, to be accepted there. On this bright morning if we can congratulate our own souls on what they have achieved we have a new year blessing that comes straight from heaven.

To the aged there is nothing left but the future. The past has gone beyond recall and to-morrow beckons. In the sweet faith that the sun will rise again and that we shall rise with it the winter points to spring. There is no sadness though the journey draws to a close, for the Beyond opens up its glories and with a single step we shall be with our loved ones once more. If we have done our work well we shall go hence with joy.

For the young, therefore, and for the aged, and for all, there is but one wish—that the new year will find us strong for its duties and ready to reap the harvest in the field in which Providence has placed us.

GEORGE H. HEPWORTH.

Traces Spiritualism In All Forms of Religion.

At the First Spiritual Church at Prospect avenue and Jersey street, Buffalo, N. Y., on January 5, the pastor, Moses Hull, preached a sermon on "The World's Upward March from Paganism, via Papacy and Protestantism to Spiritualism." In part Mr. Hull said:

"I am to talk to you to-night on the progress of the world from the lower to the higher, from Paganism, through Papacy and Protestantism to Spiritualism. The history of almost any great thinker in the world is the history of the world in epitome. As thinkers advance from the less to the more matured so the world is constantly maturing in its thinking power.

"This world once could not produce a man. The sea bore sentient fruit before animal life began on the land, and the land was peopled with mastodons long before it produced a man. The earth produced men who knew when they were hungry and when they were cold, long before it could produce a Shakspeare. As far back as history carries us man has been a worshiper, he has recognized something beyond and above himself, and has looked to that power for help in times of need. Gods were at one time believed to be material beings. The world could see nothing spiritual only as they saw it in the material. Spiritual ideas were gradually evolved, and all nations and peoples were more or less connected in their religious thought.

"Many of the doctrines of the Old Testament originated in Egypt and in Babylon. I could present history by the hour to prove these assertions. The Escenese or Therepeutans, which were none other than what the world to-day calls Christians, were popular in Egypt centuries before Christ was born.

"A writer says: 'It manifestly appears from the testimony of Philo, the Jew, who himself was an Ascenian, that that sect was in a flourishing condition at Alexandria when our Savior was upon earth.' Eusebius says, 'Those ancient Therepeutans were Christians, and their writings were our gospels and epistles.'

"Again he says: 'The sacred writings used by this sect were none other than our gospels, and the writings of our apostles.' Bishop Marsh says, 'Our gospels were drawn from the gospels of the Escenese.'

"I have before proved that our Christmas and our Easter were an outgrowth from heathen festivals. Sunday, the day Christians keep as the Sabbath, was the heathen dies solees, or day of the sun. I think the Catholic church originated as honestly and in as pure motives as any other church in the world.

"Protestantism has become more and more progressive until it has blossomed out in Spiritualism. I may truly say Spiritualism is Protestantism gone to seed. Spiritualism takes neither churches nor bibles as authority. It knows no authority outside of the soul itself. It says live true to your own soul, then you can trust it. Every man can have an inspiration which will guide him as unerringly as the instinct of a bird will guide it upon its wing."

Passed to Spirit Life.

The McMinnville News, Oregon, has the following:

William E. Haight was born at Rockford, Ill., Oct. 20, 1861, being the son of Elias and Susie Haight. He submitted to a surgical operation at St. Vincent's hospital, Tuesday, Dec. 17, and died the Saturday following at 7:30 p. m. His remains were brought back Sunday morning and the funeral at his home, Tuesday, Dec. 24, at 2:30 p. m. was conducted by Charles Grissen, and Ivan Daniels, a personal friend, reading a short paper which the deceased had written for the occasion. His remains will be taken to Portland on Thursday morning, where, in accordance with his expressed desire, they will be cremated.

Mr. Haight was a gentleman of quiet and studious disposition, gentle, kind and affectionate in his nature, endearing himself to and winning the respect of all with whom he came in contact. He was a man of sterling temperance, integrity and honesty. His religion was the religion of doing good to humanity, and his firm faith and belief in a future life have made him unafraid of death. Such lives have not been in vain, for the good that they have done shall surely live after them.

The following is a copy of the letter written by Mr. Haight to be read after his death:

To My Beloved Ones:—

In view of the fact that I am about to undergo an operation more or less dangerous and as there is a possibility that it may not be successful, it is perhaps well I express my wishes in certain matters.

All that I possess I wish my dear companion, my wife Nettie, to have except a few mementoes which I wish some of my dear friends to have among whom I would name my brother Louie, Uncle Sam Haight, Bessie Major, Lena Smith and Fred Maxwell.

I wish all services for me to be very simple; I would have no display; if there be an address I would prefer that it be Spiritualistic in character. I would like to have the poem, "Call Me Not Dead," which is pasted in the book "Rending the Vail," read as a general expression of my ideas. I favor cremation, and I do not wish to be remembered only by those who care to remember me, or those who must remember me for some little good I may have done, I would as soon that my dust at once mix with common earth or be allowed to nourish some rose, that being my favorite flower.

To one and all of my friends I say do not mourn me; be as bright and cheerful as you can, there is enough of sadness in life at the best. To her who stands first in my affections I would say, forget your sorrow for me by trying to make some one else happy.

I realize that my mistakes have been many—I regret that I have not done more to make the world better for my having lived. But for the change called death I have no fear, no dread. I do not flatter myself that I am better than most of my fellow-men. I expect to suffer for the wrong that I have done, but I would rather do so than to have done anyone an injury and they go "Scot free." Beyond the grave I hope for life, justice and progress which will, necessarily, bring happiness. To all my friends and loved ones, I bid a temporary farewell.

RENDING THE VAIL

A Most Remarkable Book Concerning the Existence of Man, and All Things, and All Being

It Was Written by Materialized Forms at the House of J. H. Pratt, Spring Hill, Kansas, William W. Aber Being the Medium.

"Rending the Vail" is pronounced by Col. R. T. Van Horn, of Kansas City, Mo., as a most remarkable work. That Col. Van Horn is fully competent to judge, we will say that he has been a member of congress for four sessions, an editor of a leading daily, and a profound thinker along scientific lines. He says:

"The principal contributors to the book are four in number: Dr. W. H. Reed, who is called the chemical control of the medium; William Denton, Thomas Paine and Michael Faraday. There are numerous others giving a few incidental and mostly personal messages or dissertations on scientific, philosophic, religious, theologic and occult topics—from world-building, the origin of life, or religions, of scientific discovery, and the laws of cosmos or nature—in fact the entire field of human thought. The limitation seemed to be only that of the spectators to ask questions.

"In addition to this mass of messages, there are in the book about sixty illustrations—44 of them portraits. These were drawn by a form standing out in the room at a desk, the form or personality to be sketched at the doorway of the cabinet and the finished picture handed to one of the circle and filed away by the secretary.

"What will attract the attention of even the non-Spiritualist reader is that the topics treated by Prof. Denton, Thomas Paine and Prof. Faraday, are in kind, in thought and style with those to which their active lives in this world were devoted—in literary character as different here as in their works extant on our book-shelves.

"The Spiritualist press and its contributors are just now discussing a number of questions as to the nature of spirit, of spirit return; the want of agreement between those returning as to conditions in their present world; the limitations—that the organism of the medium imposes upon communication, and various kindred questions. All these are treated, some of them very fully, but all rationally understandable. Also phenomena, inspiration and such, to many, knotty subjects, are freely and fully discussed.

"The work is not written by the medium nor by any one connected with the society or circle. All was delivered by personalities distinct from either, written down by the secretary as spoken, or if in writing, filed away. At the next meeting the minutes in full were read, corrected, or criticised by those present and by the authors, and when approved by both laid away for the book.

"The work is unique in the history of spirit communication. Swedenborg, Andrew Jackson Davis, and Maria King wrote under inspiration. Newbrough wrote Oahspe automatically by typewriter. "Rending the Vail" was written and spoken by full-form personalities and is printed as given. One remarkable thing about the writing may not be amiss here. As high as 1,200 words a minute were written by actual timing by the watch.

"It is but just to the secretary to say that his work has been admirably done—not only faithfully and efficiently, but with excellent taste. There are no dogmatic parentheses, no interpolations or ipse dixits of the scribe. He simply states that "a form purporting to be" So-and-So, "appeared and delivered the following"—stating whether it was oral or in writing.

"In reading the book, and I have read it all, this modest, self-retiring, literal rendering of these extraordinary happenings by the secretary has been a source of constant admiration. It adds character to the book and inspires constant confidence in the integrity that from the first page to the last enhances the respect and interest of the reader."

This remarkable book, "Rending the Vail," is for sale at the office of The Progressive Thinker. Price, $2. It is a large volume of 500 pages.

BEYOND THE VAIL

A Sequel to "Rending the Vail."

The two volumes together as a record of practically obtained facts demonstrating the claims of Modern Spiritualism as to post mortal survival, are unique and overwhelming.

Every communication is from a full materialized spirit form, in good light, and either spoken audibly or written in full view by the form. There is not an automatic or trance message in the book.

It is illustrated by several engravings, the originals of which were drawn in the presence of the circle by a full form materialized spirit artist.

BEYOND THE VAIL is, as a rule, the experiences of spirits in both worlds—their own account of their lives on earth and their progress after death to their present condition of freedom from earth conditions. The narratives are intensely interesting, instructive and often highly dramatic.

Coincident with these are the profoundly philosophical comments of the controlling spirits of the seances. Prof. William Denton, Thomas Paine, Dr. W. H. Reed and others—covering, law, medicine, jurisprudence, theology and metaphysics. There are no books in existence of like character or of higher authority. Price, by mail, $1.75.

THE BEAUTIFUL SOUVENIR VOLUME,

By A. LEAH UNDERHILL,
(Of the Fox Family.)

The Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism.

Thirty-three chapters, 477 pages, superbly printed, and bound in colors and gold, 15 illustrations, 5 steel engraved portraits of the celebrated Fox Family, a full page engraving of the old house at Hydesville, which to this day, by the act of its wealthy and respected owner, Artemas Hyde, Esq., bears the inscription, "Here Spiritualism Originated in 1848."

A complete history of the initiation of the movement known as Modern Spiritualism, from the epochal period which dates from March 31, 1848. Since that day, starting from a small country village in western New York, Spiritualism has made its way against tremendous obstacles around the civilized globe.

Only a limited number of copies of this rare book, now out of print, are to be had, and these can be obtained only at this office. Those who remit at once will receive a copy, post paid, at the GREATLY REDUCED PRICE OF $1.

Note.—By failure in 1885 to complete contract with the author, a large portion of the edition was left unbound, and so remained for a number of years, when they were rescued and bound at additional cost, hence this valuable contribution to the cause of Spiritualism was not properly presented to the Spiritualistic public, and a host of investigators have not had the opportunity of securing a copy until the present time. Do not fail to send for a copy at once. J. R. FRANCIS,

LIFE BEYOND DEATH

Being a Review of

The World's Beliefs on the Subject, a Consideration of Present Conditions of Thought and Feeling,

Leading to the Question as o Whether It Can Be Demonstrated as a Fact.—To Which Is Added an Appendix Containing Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

BY MINOT J. SAVAGE, D. D.

8vo, Cloth, 342 Pages.

After a review of the beliefs held in the past concerning life beyond death, Dr. Savage takes up the present conditions of belief and considers the agnostic reaction from the extreme "other-worldliness" which it replaced, which was in turn followed by the Spiritualistic reaction against agnosticism. He points out the doubts concerning the doctrine of immortality held by the churches and the weakness of the traditional creeds and the loosening of their hold upon the people. He then considers the probabilities of a future life, probabilities which, as he admits, fall short of demonstration. The volume includes a consideration of the work of the Society for Psychical Research and also an appendix giving some of the author's own personal experiences in this line. Dr. Savage holds, as a provisional hypothesis, that continued existence is demonstrated, and that there have been at least some well authenticated communications from persons in the other life. The chief contents of the volume are as follows:

Primitive Ideas—Ethnic Beliefs—The Old Testament and Immortality—Paul's Doctrine of Death and the Other Life—Jesus and Immortality—The Other World and the Middle Ages—Protestant Belief Concerning Death and the Life Beyond—The Agnostic Reaction—The Spiritualistic Reaction—The World's Condition and Needs as to Belief in Immortality—Probabilities Which Fall Short of Demonstration—The Society for Psychical Research and the Immortal Life—Possible Conditions of Another Life—Some Hints as to Personal Experiences and Opinions.

IN THE LECTURE FIELD.

Report and Notes from the State President of Kansas,

Since my last report I have held series of lectures in Galena and Empire City, Kans. In consequence of the severe weather and the holiday season I did not have so large audiences at Galena as I otherwise should have had; but those who attended were much interested and desired I should come again.

At Empire City I had an increasing interest from start to finish, and the seating capacity of Sweet's hall was entirely occupied. The interest extended over the entire city and was a matter of every-day discussion in all the public places. In this place I gave in all ten lectures, covering a large field of biblical inquiry.

While I was holding meetings in Galena I spoke twice in Joplin, once for Sister Scovell, and once in East Joplin for Sister Field. Sister Scovell has been holding meetings regularly when not otherwise engaged at Joplin, for three or four years, and has a large attendance and is doing much good. Beside being a superior trance speaker, Sister Scovell is an unexcelled platform test medium, and she has been a great assistance to me in my work in Galena and Empire City.

Sister Field has been located in East Joplin only about one year and in that time she has built up a large society in that place who hold their meetings in a tent 18x52 feet in size which is thoroughly packed at each meeting, and arrangements are perfected for building a $2,000 tabernacle the coming summer. During each day of the week her rooms are filled with people who come to her for sittings, that they may hear from their friends.

On last evening, Jan. 8, I lectured in this tent again to a large audience, and the lecture was received with much enthusiasm, and by request I am to remain over till next Sunday and lecture again. It is a pleasure to talk to this people, they are so zealous and earnest. They have congregational singing, which puts them in rapport with each other and the speaker, and in every way they are a help to an inspirational lecturer.

When Brother and Sister Kates come into Kansas they will be wanted at these several points. While here I made my headquarters at Brother and Sister B. G. Sweet's, Empire City, whose souls are absorbed in the work. Sister Sweet is a good test medium who has been giving her time free to inquirers till she can no longer afford to do so, as she has little time to attend to her other duties. My advice to her was to make a price sufficient to shut out all mere curiosity seekers.

From here I go next week to Chanute, Kans., and from there I hope to get to Kansas City, if I do not get switched off. At least I expect to bring up there before I return home. From thence I hope to go to Brownell and Ellis on my homeward route. As I do not know how long I shall be detained at each place, I can fix no definite time for teaching these several places.

While in the lecture field, I find it difficult to take time to note the several criticisms of things I have said. I noticed about a month ago some one lecturing me about my several articles on religion. I could not then give the article the attention I should have done and since that I have not been able to see it. As I remember, however, the writer charged that religion was the cause of all the wars in the world, or something of the kind. I think the intention was to make that charge with reference to Christianity, so-called, really the Roman and Protestant religions. The writer seems to have taken a superficial view of the matter. There are only two of the great religions that have been propagated by the sword—the Christian, after it had become paganized, and the Mohammedan. When Christianity had adopted Mithraism as a cult, attaching their superstitions to the name Christian, it became an adulteration of both, and neither of the two should be charged with its misdeeds. The Mithraists never fought; early Christians suffered Martyrdom rather rather than take up arms against their fellow-men.

I find another criticism in The Progressive Thinker of January 11, from the pen of my brother and fellow-worker, W. B. Wagner, of Topeka. He seems to be somewhat piqued concerning what I said about the over-done medium business, and intimates that it is because I get no audiences that I was was drawn out to say what I did. I shall not resort to any personalities in reply. It is not a question of what good I as a lecturer do, or whether I am a failure in the lecture field, but it is entirely a question of utility. I mentioned a place where I had been, where Spiritualism was regarded by the outside world as on a par with gypsying, and where some of the Spiritualists were anxious to become the gypsies, that they might thereby rake in the coin, having no understanding of the philosophy, nor having any wish to know anything about it; a class of people who did not take a single Spiritualist paper, and who had no use for a lecture on Spiritualism, and where the last medium who visited them called his mediumship a "trick"—another word for fraud—in consequence of which the laugh was on them throughout the community. The people of this city do not know that there is an intellectual side to the question, and they are in a poor way to find out, unless they should drop into a Spiritual meeting in some other city.

As to the claim of Brother Wagner that the philosophy first comes from the medium side, to a certain extent that may be true. But it seldom comes through commercial mediumship. Any lecturer's experience with that class of mediums will bear me out in this assertion. My observation is that physical and phenomenal mediums have a very indifferent idea of our philosophy, and at their seances the Gospel hymns, such as "Jesus paid It All," "There Is a Fountain Filled With Blood," or something just as absurd are in use, to the exclusion of our inspired music and poetry. As to the statement that I learned my philosophy from phenomenal mediums, probably that may be so, as I gather something from every source that comes my way, but I can assure him if my only teachers were mediums, I fear I should yet be in the dark on many things that I now know something about. All our best teachers in Modern Spiritualism have been hard students, and what they have learned from mediums has been more by observation of the phenomena accompanying them than from any oral instruction.

Brother Wagner insists that the phenomena should precede the lectures. My experience, and I believe the experience of a majority of the public workers, does not sustain his idea. Curiosity seekers or those trying to get the better of their neighbors in board of trade gambling, seldom make good Spiritualists. First get people interested in Spiritualism as a religion, as a system of ethics, and they become inquirers of the truths concerning a future life, we have made an opening whereby mediumship may become useful. People who are concerned only as to things of this world have no more business in Spiritualism than a child has with fire. And people who according to church theories believe that the moment one becomes a spirit, he or she becomes infallible have no more business with Spiritualism than an insane man.

But you take the manifestations as they are conducted at Spring Hill, Kansas, in the presence of W. W. Aber, medium, and I will hold up both my hands. Here every favorable condition was had. There was no incentive to fraud to make money, as none but known friends were admitted. The personnel of the circle was the same with only occasional alterations during the entire time of the sittings. I would rather have the accounts of these seances with Mr. Aber than a hundred sittings in promiscuous audiences with the same medium. Indeed a hundred sittings with the same medium and a mixed audience would badly bore me. And I would rather have a private sitting with Sister Inez Wagner, Brother Wagner's wife, who, by the way, is a superior medium, than to be in a dozen audiences where she reads pellets blindfolded, and I feel sure there is no fraud in her readings. But she convinces no more than she does when she gives old form platform tests, and some one is always charging either fraud or mind-reading. Indeed, for her sake I wish she would give up her trumpet and pellet manifestations, as well as for the sake of the good she will do, and rather than all I would that she would take the lecture field, as I saw about her one time a spirit that wanted her to do so. She will not make so much money, but she will do more real good, and that is what she should aim to do.

In conclusion, when Brother Wagner has been around as I have, and had the apologies and explanations to make concerning overdone mediumship assisted by the personal efforts of the medium, as some of our lecturers have to do, he will be sorry that commercial mediumship has crowded out real Spiritualism as it has.

A Faithful Worker Promoted.

Brother Frederick L. Hildreth, familiarly known as "Fred" by those most intimate with him, was released from material things on Sunday night, December 1 last, after a hard struggle with typhoid fever lasting nearly four weeks. His final release was well in keeping with his entire material existence, peaceful and calm, perfectly in harmony with all nature. He well knew the future result of a harmonious material life. He had been well prepared for the final change, for a long time.

He was a true student of nature, and everything, no matter how trivial, had a lesson for him; and if he did not profit by the lessons at all times, then it was because of the conditions with which he was surrounded, over which he had no control, and if he could not gain some little expansion of soul at such times, he would readily seek the reasons of his failure, and true philosopher that he was, make the most of the situation. At such times it was a pleasure to be in his presence and listen to his grandly expressed thoughts to his listeners who might be situated similarly to him.

It was his pride to give consolation to the mentally afflicted, and had he been rich in material wealth, his charity would have known no bounds; none were ever turned from him who honestly sought his spiritual consolation. He was a great worker, and few ever visited him and found him idle, his time in late years being fully occupied in either reading or writing.

For several years past he has been confined to his home, where his devoted wife has been his constant companion and nurse. During these long years of confinement, the result of his army experience in the war of the rebellion (he being color sergeant of the Fifteenth Massachusetts Volunteers, where he saw three years of active service), he wrote several hundred poems, some of them have been published in a beautiful volume entitled "Echoes From My Song Realm." All his poems have a vein of the Occult. They embrace many subjects, his army life being vividly portrayed, making his poems of great interest to all old soldiers, as well as Spiritualists and liberalists. The sales of his book has been limited owing to his want of capital. It is now hoped the book can be placed on the market and many sold, and thereby help the financial stress of his faithful wife left waiting to follow when her grand work is finished.

Brother Fred seemed especially inspired, and all through his material existence he has written his inspirations in prose as well as poetry. His writings have been printed in spiritual and secular papers for a number of years, for all his writings were in defense of the downtrodden and afflicted.

He was taught in his earliest life the truths of a continued spiritual life beyond material life, by his mother, who was a true spiritual medium. As he developed to manhood he discovered his own mediumship, and knowing full well the sacredness as well as the value of his gift, he never betrayed his trust, nor allowed the heavenly gift to be soiled or polluted by low, base or grovelling material hypocrisy; yet his charity was so broad that if he learned of others who were endowed with a like gift, and they prostituted it in any manner, it was invariably his remark that, "He did not know the conditions which surrounded such, and perhaps they could not avoid such acts;" at the same time he would say, as if speaking to himself, "I would try to control myself." He would never accuse the spirits for any of his own acts, and if he learned of mediums declaring they were compelled or influenced to do some reprehensible act, he would say, he did not think it a good idea to lay too much to the spirits.

Brother Fred was sixty years and eleven months old. His remains were cremated at Forest Hill, Boston, Mass., according to his especial desire expressed frequently by him during his long confinement.

Miss Lizzie Harlow as the spiritual speaker, and Massachusetts State Senator A. S. Rowe as a representative of the G. A. R., delivered most eloquent addresses at his late residence, No 1 Hall street, Worcester, Mass.

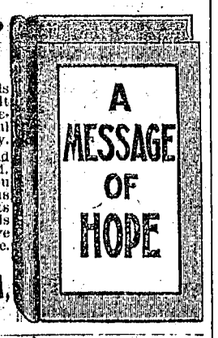
HEALTH RESTORED



The entire country is astonished at the wonderful cures perfected through the method originated by Dr. J. M. Peebles, the Grand Old Man of Battle Creek, Mich. This science is a subtle force in nature, combined with magnetic medicines, and called by the eminent doctor,

PSYCHIC SCIENCE

It has been termed the greatest pain reliever known. In a perfectly natural manner it builds up the system and restores health. It makes no difference how serious or hopeless the case may seem, there is positive hope in this grand science. It has restored the deaf, blind and lame, cured the paralytic, and those suffering from Bright's Disease, Consumption, Stomach Trouble, Catarrh, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Heart Disease, Rheumatism, Female Troubles, as well as men and women addicted to the liquor, morphine and other vile habits.

Geo. H. Weeks, of Cleveland, Ohio, sends heartfelt thanks for restoration to health after suffering from nervous prostration and insomnia for years; he says he now enjoys health and restful sleep every night. Mrs. J. A. Rust, of Itasca, Minn., cured of uric acid poisoning in two month's treatment writes: "I am better than in years, and each day brings new health and strength. I will refer all ailing ones to you." Mary A. Earl, Crawford, Mich., suffering from pronounced female difficulties and kidney disease, says: "I took your treatment three months and it has been a success in my case. I am indeed grateful to you for my recovery." C. E. Davis, Woodman, N. H., who suffered all the miseries of a dyspeptic, writes that as the result of Dr. Peebles' treatment, he had not missed a meal since last March. D. W. Bridgman, of Del Norte, Col., writing Sept. 30, after a three months' course, "When I began treatment with Dr. Peebles' Institute of Health I was a cripple, unable to walk but little with a cane. Now I am able to walk with ease. Some days ten or fifteen miles. My general health is excellent. I can hardly find words to express my gratitude as previously I had tried everything I could hear of and got no relief." Mrs. Isaac Varney, Dover, N. H., a sufferer of spinal trouble and nerve exhaustion, writes she would not go back to the state of health she was in before taking this treatment for all the world. Solomon Fried, of Vanderbilt, California, cured of neuralgia and catarrh, says: "I am well and a thousand times obliged to you."

"A Message of Hope"

writen by Dr. J. M. Peebles, in a plain and concise manner, tells you exactly how and where you can gain perfect health; in fact, it gives you the key to the grandest knowlege known to man. Remember, this book costs you nothing, and it reveals wonderful secrets and makes the impossibilities of yesterday realities of to-day.

ABSOLUTELY FREE Send your name and adress and leading symptoms to Dr. J. M. Peebles and his associates and you will receive full diagnosis without any cost whatever, as well as this grand book, which is beautifully illustrated, rich in all its details, containing matter which will be a revelation to you. PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

Passed to the higher life, December 22, 1901, Mrs. F. Laura, wife of O. A. Page, at their residence, 6427 Jefferson avenue, aged 56 years. She had been a Spiritualist for over thirty years, taking active part in its labors, especially the lyceum work. The body was cremated, Dec. 24, at Graceland. Services being held in the chapel, were conducted by Mrs. S. T. DeWolf.

On the first day of 1902, I met Rev. O. P. Kellogg at the home of the Barnsdall family in Titusville, to commemorate his spiritual birth.

Wm. Barnsdall is, in many respects, a remarkable man. He would be 92 years old the 6th of February. He has been twice elected mayor of the city, and a Spiritualist without an adjective for forty-five years. His home has been a haven of rest for the poor, the desolate and oppressed, and especially for mediums and sensitives. His last hours were peaceful, and he was willing to go, exclaiming, "It is all so beautiful." His beautiful wife survives him. She has been a pillar of strength to him in all his humanitarian works.

LYMAN C. HOWE.

Since the never failing liberator, Death, has summoned and taken our beloved sister, A. Benelle Dean Diefert, from her earthly home at Pilot Point, Texas, Dec. 23, 1901, to that realm immortal, let it be recorded in the minutes of the Spiritualist Society of Galveston, Texas, published in the Spiritual press and sent to the bereaved husband and parents that we do most sincerely feel ourselves in heartfelt sympathy with each who mourns because of this bereavement. May the balm of the knowledge of individual consciousness after transition allay your grief and help to, in time, illuminate the material vacancy with a shining spiritual presence.

H. A. LANDES, President.

RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

By S. Weil. Cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents. This is a work of great value, written by one of the keenest, most powerful and most truly religious minds of the day. It is particularly a work which should be put into the hands of those who have freed themselves from the dogmas of orthodoxy and from the dogmas of materialistic science, for it will strengthen the conviction of the free mind that mind and senses are not the whole of life.

The chapters reveal a new method in psychic and spiritual research. They show vivid glimpses of a stupendous moral cosmos that will supersede moral confusion, that only verifiable tenets can survive, and the childhood period of faith and fancy will be superseded by knowledge and facts.

Esoteric Lessons.

An Argument Against Physical Causation.

The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely physical health upon a purely psychical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom, insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief in which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

FROM INDIA TO THE PLANET MARS.

A MOST REMARKABLE WORK.

Fascinating, Interesting and Instructive.

By Th. Flournoy, Professor of Psychology in the University of Geneva.

"This is an account of the experiments with the 'Geneva Medium,' Helene Smith. In her trances she lives the dual existence of an Indian princess and of an inhabitant of the planet Mars. Professor Flournoy and his fellow scientists have for more than five years experimented with these astounding physical phenomena."

This is a work of thrilling interest. It has excited great attention in this country and in Europe. Price $1.50. For sale at this office.

INVISIBLE HELPERS

A Very Excellent and Comprehensive Work.

One from the Theosophical Standpoint.

This work, "Invisible Helpers," written by C. W. Leadbeater, the remarkable English psychic (whose lectures have graced the columns of The Progressive Thinker), is certainly very interesting and suggestive throughout. It treats of the "Universal Belief in the Invisible Helpers," the "Angel Story," "Work Among the Dead," "What Lies Beyond." The work is neatly bound in cloth, and the price is 55 cents.

THE POWER OF WEALTH.

A Lecturette by Hudson Tuttle.

The age of war culminated in the age of wealth. War was for conquest; for dominion; for the desire to rule as a tyrant over slaves. It became the ally of religion; and the Middle Ages, from the Crusades which hurled Europe on Asia, to the last struggle of puritanism, was inflamed by religious zeal of sect against sect.

War was destructive. It destroyed the continuous means of support. It gave the accumulations of one people to be wasted by another. Often it killed the slave, and thus starved the master.

It was discovered that there were other means of enslavement than the sword. The inventive genius of mankind turned to the creation of machines to do the work of slaves. It has wrought well, and to-day untold millions of laborers under the lash could not accomplish the labor of these tireless engines. They have made fabulous wealth possible, for their fortunate and accidental owner receives their products, for the yard of cloth woven by fingers of steel, is even more valuable than that produced by the slow process of manual labor.

The measureless bounties of nature, the iron, coal, copper, oil, are seized by the few under the protection of laws made for their benefit, and royal bounty exacted of the many who must use them. Wealth is power, so unlimited for the gratification of every sensual pleasure, that as a nation we have rushed in its mad pursuit. The child is trained from the cradle to believe that the acquisition of wealth is the one aim of life; not only to love money for its own sake, but for the power and emoluments it brings. Men are nominated for office of trust and responsibility, not because they have ability, but because they have wealth to secure election. A barrel of money is more potent than honesty, worth or intelligence.

Moneybags can do as he pleases, without danger of being out of style, for he makes the style. He is the autocrat of America, and receives the homage of the nation.

He steals a railroad, and founds a theological college; corners a grain market, bringing wide-spread suffering, and builds a church; wrings the last energy from the slaving hand of labor, and subscribes to the high salary of the gospel minister who is most careful not to mention the ways of this world when he softly dilates on the golden streets of the next.

Genius, if it gain applause must know how to convert cents into eagles. Then it is dined and wined and wears soft raiment; may, if skilled in the art of helping itself, the swinish quality of "rooting its way," get high office and emoluments.

The success of an Edison is measured by the money he makes out of his inventions. Genius delving after truth for truth's own sake is refused a crust from the meanest servant in an Astor's kitchen.

Wealth is a powerful agent. It represents stored energy. As the product and result of labor, it can be transformed again and again into the labor which it commands. We do not disparage it; we scorn the folly of making it the end of life. In this, man is unlike all other animals. The bee gathers a store of honey against the wants of winter; the squirrel lays by a store of nuts. It is satisfied when its needs are supplied. You never heard of one hoarding a thousand or a million bushels of nuts. That would be impossible, for he cannot gather them alone, and cannot hire help. The forest is common domain, and no one squirrel can monopolize the products.

It would be equally impossible for man to accumulate wealth if he was not protected in his monopoly and able to hire labor by giving it a part of that which by the laws of creation, is its own. No man by honest labor can become vastly wealthy, more than a squirrel can gather a million bushel of nuts. To become so he must accumulate more than he returns as equivalent.

If a squirrel could say, "Here, I own this forest. It came down to me from the antediluvian squirrel saved by Noah. If you wish to gather nuts, you can do so by giving me half," he would have a monopoly. The trees are loaded with nuts, the ground covered, and numerous hungry squirrels with hungry broods. They dare not touch a nut, for the owner has law, and the influence of education and prejudice on his side, carefully instilled for innumerable generations, that he has "vested rights," a "divine charter" which he and his offspring have as a birthright, and so strong is this idea that the squirrels will kill each other for touching a single nut. They labor constantly, old and young, carrying one nut to their own nest, and two to the hoard of the autocrat. They do all the work, and receive the smallest share. But they have become so mentally dwarfed they pay their "rent" and are thankful that it is two-thirds and not nine-tenths that is exacted of them.

The squirrel is satisfied with the acorns it can accumulate with its own labor. It has no perverted desires. Search the forests and you will find no venerable aristocratic squirrel guarding a mouldering pile of nuts and acorns. There is no forest law which says, "for every nut you eat you must bring one to me, or if you cannot find one and are starving, you may take one from this pile if you agree to bring me ten next year."

Unfortunately, as absurd as this appears applied to squirrels, it is the rule with man. The aristocrat may after hoarding for years, untouched by the destitution around him, on the brink of the grave, leave all to an orphan asylum, or a charity hospital, seeking posthumous fame. He should be branded with infamy, for had it not been for rent and interest, for profits never earned, for "vested rights" which are rights of the robber, there would be no orphans to care for, or beggars at the door of charity. A Carnegie would return his enormous gains to society, in churches, libraries, and doled pensions to those whose labor won it all. Is it liberality, or penalty to conscience? How much better to have paid his workmen the wages they really earned, and thus made them independent, than to have taken the lion's share, and now make them recipients of his charity? It is justice, not charity, that is demanded.

Colleges, asylums, libraries, churches founded by Moneybags on his deathbed, is the homage conscience pays to justice, but is a contemptible atonement. The most lamentable is that such are taken as examples. Integrity of character is at a discount. Conscience is a bad guide. Play your cards well, turn a trump if you can, and if you cannot, keep one in your sleeve. Get all you can, and keep all you get. At last when you can have no further use for it, make yourself famous for charity. You will thereby have enjoyment through life, and gain a posthumous name like Peabody, who in her hour of direst need sold his country, and gained such notoriety by his bestowals of a small part of his ill-gotten gains, that his body was brought home in a government ship and received with reverent welcome.

In business, religion, so far from being an assurance of honesty, is a cloak for rascality. The bond is far more negotiable than the word of the "sanctified." Business should be the highest expression of honor and integrity, and yet how often we hear repeated, "No one expects honesty in trade. There is no chance of success for the honest dealer."

Dishonor to get the dollar, because the dollar in hand atones for the lie! Spurious wares, shoddy, warranted pure fibre, jute woven into silk, vile rags into woolens, cotton prepared to feel like flannel, sugar made of glucose and white earth, coffee adulterated with peas, spices with dirt, flour with alum, to the end of the catalogue. Ingenuity in fraud gains the penny at the price of honor and human health and life.

Against this mad current, which religion as expressed by the churches has rather aided than resisted, there is one great force opposed. It is the new views of life here and hereafter of the the spiritual philosophy. That philosophy teaches that as an immortal intelligence, started on a journey which will have only begun when worlds grow old, he cannot afford to waste or divert his attention to the things which have relation only to the hour. He cannot afford to be selfish, unjust, unkind, forgetful of others. By birthright, he is an angel and should scorn every influence, thought and action leading away from that ideal.

OUR HISTORY.

Facts in Various Phases Wanted.

After the phenomenal data are all in, and the fundamental facts established by evidence that cannot be questioned, other phases of the spiritual movement will need data, and these may be accumulating while phenomena are to the front.

Among these are striking cases of legal injustice in denying the validity of bequests, on the ground that a Spiritualist is necessarily of unsound mind; cases of illegal proceedings to incarcerate mediums or believers in insane asylums;

Prosecutions for healing the sick without medicine or with medicine, by spirit guidance or clairvoyance. Arrests for practicing mediumship without license, and the outcome in each case. Some of the points made by attorneys, and rulings of the courts.

Magnetic physicians and clairvoyant doctors in different states and localities, and leading features of their work, or striking cases of success in healing "incurable" cases. The per cent of successes or failures. Only strong, clear cases, well authenticated, are desirable. I have enough within my own experience to fill a volume, but I want the best cases from all sections, to select from.

As many facts as possible, showing the direct influence of spirits, or of the teachings of Spiritualism, in which reforms have been accomplished, 1, of individuals; 2, of institutions; 3, of governments.

Cases of ostracism by religious bodies and the press. Striking misrepresentations by the press, and refusals to give a hearing to the advocates. Facts to substantiate every phase in the fifty years of evolution and progress of Modern Spiritualism. This is a work for all of us to share as we have data.

THE GLAD TO-MORROW.

The hopes I dream the glad to-morrow
Seem always the best,
And though my heart may sorrow,
The sunset's golden west
There beams upon my vision rare
The picture of unseen lands
To dissipate my weight of care,
And warm with loving hands.

The poor, weak hearts repining
For comfort and for rest
Know not the worth of living,
Nor deeds that make one blest,
But he who seeks to gain
Of Time life's sweetest bliss,
Will learn there's joy in pain
The good we would not miss.

Though now I see in part
The purpose of God's will,
I know his loving heart
Is ever with me still;
And wheresoe'er I roam
In shadow or in shine
I know I'm not alone,
Strong arms around me twine.

AN EARNEST APPEAL FOR THE MORRIS PRATT INSTITUTE

To those who are in favor of a more enlightened Spiritualism, and particularly to those who would place our public wokers on an educational equality with the platform workers in other societies and churches, the following remarks are addressed.

Friends and Brethren:—Some of us have seen, with great regret, the diminishing of our cause in the estimation of the world. There is, pehaps, not one city in the United States where our audiences are as large, and our cause stands otherwise as high as it did thirty years ago. To prove this a list of cities and villages might be given, together with the state of our cause then and now.

Why is all this? I answer, in the first place Spiritualism has been run mainly on the show principle. People have gone to Spiritualist meetings more to feast their eyes and their ears instead of their reason. They have generally paid ten or fifteen cents at the door with the hope of getting the worth of their money in tests. Incompetent so-called mediums and speakers have occupied, and sometimes disgraced our platforms, who with their bad grammar, bad logic, and general ignorant denunciations of almost every body and every thing, have driven the better, the wiser and the more unselfish people from our audiences and into the more liberal churches.

A full knowledge of these facts, and a growing conviction that under the present conditions these things can only get worse, has stimulated some of us to undertake to try to save and rebuild our cause. This can be done only by preparing our workers to present our glorious truths in an attractive manner. We have therefore preached and prayed and sighed and mourned for an opportunity to educate those who are to be our message bearers to the world, so that they can go before the world as mediums and speakers, who, instead of increasing the prejudice against our philosophy, as many of them do, can increase the interest, and draw the world to us.

Through the generosity of that octogenarian, Morris Pratt, of Whitewater, Wis., we now have a college building—one of which we are not ashamed. Now without the means to open our school the building is a "white elephant" on our hands.

This building was given to us on the condition that we use it for educational purposes along Spiritualistic lines, and that we raise ten thousand dollars as an endowment fund. After the matter was properly laid before Mr. Pratt he readily saw that we could not raise that fund and maintain a school at the same time; so he permitted us to go on and raise the fund, and use such portion of it as is necessary to run the school, and apply any surplusage we may have to the endowment fund. On all of this, Mr. Pratt may, when he sees that we are working earnestly, be depended upon to do his share. He does not design to be arbitrary, he only wishes to see that we are earnestly co-operating with him.

Now we want and must have money. We have determined to try to open the College as an Academy next September; and to run it as such until we get the means to open a first-class College where men and women can graduate in the various branches which go to make up what is called a "first-class education."

Our intention is now to open this fall, prepared to teach anything from the alphabet to Oratory, Philology, Logic, Rhetoric, Psychic Culture, Homiletics, and anything else necessary to fit one for the work we as Spiritualists are called to do. This takes money. Will you help us?

If every Spiritualist would contribute even as much as one dollar, we would be able to open our Academy next September, and have a large sum to deposit on the endowment fund. Will YOU do it? Five dollars makes you a member of the Morris Pratt Corporation for one year, after that one dollar per year keeps you a member in good standing, with the privilege of attending its annual meeting and taking part in its deliberations.

J. C. Bump, of Milwaukee, one of our trustees, and our treasurer, who has already contributed to our school, proposes to be one of a company of anywhere from one to one thousand persons who will pledge himself to annually contribute twenty-five dollars until the School is on a paying basis. I will do the same, and more. Others will join us in this work; will those who read this appeal do the same?

There are many who would be better off here and hereafter if they would make an annual donation of one hundred to five hundred dollars to this school. Every society in the United States should take at least one collection to aid this school. Every speaker should hold at least one meeting and every medium one seance and devote the total proceeds to this work.

No work that Spiritualism has ever attempted is more worthy or more important than this. As president of the Morris Pratt Institute, I plead with Spiritualists everywhere to make some sacrifice for this, the only school of the kind ever attempted among Spiritualists. Who will volunteer to keep one worthy young man or woman in this school? The tuition will cost only fifty dollars per term of thirty-six weeks. Board will not cost over one hundred and twenty-six dollars for the same length of time, thus making the total cost aside from railroad expenses, not to exceed one hundred and seventy-six dollars per year. Two years will graduate one for this work. The expense of board can be much reduced by two or three students uniting and renting a room and boarding themselves.

I am now, as president, devoting all of my spare time to this work, paying my own postage and working without salary. In addition, I will be one who, beside all that I have before promised, will keep one student in the school at my own expense. This I will cheerfully do as long as my earthly faculties hold out, and I can find the means to pay the expenses.

If friends of this institution are willing to sacrifice something in this direction, but have not the means just now to do so, let them send in their pledges to be paid any time during the present year. We wish to know at the earliest possible moment what can be done. We want to begin to advertise and solicit students.

Send your pledges and offerings to me at 72 York street, Buffalo, N. Y., or to our secretary, Mrs. Clara L. Stewart, at Whitewater, Wis., or to our treasurer, John C. Bump, 220 Mason street, Milwaukee, Wis. You will get a receipt for your money in a very few days after you have sent it.

Now, if ever Spiritualism needs to be saved from itself, that can be done only by self-sacrificing work along educational lines. Please do not wait. Let us hear from all who are interested in this work.

MOSES HULL.

AFTER DINNER.

What Was Said, and Some Comments.

On New Year's Day, we, like thousands of other folks, filed merrily into the parlor and everybody talked his level best and often several at a time. Pretty soon some one got astride of his ecclesiastical hobby and came riding into the very center of the occasion. Then we had it, "I know," "I think," "I believe," "Let me tell what I heard or read, or saw," etc. Just such a confab as you have often heard, nothing learned, nothing proved, nothing settled; all coming out of the same hole they went in. A very brilliant lady chimed in to say, "Well, I have traveled in many lands, and studied all the cults and religions that are now or ever was, and I can't find a true, good, beautiful, noble or lovely thing in any of them that I can't find in the Bible. I am orthodox; there I rest. It is (the Bible) a perfect guide, it is the word of God to me. Am I not right?"

All this sudden divine rush and gush caused them to say, "Yes, indeed, you are all right; stick to it; never let go," etc.

Here is my reply to all this, which she and others may read: Well, this volume teaches that God made apparently out of nothing the world in six days, that it will be burned up, sea and all disappear, and he will make again (out of nothing, I suppose) "a new heaven and a new earth"; it teaches that God made man in his own likeness and said he was "very good," and then in a short time saw his mistake, was sorry for it, and repented that he had made him at all! Shortly after this he destroyed the whole lot in a flood, and raised a new tribe that was very little if any better than the first he made. It teaches that (except a few) the whole race is doomed to perdition. It teaches that hereafter is no probation, or progress for souls to rise to higher and happier conditions. It teaches that if a good man dies with one sin unrepented of, his case is hopeless! It teaches that there are no ands nor rooms for the good and bad souls, that they are fixed and never allowed to converse, either to help or to be helped. It teaches that all souls who have not been so favored as to learn of Christ and his word shall be lost without reprieve! It teaches a local heaven and a local hell, a literal resurrection; a literal second coming of Christ, a literal judgment day, a literal burning up of the world and all of the wicked. It teaches a real person is Satan, and he, too, will also be destroyed this "day of judgment," "second coming," resurrection and destruction of the material cosmos. All this must take place before we can hope again to meet and converse with the loved ones gone before.

Cheerful thought, isn't it? It teaches that unless a man believes, repents, publicly professes religion, unless he joins the church, unless he prays, unless he is baptized and partakes of the sacrament or communion, unless he does all this and more, there is no hope for him. It also teaches that the soul is unconscious, from death to the resurrection of the body. All of which Spiritualists do most steadfastly NOT believe. And so we conclude that this book of books contains a storehouse of spiritual knowledge; it must be read as other books, in the light of good sense, sound reason and human experience as the book itself says, "Prove all things, hold fast that which is good."

Wisconsin Work

The work in Wisconsin has seemingly been at almost a standstill this winter, from the fact that no large meetings have been put on yet. H. D. Barrett, president of the N. S. A., has, however, been in the state all of the past month, and would gladly have responded to calls if the people had co-operated with us in our effort to put on meetings.

Mr. Barrett held very successful meetings in Portage, Beloit, Janesville, Sparta and LaCrosse; in the two latter places Will J. Erwood and I took part, and much good was done. We have endeavored to secure a first-class test medium, who would work as a missionary in the state, for the winter, but the cold climate is a barrier during this season of the year.

In a quiet way we are reaching as far as possible, and getting ready for the convention in Milwaukee in April. We will combine the convention with a mass-meeting, at which will be present some of the best talent we have on the Spiritualist platform. Headquarters will be established in one of the best hotels in the city, at reduced rates, and everything done to induce delegates from all parts of the state to be present. In the meantime I am anxious to hold meetings wherever the friends will arrange for me, and will answer calls for funerals, etc.

In addition to the state work, the school in Whitewater is claiming our attention, and very naturally appeals to our pride. It is the first time in the history of Spiritualism, that a college of our own has been attempted, and we are anxious to make this a success. We can do it if the Spiritualists will come together and support the effort. Mr. Pratt, who so generously gave the elegant building for the purpose of establishing a school where our speakers and mediums can be taught the essentials to place them on an equal footing with the ministers of other denominations, will do more, but he wants to know that we desire the college enough to make an effort ourselves to open and support it. I trust all Spiritualists in Wisconsin will take a personal interest in this. It is yours as much as it is anybody's, and to your interest that it is well supported, not alone by your personal membership, and subscriptions, but by your efforts to interest the public in scholarships, which will be reasonable, and only the very best teachers employed. The school will be opened the second of next September, and we hope for a good enrollment.

Please let us hear from you with subscriptions, donations, and applications for membership in the Morris Pratt Institute Association.

J. C. Bump, 220 Mason street, Milwaukee, Wis., is treasurer, and I am acting secretary. Address me permanently, Whitewater, Wis.

CLARA L. STEWART.

The Reverends.

The term Reverend (abbreviated Rev.) is a high-sounding title that belongs especially to the province of Theism—to the Christian ministry, preachers, priests, theologians. It fits them gracefully and they rest on the dignity or sanctimoniousness that the Rev. confers upon them. When we hear anything said of the Rev. Mr. So-and-So, it always suggests the idea of sanctity, vanity, egotism, authority.

It seems altogether out of order and unbecoming for a Spiritualist to appropriate the Rev. as a professional title. We have no need of such characters. We observe that a few mediums and public speakers in the East use the title, while in the far West it is almost obsolete. In California the people have only contempt for the Rev. and all who use it; therefore we advise all the Revs. who visit this coast to drop that appellation until they get back east of the Rocky Mountains.

A few mediums in this state have persisted in the use of the Rev. attachment, for influence, until they finally discovered that the influence was so strong against them that they had very little influence among Spiritualists. We suppose the object or motive is to imitate the churches, to be as closely as possible allied to the Christian religion for the sake of popularity, or to gratify their vanity. We have a secret suspicion that the Revs possess the faculty of self-esteem abnormally large.

A. H. N.

WOFULLY WEAK.

Prejudice Is the Child of Ignorance.

I do not seek to become an intervener in the friendly discussion between our brethren, H. V. Sweringen and Moses Hull. Either one is amply able to do justice to Rev. Mr. Rasmus, pastor of the South Park M. E. Church of Chicago, who is a wofully weak representative of a gloriously great denomination. Only because I made it my duty to hear the latter's attack upon Spiritualism in opening his Sunday evening course on "Colossal Frauds Under the Guise of Religion," do I inject a few words in the reportorial line.

Mr. Rasmus magnifies his fitness for handling and deciding this question for those members who wished to rest their own brains, by announcing that he had been reading along psychic lines for fifteen years. He did not name a single author whose works he had devoured, and left a grave doubt as to which side of the question his almighty mentality had grappled with, for it was painfully evident that a careful reading of the Bible had been omitted from his preparatory course. He confidentially advised his audience that he called these special efforts not sermons, but lectures, for under the latter term he could feel greater license for indulging in ridicule and extravagant illustrations. The sacredness of the word sermon seems to haunt him with the necessity for greater truthfulness as to facts and an exalted degree of spiritual illumination which he did not command.

He first indulges in a rhapsody over the Bible's impartiality in recording the shadows, as well as the sunglintings in human experiences of the long ago, and mentioned the incident at Endor as an illustration that the fact was given, but its real explanation was omitted. It has often seemed almost a criminal oversight on the part of the Lord that he did not overwhelmingly inspire each individual interpreter of his word while time shall endure, as well as its original compilers and authors. However, Brother Rasmus had the omitted revelation as to Endor, and it was not a real occurrence, but only seemed to have taken place—was wholly a mental mirage. He made this clear by telling of the Hindoo fakirs who seemed suspended from nothing in mid-air, until the kodak convinced the onlookers it was all their own hallucination. As he reached the triumphant climax that you cannot fool the sensitized films, a great terror seized upon me for the gray-haired father in Israel who courteously shared his pew and coverless hymn book with me, was shaken by a convulsion of admiration for the point made, and I feared he would so far lose control of his nether extremities as to plant his number elevens on my corns.

However, I merged into another season of calm, and remembered the speaker had proven that the Bible records things as facts that never happened. Well done, brother—let us shake hands on that.

But after proving the thing never happened, he proceeded to give a minute account of how the medium made ready to give King Saul a seance. Bro. Hull certainly needs a copy of Rasmus' Key to the Holy Scriptures. He cannot find in his Catholic, Protestant, Polyglot, Emphatic Diaglot or Revised Versions anything about the woman of Endor having or using paraphernalia, yet this preacher says she had them. Truly revelations to the sons of earth have not ceased. Anxious to picture the woman's realistic methods to his audience, he made use of the words in the witches' scene from Macbeth: "Double, double toil and trouble, Fire burn and cauldron bubble," and I venture some went out of that room thereby convinced that the minister was powerful familiar with the language of the Bible.

I felt so glad he was not preaching a sermon in the name of the Nazarene! He did not tell his people three mediums figured at Endor, the woman, Saul and Samuel. He played upon the unaccountable prejudices of his listeners by calling the medium, the witch of Endor, while the Bible only mentions her as the woman of Endor. He described her as an "abandoned woman like all of her class." Since I heard him utter those last seven words I have forgiven The Progressive Thinker for publishing that Collation of the weaknesses of churchmen some years ago, and wish I could send the reverend gentleman a copy of it and of the words once uttered by the inspired tracer on Judean soil: Let the guiltless cast the first stone.

The Bible only says of the woman of Endor that she was a truthful instrument for spirit intelligences and killed a fatted calf, and baked bread and constrained the doomed king to eat and overcome his physical weakness. What was discreditable to her character in that?

But final proof that Mr. Rasmus had not read wisely nor made personal investigation of the fruits of honorable mediumship was found in his assertion that a medium never tells only what is on the sitter's mind. The Bible contradicts him on that in many instances. Why did the medium, or seer, tell young Saul who had given up hunting for his father's asses, that they were found? Was that on the young man's mind, after three days of weary search? Many thousands of living people can give proofs of his mistakes. How many more years must this minister read to catch up to date?

Rev. Rasmus made a point that hurt when he described a fraudulent materialization perpetrated on Geo. H. Williams, once Attorney General of the United States. But then we are told we must wink at all such things and gulp down imposture of every name and nature. Rot! Any medium that once deliberately does fraud is unworthy of further confidence, no matter what powers, until he has brought forth works meet for repentance. Outsiders do not take us seriously because we so often lack earnestness and honesty.

A Bright Outlook for Spiritualism.

Here in far-off British Columbia we hear but a faint echo of the struggle for spiritual truth, and are mainly dependent for those few sounds we hear upon the columns of your truly valuable paper. For a long period Vancouver has seemed to be the dumping-ground for all the fake mediums and spiritual mountebanks in existence. There have been exceptions, however, such as the brief visits of Moses Hull and Mrs. Cowell; but those exceptions have been like the visit of angels, "few and far between." From time to time there have been efforts made to organize the work in this city, but these efforts have, mainly through incompetence of so-called leaders (sic), resulted in a condition of things utterly deplorable, until the very name of Spiritualism has become a by-word and a reproach.

So low has been the standard of Spiritualism in this city, that every partially developed person around the neighborhood, however meagre their qualification might be, have always been considered good enough for Vancouver. So that with the exceptions already noted, the spiritual platform in this city has been filled (and disgraced) with mediums (save the mark!) whose knowledge even of the primates of the English language has been utterly deficient.

We have had fake mediums of every variety, and their name is legion; Spiritual lecturers addressing their meaningless prayers to "our blessed Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ," and enough spiritual rubbish every way to make a horse sick, until the better class, the really sincere Spiritualists, have hung their heads in shame, because of such things.

But "it is a long lane that never ends," and I am pleased to be able to record a complete change from the old order of things. Our desire for real spiritual food is now being abundantly supplied through the mediumship of Mr. R. H. Kneeshaw, of Victoria, B. C., a gentleman who has devoted the greatest part of his life to our cause, in Canada, the United States and in England; and though the writer has had a great experience of the work in many cities, and has met and heard a great many public workers, I have never yet met one more fully equipped with all the necessary means for the spiritual propaganda than is this gentleman. Language like this would in most cases be but fulsome adulation; of him it is but the literal truth.

"After a famine comes a feast," and the Spiritualists of Vancouver are now enjoying a spiritual repast which is as new as it is pleasing. Mr. Kneeshaw came to this city a stranger, not knowing a single person, without herald or announcement; sought no favors, asked no help; but just simply went to work, hired a hall, and talked "Spiritualism"—not occult Spiritualism, or Christian Spiritualism; but just simply the broad, simple, philosophical Spiritualism of universal law. The result is in every way gratifying. Thinkers are being attracted, and we are constantly hearing such exclamations as, "So this is Spiritualism;" "I never knew that there was so much sound sense amongst the Spiritualists before;" etc. We feel now that Spiritualism has come to Vancouver to stay, and our creed-bound city is at length seeing the dawn of a new day.

After all this I need not tell you that our meetings are increasing in numbers and importance; and are besides attracting the very best element of our city, and the result is that the true Spiritualist can invite his friends and neighbors to a real spiritual meeting, and be proud of the man who is here to represent them.

With all good wishes for your continued welfare, and the increasing popularity of The Progressive Thinker, I am fraternally yours,

JAMES ILLINGSWORTH.

MY HOME AT LAKE BRADY.

Well, I've thought the matter over,
And as near as I can see,
I do not know another place
I'd any rather be;
The story-writers slight us,
The poets pass us by,
But right here at dear old "Brady"
I'd choose to live and die.

It's just as old as Egypt,
And a hundred times as good,
And the lake has been here longer
Than the pyramids have stood;
And if brains are what is wanted,
I guess 'twould stand a show
A-side of any other place,
No matter where you go.

Give me "Brady" in the spring time,
When the apple orchards blow,
And the cherry trees resemble
A good-sized drift of snow.
Give me "Brady" in the summer,
With lovely wheat fields golden,
Where the reapers buzz by day-time,
At night katy-dids are scolding.

Give me "Brady" in the autumn,
With the robin's good-bye song;
Thanksgiving time and Christmas
A-coming right along.
And "Old Brady" in the winter,
With cross-roads drifted high,
And, just listen to the music
When the street-car whizzes by.

With pop-corn and with hickory nuts,
In the evening by the blaze,
When the neighbors call to talk about
The spirits wonderful ways.
Yes, looking at it all around,
I'm willing now to say,
I'll take, for solid comfort,
Dear "Old Brady" any day.

These lines are dedicated to my new home at Lake Brady, by my guide "Coral," Dec. 24, 1901.

A BEAUTIFUL FAITH.

Professor Whipple's Discourse at the Funeral of His Aged Wife.

IN WHICH HE TELLS OF HIS AND HER CONCEPTION OF THE PAST, PRESENT AND FUTURE—AN ABIDING HOPE WHICH COMFORTS AND CHEERS.

Mrs. Eliza Leach Whipple, wife of Prof. E. Whipple, passed to the higher life from their home in Lakeside, San Diego county, Cal., Jan 3, 1902. The following is a report of Prof. Whipple's discourse on the funeral occasion:

It was the request of my wife ere she passed to her higher labors, that I should make a few remarks on the funeral occasion, and I trust the friends present will excuse my wide departure from established custom in such matters.

Mrs. Whipple especially desired me to thank the people of Lakeside for many tokens of their good will and for the many acts of kindness received at their hands; and also that I should explain somewhat the reasons for our retirement from society, and why we did not encourage the ordinary social interchanges. I assure you, my friends, it was not because we felt above you in any regard—not from any feeling of social exclusiveness; nor was it because we were indifferent to society and social life, since we formerly had a wide acquaintance and were in close contact with many social centers.

There were two principal reasons for this extreme retirement: First, Mrs. Whipple's physical status during the last ten years rendered her so sensitive to psychic spheres—both individual and collective—that it became an imperative necessity to withdraw from general society and make for herself a special environment within the home circle, where she felt it best to meet only a few individuals whose psychic sphere did not become to her an occasion of distress. The second reason was a private and esoteric one, which I need not now explain.

Eliza Leach Whipple was born in Hudson, Ohio, Feb. 7, 1827. At 7 years of age she lost her mother and one year later came under the iron rule of the proverbial stepmother, which brought many sorrows to her young life. In middle life, for fifteen years, she participated in an active business and public career, in which she employed many domestics, and her house was a social center where, I am pleased to say, many of the best minds in Cleveland were accustomed to meet for intellectual interchange. She possessed a noble ideal of personal liberty and uniformly protested against anyone calling her help servants. Her help always had the best there was in the house. Moreover, they respected her, were faithful in the performance of their duties and remained with her from year to year.

We both of us accepted the major facts of Spiritualism fifty years ago, and have never since doubted either the conscious existence of man beyond death, nor intelligent communion between this and the spirit world, though we have not been actively identified with the outward phase of the movement during the last twenty-five years, but rather with a special phase, of which I will presently speak.

We never connected ourselves with a church, yet religion has always stood for something specially sacred in our estimation—not Christianity alone, but likewise the elder religions, Judaism, the sun worship of Zoroaster, the old Masonic religion of Chaldea and Egypt, the Builders of the Great Pyramid, the old Vedic scriptures of India of five thousand years ago, and the still older Archaic scriptures of the north of Asia and region about the Caspian sea. We have indeed long believed that God has vouchsafed to every race and dispensation a form of His Eternal Word, adapted to the special needs of each and that no sacerdotal organization now on earth has delegated to it a monopoly of God's Word to man. Through Confucius, no doubt, a fragment of the Eternal Word was spoken to the Chinese people, which enabled them to stand erect and preserve an unbroken national continuity while Western historic nations were passing through the most sanguine religious and political mutations. Now, in our charity—or lack of charity—we call them heathens and try to force a religion upon them foreign to their national type and habits of thought.

I will now specify in what manner our belief is a radical divergence from current Spiritualism, not in the fact of communion, but in its trend of philosophic concepts. For twenty-five years we have held the belief which primitive Christianity involved, but which the modern church practically rejects, namely: that the divine processes and purposes focalize toward the earth and that those purposes involve the descent of the Divine Kingdom and complete establishment of its form of order in this world; that the prayer of Jesus shall yet be literally fulfilled; that man shall eventually be provided with an imperishable body of flesh; that all planes and octaves of universal movement, from the material to the spiritual pole of nature, shall be blended in the concrete organism of man, which shall contain a distinct organic zone for every plane and octave of expression in the universe.

The distinct tendency and ultimate aim of current Spiritualism, Theosophy, Mental Science, Christian Science, etc., is to shed the body for good, escape from earth and reach the final goal in the spirit world, or in Nirvana. Per contra, the primitive Christian ideal honors the material equally with the spiritual side of creation. Its hope is to perfect and sanctify the earth, achieve immortal flesh, capable of functioning on every plane, and realize here below the divine dream of the brotherhood of man! For twenty-five years we have believed that the building of this perfect kingdom is near at hand, and hence have not been surprised at the signs now everywhere apparent of the falling of the timbers of the old order! War and tumult and social chaos must needs precede the inauguration of the divine order on earth. When the old shall be in ashes and ruins, then will the builders appear.

In 1877 it was our good fortune—as we believed—to be intromitted into a form of teaching from a very ancient brotherhood of Masons, who lived on earth long antecedent to the time of Solomon and Hiram Abiff, who builded the great pyramid and from whom the school of prophets descended. From these old Masonic masters we possess over two thousand pages of manuscript, written in the most sublime symbolic style, and which, we prize above all the books on earth. Moreover, these old masters initiated and baptized us into their sacred order twenty-five years ago, and we have endeavored in the interval to embody their sublime teachings in our lives. Their mode of access to us need not be explained here. Suffice to say, their major labors now consist in preparing the way for the visible advent of one of their number! The mental states of each of us have affected the other in a similar manner for many years. Presently my brain was dominated by a poetical conception of the starry constellations, and their relation at this time to the Messianic descent. Next morning I jotted down what I was able to retain of this poem, a few concluding verses of which I will here take the liberty to repeat:

I turn my eyes to star groups
Brightly shining in the northern sky,
Where mighty Perseus raises his flaming scimitar
Above Medusa's head, and where
The son of morning sits at quiet ease
In Cassiopea's chair,
Waiting his appointed time.
And old King Cepheus,
With starry robe and diadem,
Notes the moments as they fly,
And watches for the star of Bethlehem—
The famous double star—the promised sign—
The herald of a mountain king
Whose glories number twelve times nine.
This Son of Morning shall lift our prostrate,
Sin-cursed earth above the plane of fraud and strife,
And make her kindred with the shining sisters of Pleiades.
He shall crown her brow with a radiant tress of glory,
And wreath her sad and wrinkled face
With a nimbus of eternal light.
Among all the glorious stars,
The earth shall be the one preferred,
For she has suffered most,
Been loved the most by God's humanity,
And chosen as a model of new creative energies.
These energies now push toward earth's border lands,
And when the seven splendors
O'er the North sea rise seven times
Neptune and Michael will cast the dragon down!

* * * * * * *

O, the wondrous theme of starry worlds!
I marvel more and more in presence of the mystery—
Of how the cosmic hosts are interlinked
With microcosmic man—
The mystery of how the rise and fall of kingdoms
Keeps steady pace with the rise and fall of stars!
And how the movement of the signs
Give birth to titan wars, and then
To fullness of golden years.
Aye, I marvel at the old Masonic master-mind,
Who formed the stars in constellated groups
And gave to each a name;
Who mapped the course of history—
Who gave prophetic utterance of things to come,
And involved an inner meaning
In the scriptures of the world.

Now I must close with a few words of personal mention.

My companion's long and slow decline was fraught with many lessons of valuable experience to us both. In the midst of sorrow and self denial we learned a trust and hope and cheerfulness which constituted our home a sacred center of sweetness and harmony. Not for one moment have we ever distrusted God's universal providence, which always and forever doeth all things well. With America's greatest poet we could always say, that "Whatever can possibly happen anywhere, at any time, is provided for in the inherency of things," and that "the purport of death is just as important as the purport of life."

"All these hearts of fretted children shall be soothed—
All affection shall be responded unto;
The secret shall be told.
All these separations and gaps
Shall be taken up and hooked and linked together.
The whole earth—
This cold, impassive, voiceless earth
Shall be completely justified.
Nature and man shall not always be disjoined as now,
For the true son of God shall absolutely fuse them."

When my wife saw that the change was near at hand, she said to me: "I can no longer use this old house of my spirit for any useful purpose, and if it be the will of the wise powers, I am rejoiced to lay it down. I shall take up my work again at the point where I leave it here, and shall continue to serve those ancient brothers who have guided our feet and counselled our lives for the last twenty-five years.

"Our labor is one, my husband, and we shall stand shoulder to shoulder in the duties of the day and hour."

To a neighbor who called, she said: "I am reconciled—not only reconciled, but happy, for the grandest door for all my earthly lives is now opening to me. The great fulfillment is just beyond."

Two children were born to her by an earlier marriage; both now living—Mrs. Harriet L. Fuller, who is now present, and George L. Williams, settled with his family on the old farm in Ohio. If she did not bequeath but a small portion of worldly goods to her children, she often expressed her gratification that she had at least bequeathed a fair modicum of honor and integrity.

And now a final farewell to this house of clay. Goodbye, my beautiful dead. But thou art not dead! The phoenix has arisen from its ashes and plumed her wings for a loftier flight.

My friends, upon occasions like this can we stand in the presence of death and feel that all is well? I do assure you that I have the faith which never fails. I rest in the arms of a divine love and mercy as securely as a babe rests in the arms of its mother. I feel that God is both father and mother to me, that he holds me as tenderly as a mother her child. He is not only my shield and protector, but my tender counselor and loving friend. I hold that this present life is only one link in an interminable series. I know the future has many good things in store for me—for you—if we are obedient to the divine voice.

A movement in the empty house!
A step upon the stair!
A cautious tread, now on, now stayed—
Surely some life is there!

Surely in this deep, breathless pause
Some life beside my own,
Unseen is near me, yet I know
That I was left alone.

And if a footstep should advance
(I dare not fancy how)
What presence that the eye could find
Would stand before me now?

Though not a speaking human form,
Might it not be some shade
Of one that has felt anguish here,
Whose feelings cannot fade?

With strangely-acted retrospect
A spirit passed away,
In its strong pangs of old remorse,
Might meet the eye of day.

I think these silent gazing walls
Look conscious of some past,
O'erladen with a tragic freight,
When passion pulsed too fast.

I know one mournful life was wont
In this still room to pine—
That feeble frame, that sinking heart,
That long, slow struggle mine.

Yet, though time-severed from that self,
I cannot think it dead;
If lingering on the landing near
Where once such tears were shed,

With what a ghost-like sense of wrong
It might come gliding in,
Sad-eyed and speechless, to survey
The treasurer's time can win!

It would not find me rich in joy;
Submission gives me peace;
The present cannot hide the past,
But vain regrets may cease.

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

HARBINGER OF LIGHT, MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA.

SPIRITUAL IMPRESSION.

Spiritualism is everywhere forcing itself upon the attention of the public in all parts of the world—Australia excepted, perhaps—in a way which was least expected, and through channels quite other than those in which people might naturally look for it. In La Revue, formerly La Revue des Revues, of Paris, for example, M. M. Vaschide and Pieron publish a dissertation upon Dreams, as considered in the light of contemporary psychology, in which, being both of them materialists, they sneer at "the uncontrollable absurdities of Spiritualism," and yet, at the same time, they quote from Le Monde des Reves, of Dr. Max Simon, the following facts, which admit of one explanation only; namely, that of an impression communicated to the mind of each of the persons referred to, by a spiritual guide or guardian, and promptly obeyed by the recipient: (1) "A young lady being on a visit to the country, somewhat distant from the place in which she abode, had an idea that her sister whom she had quitted in perfect health, was in serious danger. She immediately returned, and had scarcely reached home, when she was told that her sister had been taken with a violent spitting of blood which had placed her life in danger." (2) "One day when the Abbe de Montmorin had entered the Church of St. Louis, and was kneeling down in prayer, he was strongly moved to change his place. He resisted the impulse at first, but the internal solicitation becoming more pressing, he concluded by yielding to it, and kneeling down to pray in the opposite aisle of the church. He had scarcely done so before a large stone detached itself from the vault, and fell upon the exact spot he had just quitted." (3) "A young doctor being about to visit his relations, and meeting two officers, agreed to accompany them in the mail coach; but, as he was about to mount the vehicle, he felt himself held back by some supernatural power. The two officers, noticing a change in his countenance, asked the reason of it. He explained, and they offered to assist him to mount, but he refused, stating that he had decided not to go. They had scarcely departed, before he felt that the restraint upon him had been removed; and he took the first opportunity that offered of setting out upon his journey. On reaching the banks of the Elbe, he found a crowd assembled, from whom he learned that the two officers had been drowned by the coach falling into the river." (4) "One night the Princess of Conti saw in a dream one of the rooms in the palace ready to fall to pieces, and her children, who were sleeping in it, about to be buried in the ruins. The frightful image presented to her mind, sent a thrill through her heart and every vein. Trembling with emotion, she awoke on the instant, sprang from her bed, and called to her women who were sleeping in her dressing-room. She told them what she had seen, and ordered them to bring her children to her. They very reluctantly obeyed, but came back in a few minutes, stating that the little ones were sound asleep, and that it was a pity to disturb them. The Princess, seeing their obstinacy, commanded them to bring her dressing gown. Finding she was determined, the women went and brought the children to their mother's room. They had scarcely done so before the ceiling of the chamber vacated, came down with a crash."

Now the unproved hypothesis of telepathy might be suggested in the first case, but is absolutely untenable in all three of the others; while spiritual impression is a simple, sensible and sufficient solution of the mystery—if such it can be called—in each one of these. It may be asked why could not the lives of the two officers have been saved by the same means as that of the young doctor? In all probability they could and would, if they had offered the same "conditions" to their spiritual impressors as he did; or if they were as amenable to spiritual guidance and warning as he was.

THE BELGIAN PRESS AND SPIRITUALISM.

Le Messager of Brussels, which is one of the daily newspapers of that city, publishes a two-column article in its issue of the 12th of July, descriptive of a visit paid by a member of its editorial staff to a spiritual seance held at Charleroi, the Belgian Newcastle, where, he says, "there are at least 20,000 fervent and avowed Spiritualists, attending different circles here, and leading peaceful and contented lives in consequence." Fifty persons were present at the sitting he attended, and among them were merchants, a celebrated artist, a barrister, some journalists, and several workmen. Among the controls who spoke were Paul Bert and Allan Kardec; and the writer, while declaring himself to be a non-Spiritualist, concludes his narrative of what he saw and heard in these words: "For reasons which are more sentimental than scientific, I believe in the entire good faith of the actors in the scene. The desire to converse with the dead, which is as old as the world, has often led men into strange practices. Here, it contributes to elevate their souls and their hearts, and irony would be a sacrilege towards these mourners who are feeling in the mist for some fugitive clasp of the hand from those who have disappeared." Is it necessary to contrast the tone of the foregoing with the silly jibes indulged in by a section of the Melbourne press whenever Spiritualism happens to be referred to by its conductors or reporters?

CHEVREUL AND THE SPIRIT.

Speaking of the inauguration of a statue of Chevreul, the great chemist, who died in 1889, at the age of 103, and to whom this honor has just been paid in the Jardin des Plantes, in Paris, the Messager of Liege quotes from the eulogium, delivered on the occasion by M. Perrier, the following striking passage: "If for a moment this statue were animated, could walk and talk, no one would be astonished. Our hands would naturally grasp those of our old master, surrounded by all he loved; while he himself, simply believing that he had been asleep for a few weeks, would take up the interrupted thread of those long conversations which many among us have held with him. The very fact of his resurrection would not greatly surprise him. He would confine himself to a scrupulous analysis of the phenomenon, and to noting all the circumstances, as he did one night when, having worked very late, he saw the door of his laboratory barred by a sort of phantom. He simply took notice of the sign made to him by the spirit. He described it as a kind of conical trunk, surmounted by a sphere. He drew out his watch to ascertain the precise moment the apparition had presented himself, and directed his steps towards his bed-chamber, passing through the doorway, in which he brushed against the spirit as he passed. That beautiful scientific serenity did not forsake him when, later on, he was informed that, at the very hour of his vision, a friend had died, of whose illness he had not so much as heard, and had bequeathed his library to him!"

DR. HODGSON AND MME. BLAVATSKY.

It having been stated that Dr. Hodgson had retracted his former statements with respect to Mme. Blavatsky, M. Metzger wrote to that gentleman asking if he had done so. The Doctor's reply to this letter is published in La Pair Universelle, and is to the following effect: "There is no sort of foundation whatever for the pretension that I have retracted in any degree whatever my views, opinions, or statements relative to Mme. Blavatsky. I have never had the slightest reason, of any kind whatsoever, for modifying my opinion, which is this, that she committed a fraud from beginning to end, and that she possessed no species of supernatural power whatsoever...I have to thank you for calling my attention to this great mistake, in so far as I am concerned, and I wish you to understand that you may give the fullest publicity to this my repudiation."

SCIENCE AND SPIRITUALISM.

We learn from the Revue des Etudes Psychiques that the Academy of Medicine in Paris has at length condescended to bestow its attention upon supernormal phenomena, and has published in its official Bulletin, a detailed report of a case of what it calls "hysteria, catalepsy, auto-suggestion, second sight, and telepathy," observed by Dr. Fourlier, of Angouleme. The subject is a young lady, who is evidently a medium, and appears to be hyper-sensitive to the magnetic influence of a lady spoken of as Mme P. On one occasion when the latter passed outside the house of the former and merely waved her hand at her in friendly salutation, the subject felt as if she had sustained a violent blow in the precordial region, and the sensation was immediately followed by an attack of hysteria. A few nights later when Mme. P. passed the door of the house, the patient, being in bed at the time, and knowing nothing of the incident, fell into a state of catalepsy and became as rigid as a bar of iron. Sixteen days afterwards the young girl declared she had seen Mme. P. as an apparition. She underwent another crisis, and at that very moment Mme. P. happened to have returned to the place after an absence of nearly a month. Dr. Fournier states that his patient is clairvoyant, and can distinguish between and describe pieces of money in a tightly closed hand. Not only so, but she accurately described what room one of her female neighbors was in, and what she was doing at the time.

The member of the Academy whose duty it was to prepare a special report upon these phenomena actually ventured to enlarge upon the importance, from a scientific point of view, of studying such cases as these, which the whole faculty would have received with scorn and ridicule only a very few years ago. Evidently the world is moving on.

PSYCHIC EXPERIENCES OF A CLERGYMAN.

We close with the narration of one more experience. "On my way to a Midland town, to lecture, there came upon me quite suddenly, and all but irresistibly, the inclination to give, while adhering to the title, a lecture quite different from, though not contradictory of, the one I had prepared. I believe this impulse is not uncommon. What made it peculiar in this case was its suddenness and intensity, and its sequel. I resisted the inclination and forced myself to go over again the familiar ground. When I rose to deliver my lecture, a sentence quite unlike what I had prepared came from my lips. It was followed by another and another. I was quite conscious that I was not giving the lecture I had written, but I liked the new one better, and did not mind. I had been speaking this way for an hour, when the wish to give the closing part of the prepared lecture overmastered the tendency to go on as I was doing. Not without a violent effort I freed myself from whatever it was that was acting on me and began my peroration. I noticed that it fell rather flat, and would willingly have changed unto the other line, but that was no longer possible. When I finished I sat down in some humiliation. Almost immediately rose an old man, with a great dome of head, and eyes that had in them a far-away look. He said: 'Mr. Harrioson has been lecturing for an hour and a quarter. The hour, during which we all listened with delight, was given by a spirit whom I saw; the quarter, which fell flat, was his own. He resisted the spirit, and the spirit fled.' The speaker was, it turned out, a well-known Spiritualist. At his words the audience laughed. I did not. Again, I have no theory to give. But, I suppose, Christians believe, nominally at least, in the spiritual universe, in a great multitude of angels, and in the spirits of just men made perfect. If this round world is set in the midst of unseen intelligences, is it very wonderful if the latter sometimes touch and influence the former? Yet there may be truth in the contention that to have communion with them we must wait till the bars of earth fall away and permit our passage into the infinite unseen. We must rise to them, rather than they come down to us.... Or is it that they come oftener than we know, but cannot stay for long in the atmosphere of earth? Are the visits few because we are so seldom desirous of their company, and far between because not many are fit to receive such company? After all, may it not be that if is not the angels who are absent, but the seeing eye and the hearing ear? For myself, I do not know certainly whether I have ever beheld the gracious beauty of their forms. It has often seemed to be that they hovered in the air around, that they have spoken many things and oft, but I have never seen their faces. When I have asked why, the answer swiftly came, 'Because we steadfastly behold the face of your father in Heaven.' They seem to me to have dictated many pages which I have hidden away and permit no one to see but myself, and not myself in lower moods. They seem to me to have said, 'Put down no thought of your own. Write word for word what we say, and as we say it.' Once, correcting, as I imagined, a mistake of my own, while they were still dictating, I thought I heard them say, 'No you must not do that. Write what you hear, whether it seems sense to you or not.' No angel has come to me singly, so far as I know. Usually, there are many speakers, but always only one voice. Is this voice really my own, which imagination translates into theirs? I know not, but if it be it is surely as wonderful. Must we be always seeking, and never sought? Can we not sometimes be still and let the invisible speak? Even if it be self that speaks, then it is that self that lives nearest God. May I not say also, that He in whom we live and move and have our being, often makes our souls thrill with spiritual vibrations which our conscious self translates into thoughts and words? If God be immanent in Nature and man, as well as transcendent in eternal space, ought we not to expect, to look for, to await, the frequent touch of the invisible? Or can it be that, having once stilled the quivering fire of the long line of prophets, evangelists, apostles, He closed the Bible with a threat and has never since spoken to man?"

THROUGH HOLIDAYS

Have you made somebody happy who with pain and sorrow burned?
Then a portion of true happiness you certainly have earned.
If you gave as you were able of the wealth you had in store,
You but did your duty nobly; could a millionaire do more?
If your whole soul did the prompting,
your benevolence was backed
By your loving, inner conscience and the motive in the act.
You may not have reached as many as the multimillionaire,
But if you did your utmost with the means you had to spare,
You should feel the satisfaction that the happiness you gave Will enhance the future welfare of your soul beyond the grave.
But the gifts without the hoping for returns some future day,
Are the gifts of purest motives and unselfishness alway.

There seems something very narrow in the soul that will not give,
From his plenty to the needy who
around him have to live,
But no other soul can judge him from his proper point of view,
And not wear the same conditions that his brother traveled through.
So let's leave unjudged all others to their fate with Father Time,
For the future may unfold them to a beauty more sublime.

'Tis enough for us to measure all the goodness we possess
To the world we see around us seeking earthly happiness;
'Tis enough for us to succor those we know who need our aid,
'Tis enough for us to lighten others'
burdens up the grade;
Then let's leave to those who falter,
just to labor as they feel,
While we put our strongest shoulder to some helpless brother's wheel.

The Class of Women Who Favor Woman Suffrage.

The Rev. Dr. Herbert Foss, successor of Bishop Simpson, of the Arch Street Methodist Church of Philadelphia, last week closed his series of sermons on "The Woman of the Future," with a discussion of the question, "Ought woman to have full suffrage?" In a most public-spirited address he said: "It is those women who are fighting the evils of society, the devoted Christians, that favor the right to cast the ballot. They are doing it, not because of notoriety, but because they see in it the only way to solve the great moral questions of the day. It is those women who devote their time to frivolities that manifest no interest in this question of woman suffrage.

"The woman of the future will be a citizen with full suffrage, because it is just and right. England cut no sorrier figure in taxing her colonies without giving them a voice in the management of their own affairs than we do in taxing women and then withholding the franchise from them.

"If woman is fitted for the high duties of motherhood and wifehood, she can be trusted with the ballot."

"Beyond the Vail." A Sequel to "Rending the Vail." Being a compilation, with notes and explanations, of narrations and illustrations of spirit experiences, spoken, written and made by full-form materializations; setting up a scientific and personal verification of "What We Shall Be," and a code of ethics, requisite to the most speedy realization of the highest and purest felicity attainable in the future life. A very remarkable book. Large, octavo, 600 pages. Price, $1.75.

"The Present Age and Inner Life; Ancient and Modern Mysteries Classified and Explained." By Andrew Jackson Davis. We have a few copies of this work by the celebrated seer. Cloth, $1.10.

Every Subscriber to the Progressive Thinker Reaps the Benefit of the Divine Plan.

"A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands," a most remarkable book, will be our leading feature until June 1, 1902, and will be the only one of the eight Divine Plan books sent out for 25 cents.

If you order only one book, and that one not the "Wanderer in the Spirit Lands," the price is 50 cents. If you order two books, and neither of them the "Wanderer in the Spirit Lands," the price of each one is 45 cents.

Any three of the eight Books you may order, Price $1.10.

Any four of the eight Books you may order, Price $1.50.

Any five of the eight Books you may order, Price $1.80.

Any six of the eight Books you may order, Price $2.10.

Any seven of the eight Books you may order, Price $2.35.

Lastly all of the eight Valuable Books here announced are sent out, all postage prepaid, for $2.50—a price never offered before by any other publisher.

Read This Carefully Before Remitting.

When you send in your subscription to The Progressive Thinker, carefully look over the books which you desire in this list, and their price, and send for them. They are very valuable. They are intensely interesting. They are elevating in tone and will do you good. In remitting do not fail to enclose a dollar for The Progressive Thinker.

These eight books, substantially and elegantly bound, and printed in the neatest style of the printer's art, will be furnished to our subscribers for $2.50, a price which modern machinery and enterprise has rendered possible. Sending out these books, however, at the prices we do, does not reduce the price of the subscription of the paper, apparently or otherwise, a single cent, for that cannot be afforded for less than one dollar per year, inview of the fact that we publish such a vast amount of reading matter.

REMARKABLE OFFER.

EIGHT REMARKABLE BOOKS FOR $2.50.

7—The Occult Life of Jesus.
8—A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands.

Total price to our subscribers, $2.50.

The Progressive Thinker one year and the eight Divine Plan books, $3.50.

In order to assist in forming a Spiritual and Occult Library in every Spiritualist's home, these eight valuable books, substantially and elegantly bound in cloth, are furnished to our subscribers for $2.50. We are able to do this, from the fact that the authors make no charge for the vast amount of labor bestowed on these works, and which extended over many years. That is why you are getting these intensely interesting books for the price you do. We are only carrying out the Divine Plan, inaugurated only by The Progressive Thinker. There are thousands of our subscribers who have no Spiritualist or Occult library, and this inducement is offered in order that they may commence forming one at once, and thus keep in line with the advancing procession. The postage on the above books and expense of mailing is about 95 cents, hence you are receiving them at an exceedingly low price—simply the result of modern enterprise combined with a desire to do good.

"After Her Death. The Story of a Summer." By Lilian Whiting. No mind that loves spiritual thought can fail to be fed and delighted with this book. Beautiful spiritual thought, combining advanced ideas on the finer and ethereal phases of Spiritualism, leading the mind onward into the purer atmosphere of exalted spiritual truth. A book for the higher life. For sale at this office. Price, cloth $1.

"Right Living." By Susan H. Wixon. The author shows a wise practicality in her method of teaching the principle of ethics. She illustrates her subject with many brief narratives and anecdotes, which render the book more interesting and more easily comprehended. It is especially adapted for use in Children's Lyceum. In the hands of mothers and teachers it may be made very useful. Young and old will be benefited by it. Cloth $1 For sale at this office.

"Poems of Progress." By Lizzie Doten. In this volume, this peerless poet of Spiritualism may be read in her varied moods, "from grave to gay, from lively to severe." It is a book to be treasured and richly enjoyed by all who love genuine poetry, and especially by Spiritualists. The volume is tastily printed and bound. Price $1.

"The World Beautiful." By Lilian Whiting. Most excellent in their high and elevating spirituality of thought. Series 1, 2, and 3, each complete in itself. Price, cloth, $1 per volume. For sale at this office.

"Mind and Body: Suggestions and Hypnotism Applied in Medicine and Education." By A. G. Halphide, President Chicago Society of Anthropology. For sale at this office. Price $1.

"The Bridge Between Two Worlds." By Abby A. Judson. This book is dedicated to all earnest souls who desire, by harmonizing their physical and their psychical bodies with universal nature and their souls with the higher intelligences, to come into closer connection with the purer realms of the spirit world. It is written in the sweet spiritual tone that characterizes all of Miss Judson's literary works. Price, cloth, $1; paper, 75 cents. For sale at this office.

PRENATAL SUGGESTION AS AFFECTING HUMAN DESTINY

A Theory More Wonderful than That of Doctor Koch.

HOW DR. W. G. FERRIS PROPOSES, BY THE PROCESS OF MENTAL SUGGESTION TO THE MOTHER, TO CONFER EXCEPTIONAL TALENT IN MUSIC UPON A CHILD THAT IS YET UNBORN—A MARVELOUS PSYCHOLOGICAL TEST WHICH HAS AROUSED THE INTEREST OF LEADING SCIENTISTS THROUGHOUT THE COUNTRY.

The most wonderful experiments in psychology ever attempted are now being conducted by Dr. W. G. Ferris, of No. 140 West Eighty-second street, New York City.

If they succeed, the revolution which will be wrought in the life of humanity it would defy the imagination to foretell.

It will mean that the men and women of to-day will take the life of the generation to come in their own hands and fashion it to suit themselves.

It will mean that children will be born not to wander haphazard through the formative period of their years in search of a career, but with a career to which they have already been predestined by their ancestors.

It is, in one plain sentence, the theory of Dr. Ferris that an unborn child may be so influenced through the mother by means of mental suggestion that it will be fitted to become an artist, a statesman, a warrior, a musician, a financier—whatever, indeed, the mother and the authors of the suggestion agree upon.

Dr. Ferris is thoroughly confident that his experiments will be successful, and eminent scientists who are specialists in psychology—such men as Prof. John D. Quackenbos, of Columbia College, and Prof. William James, the famous Harvard psychologist—indorse the theory and declare there is much reason to believe that Dr. Ferris will accomplish the marvelous result which he is attempting.

Dr. Ferris has made a specialty of the study of suggestion and its influences ever since he adopted medicine as a profession, twenty years ago. He is a graduate of the University of Illinois and also of the celebrated Bernheim School, of Nancy, in France, the most famous institution devoted to hypnotism and suggestion in the world. He spent three years at Nancy and was closely affiliated with Dr. Bernheim and the late famous Dr. Charcot in conducting many of their most important experiments.

Every reader of romance is familiar with the late Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes' famous story "Elsie Venner," which tells how, previous to the birth of the beautiful Elsie, the mother, while walking about the New England hills, was frightened by a rattlesnake—and how, when a babe learning to crawl, the child's body moved with the sinuous movement of a serpent, and how, when she grew to womanhood, the beautiful and erratic Elsie, with her strange, fascinating and dilating eyes, would curl herself up on the ledge of a rock and bask in the bright rays of the sunshine. Physicians and scientific men have agreed for years that the scientific principle which was the basis of Dr. Holmes' popular story is a true one.

Perhaps the most noteworthy experiment among those which Prof. Ferris is now conducting is the attempt to so influence the mother that the child which is to be born will possess the heart and soul of a musician. The mother is a young woman who has never received a musical training, knows naught of music save in a general way, cannot sing a note, cannot play on any musical instrument and who never had an ancestor as far as can be ascertained, who was gifted with the talent of music. Her husband is equally ignorant of music. Both husband and wife belong to what is known as the middle class. They have a fair degree of intelligence and have received common-school educations.

They attend the theatre occasionally as their income permits, live quietly and economically, and, so far as can be ascertained, have no ambition beyond that of enjoying a quiet, comfortable life, with the opportunity to rear their children with a good common-school education and get them an opportunity of employment as soon as they may be able to work.

The wife and mother has been carefully questioned as to her inclinations, tastes and ambitions for the children which she may bring into the world. She is fond of the theatre, as are most young women, enjoys a melodrama or an emotional play more than any other, has a similar taste in story or novel reading, and knows only enough of music to obey its rhythm when dancing.

Taken the other evening to witness the performance of a comic opera, and watched and questioned very closely when she had no notion that any object was in view, she declared that she enjoyed the performance very much, but thought she got more entertainment out of the speaking parts than from those which were sung. "I like the music," she said, "but I cannot tell you why, for I do not understand it."

And now, how will Dr. Ferris proceed in this wonderful experiment? Read what he said to the writer for the Sunday World Magazine:

"My method," he declared, "will not be through the process of hypnotism as hypnotism is generally known and understood. I shall not put the mother to sleep so that she will be in the condition of somnambulance, in which those who have witnessed the phenomenon generally behold the hypnotized. In other words, Mrs. Blank will always be conscious of her surroundings and know what she is doing.

"I do not consider the hypnotic trance state at all essential to the success of my experiments. The prospective mother will be by quiet, harmonious and easy methods of suggestion placed in what is known as a state of passive receptivity. Her thoughts will be freed entirely from the influences of any environing circumstances that might interfere with complete concentration upon the subject in hand, and while in this state the mind will be directed toward music.

"No effort will be made in any way to train her in the technique of music or to lead her toward a musical education. She will be led to hope and then to believe that the child will be a great musician and will be taught that every whim and talent that the child may show will contribute toward her own happiness.

"She will also be taught what a powerful factor in the world music is, and what great events its subtle chords and melodies have wrought. All this will be done by simple methods of suggestion.

"In addition to this I shall at various times give the mother a musical environment. She shall hear operas and attend some of the most important orchestral performances, and she will be made to feel an interest in the biographies of famous composers. She will be led to hope that her child shall be a greater master than any of these.

"I have but little doubt of the complete success of the experiment. I know that the law or principle under which it is to be conducted is a true and powerful one, and I am assured that we have now sufficiently mastered it to know how to apply it with full force and effect.

"I shall, of course, as time progresses, conduct a number of experiments along the same line. Success in a single case would be at best only a partial demonstration, and my purpose is to prove the complete potency of the principle. With this principle established a new civilization far beyond the dreams of the idealist is opened to mankind. It means, for one thing, that the existence of the criminal mind can be obliterated and that a new and almost perfect civilization can be developed."

Dr. John D. Quackenbos, professor of psychology in Columbia College, when asked for his views as to the experiments of Dr. Ferris, said:

"The complete demonstration of the principle involved would be one of the greatest boons which could come to humanity. That the law exists, and that the principle is true and scientific, I have no doubt. But because it has never yet been demonstrated I cannot venture an opinion as to whether or not these experiments will succeed in demonstrating it.

"The world at large seems very slow to realize the importance of the many new discoveries in the science of psychology, but that has always been the experience of new discoveries. We laugh at those who believed Columbus would topple off the world when he started on his journey west to go east and incidentally stumbled across America. It is by no means impossible that a few generations hence people will laugh at us for spending money for jails and poor-houses."—New York World.

HUMAN ENERGY.

Acting as a Magnet It Is a Motive Power.

DR. CHARLES TUCKETT HAS DISCOVERED HOW, BY NERVOUS ENERGY ALONE, HE MAY OPERATE A MINIATURE RAILWAY IN HIS ST. LOUIS HOME.

Dr. Charles Tuckett, a retired St. Louis Doctor, is exhibiting in his home, at 4563 North Market street, the most extraordinary little railway in the city—a railroad whose motive power is the nervous energy of the human body.

Dr. Tuckett believes a time is coming when science will so confine the energy in the human system that by grasping a lever a man may run his automobile with the life force that is in him, or that the passengers on a street car may start or stop the car by touching a certain place with their hands and taking them off. In other words, man in himself is a motor. These are somewhat exaggerated illustrations of Dr. Tuckett's immediate expectations, but they are by no means beyond his anticipations of that future time when science will know how to harness human energy.

To illustrate his discovery of nervous energy as a motive power, Dr. Tuckett has strung a copper wire in his home and has placed upon this a tiny truck. By rubbing his hand on a piece of paper and hanging it on the truck, he can pull the car forward or back it across the room by holding his hand a few feet away, the principle being that of the magnet.

Dr. Tuckett believes this to be the first illustration of the life force ever made. He is confident his discovery will be taken up and elaborated upon, just as science took up Franklin's discovery of electricity. He says the life force of men and women is wasted in enormous quantities and that when science succeeds in applying it the saving will be one of the chief economics of humankind.

Dr. Tuckett has been a student of life force for many years. He is a magnetic healer and strong advocate of the highest physical development. Although 76 years old his carriage is as straight and vigorous as that of a man 40 years his junior. He has always believed that the expended energy of the human body could be used in a practical way and, after a long series of experiments, has caused it to move a very small two-wheel truck at will over a copper wire.

BY DR. CHARLES TUCKETT.

The human body is constantly throwing of its life force; it is always expending energy. We cannot walk across the room or cannot breathe that this is not demonstrated. This force is sometimes absorbed by other beings; often it is lost.

What is this thing we call scent? What power is it we leave behind us after every footstep that enables the hound to follow us over the same path the next day? It is a part of the same power that permits us to move our bodies. It is generated in the system and, when applied to our limbs, passes out into the floor of the earth.

My theory has been that this expended force can be controlled and utilized. I have finally demonstrated it successfully. I use in these demonstrations the simplest apparatus:

First, I show animal magnetism, or life force, differs from material magnetism. I have bent, at right angles, a piece of heavy wire. I fastened this in a steel vise, attached to an ordinary table. Suspended from the crossarm, by silk threads, are a tack and a small piece of wood pith. I hold a common steel magnet to the tack. It is swayed and caught by the steel. Then I place the magnet against the pith. The wood is not affected.

Now I apply animal magnetism. Experience has taught me that the best conductor for limited experiments with animal magnetism is dry paper. The force is transferred by rubbing the paper briskly with the bare hand. Hold it to the tack, and the little piece of metal swings to the paper. The pith will do the same, showing that the power from the body possesses a property that material magnetism does not.

The existence of animal force thus demonstrated, we apply it. To do this I have constructed a steel truck two inches long, and very light. It is supported by two brass wheels, one behind the other. These wheels are grooved so they will fit on the copper wire that serves as a track. Under the truck and extending below the wire I have placed two short pieces of wire, bent into hooks at the ends. Between these halfway to the point is a piece of lead that acts as a balance, holding the little car upright on the wire. Again I briskly rub a piece of paper, then quickly fasten it to the wire hooks. I hold my hands two inches in front of the paper. The magnetism in my flesh attracts that I had generated in the paper, and as I move my hand along in the direction of the wire the truck runs easily after it, drawn by the paper. When I place my hand behind the paper the direction of the car is reversed.

These are the most extraordinary demonstrations in animal magnetism that have ever been made, to my knowledge, and to my mind they rank in importance with those made by Benjamin Franklin with his kite and storage jars.

I do not believe it is given to me to successfully store this power or to employ it further along the lines of strict practicability. But I have shown its power and other scientists must take up the work where I have left off.

I have also demonstrated that the human body contains positive and negative magnetism. If a person is right-handed, the positive current is on that side, and the negative is on the left. In left-handed persons the positive is on the left side.

Take two pieces of thoroughly dry paper. Lay them on the right leg and rub them briskly two or three times with the right hand. You will find, on attempting to separate them, that they will stick together. The same would be the case if the papers were rubbed on the left leg by the left hand.

Now rub the two sheets with different hands. When you place them together they will fly apart. The positive and negative currents cannot dwell in harmony.

Persons of the best physical development—by that I mean the soundest bodies—possess more magnetism than the weak and sick. This magnetism is being constantly thrown off the body. The big healthy person will not absorb as much as the weak one, hence there is always a repellent force about him that permits him to successfully evade disease.

I have kept myself physically strong all my life and have never been ill. My children are all athletes. They do not know what sickness is.

It is a triumph for the life force.—St. Louis Post-Dispatch.

LETTER FROM A PROMINENT WORKER IN MASSACHUSETTS.

To the Editor.—I must say that your enterprise is a marvel. Your paper, whether considered as to its matter—quantity or quality—or as to its cost and advantages to the subscriber, notably as pertains to its premium offerings, is freely declared in the numerous localities where I am called to lecture and demonstrate, to be the one paper among those published, most satisfactory. The spontaneous praise for both editor and paper are pronounced on every hand. I deem it but just that I should report it, notwithstanding, in a merely parenthetical way, in an otherwise business letter.

CALVE AND THE HINDOO.

Her Wonderful Experience With Him.

Calve, "Carmen" of the age; Calve, idol of opera-goers, despair of opera managers, petted child of fortune; Calve, she of the marvelous voice, the most fascinating personality, most volcanic temper and most generous, loveable nature on the stage; Calve, to whom have been given health, beauty, wealth and fame, sits unsatisfied amid the splendors that attend her. Her triumphs have not brought content. Having conquered the world, she sighs, as did Alexander the Great, for other worlds to conquer. Calve, to whom nothing has yet been denied, longs for that which the most bewitching voice cannot allure, nor can gold buy in the market place, though every precious stone in her magnificent collection of jewels were offered in exchange. And that which she longs for with all the intensity of her ardent Gallic nature is, the key to the secret of secrets: After death—what?

To draw aside the impenetrable veil between the visible and the invisible, solve the solemn mystery of death, to learn where and how her soul may adventure when the heart of her has ceased to beat—upon this great desire her thoughts concentrate, and her ambition centers. To sing? Yes, that is something. To know what lies beyond audible song and all things human—that to her is everything.

And so it has come to pass that Calve, who, living in the sunshine, has hitherto needed but to stretch forth a white, bejeweled hand for what she fancied, finds herself groping in the darkness for something which eludes her and which she craves above all else to possess. The key that will unlock the portal dividing the finite from the infinite. For many centuries many savants of many tongues have entered upon this self-same quest, passing alternately the milestones of hope, fear, doubt, faith, belief or disbelief, and one by one gone hence into the shadows, leaving behind no proof of discovery for others to take heart by. Calve's quest has led her to temples of mysticism in the Orient; to the abiding places of Buddha's disciples, closeted in the wilderness that solitude and prayer which might work miraculous results with the spiritual and material force of the body; to the land of the Nile, where broods the pregnant silence of the ages; to modern metropolis where men, laboring in the noise and glare, turn upon the so-called supernatural the cold white searchlight of scientific investigation; from France to Egypt, from California has Calve continued her quest. For this is no fad of an ennuied cantatrice seeking to while away hours of idleness; nor shallow purpose, caring merely for a new sensation. No lay student of the occult has brought greater earnestness to the task; none has persisted with more patience or keener interest, for she is a woman of uncommon mind and devoutly religious feelings. Nightly she kneels in prayer, daily she performs certain sacred rites, but when asked what her religion is she shakes her head. "Ask me when I return from India," she says.

It is around this contemplated journey to India that Calve is weaving all her plans. She will go as soon as it is possible to get away for a long enough period from the footlights. But not as the average tourist goes to wander the streets of strange cities and loiter among curio shops and list to the babble of foreign tongues. Somewhere among the Hindoo masters of the occult who dwell isolated in the Himalayas she hopes to find the key. She covets the mystic powers of the Indian adepts and will strive to attain them herself.

When Calve was not Calve, but a simple little peasant maid lisping her letters in far-away France, she was wont to gaze round-eyed at a great stone castle, a fine baronial castle near Aveyron, her village birthplace, which had frowned for centuries upon the humble homes that freckled the countryside. Her childish imagination loved to picture what it would be to live in such grandeur. Not long ago she went back to Aveyron and bought the castle. It is her most cherished possession, but she would willingly part with it if by so doing she could acquire the knowledge for which she is restlessly searching.

While in this city recently Calve, in pursuit of her experiments, visited in company with Salignac, Mr. C. V. Miller, whose form of mediumship is physical materialization, and who became known to the diva through Bernhardt and Coquelin. To him she gave several autographed portraits of herself. In Pasadena she had a peculiar encounter with a Hindoo, which I repeat exactly as it was told to me by an intimate friend of Calve, a young woman of education who resides with her mother in the French quarter, and who, because of a life-long friendship existing between her mother and Calve, was invited by the singer to go South with her as a companion and interpreter.

"Calve and I had an extraordinary adventure in Pasadena. Nothing in my life has so astonished and impressed me. It occurred two days after our arrival in the South. The day was lovely, the sun so warming the atmosphere that Mme. Calve thought a drive into the country would benefit her and revive her spirits, for she was feeling downhearted at having disappointed the San Francisco public by not singing as announced. A carriage was ordered and a pair of spirited horses. Provided with warm wraps, traveling blankets, a well-filled lunch basket and some bottles of the mineral water which Calve drinks almost exclusively, as it benefits her throat, we sped into the suburbs. I never saw Calve so happy. She kept humming bits of song, not from any opera, but the simple rural songs which she used to sing long ago with her girl playmates in Aveyron. My mother was one of those girls, so it was a double pleasure to listen.

"When we reached the mountain road the horses slackened their pace. Presently Calve, who had been noting the beauty of the landscape, ordered the coachman to stop. We left the carriage and wandered about in the glorious sunlight. It was nearly noon, so Calve told the driver to hitch his horses to a tree and bring the lunch basket. Meanwhile we discovered a sunny trail leading down to a picturesque canyon and Calve decided to have lunch below. We found a cozy spot in the sun that seemed safe, even for a singer with a cold. Here the blankets were spread, the basket opened, the driver given his portion of the delicacies and told to return to his horses.

"Calve was in charming mood. She seemed inspired by her surroundings. Lunch over, she tripped here and there, gathering flowers, ferns and red holly berries, which she admired very much. Then she sat down on the rugs and drew me to her side. After a short silence she suddenly said:

"'I wonder if there is an echo in this canyon!'

"Immediately her superb voice poured out those wonderful trills of which she is the musical master. Listening for a few seconds she burst forth with brilliant melody again and again. Surely such singing was never before heard in those hills. Waiting for the echo, we heard some strange, weird, incoherent sounds, and while we were endeavoring to make out what they meant, a man emerged from a nearby thicket and approached us. His appearance was far from assuring, and I felt frightened, for we were alone and away from the main road. He had a bronze-like skin and peculiar, inscrutable black eyes that somehow made me think of wells of ink.

"'Let us run!' I whispered to Calve.

"'Do not be afraid, ladies,' he said in a sweetly modulated voice, which astonished me exceedingly. 'I knew you were coming. I was waiting for you.'

"'Il est fou' (he is crazy), I murmured to Calve—'let us run.'

"Scarcely had I uttered the words, which he certainly could not have heard at that distance, when he said, also in French: 'No, ladies, I am not crazy. I am only a missionary from India, sent by my master or Guru there, to instruct people in the tenets of Buddhism. I live in a little hut on yonder mountain side and subsist on the proceeds of basket-making. This amply supplies my simple wants. Here is one. Will you buy it?'

"Calve handed him a $5 gold piece. 'I cannot change that,' he said. 'Keep it; the basket is worth it to me,' she replied. 'I am no beggar,' he responded with dignity. 'I want you to have the basket, for it will keep me en rapport with you.' Calve and I were somewhat nervous at the words of the mysterious intruder. She gave him a silver dollar. He smiled sadly, and said: 'I will see you both again,' and disappeared in the brush.

"I said that I thought him a half-demented creature, but Calve was impressed and of the opinion that the incident was part of some occult plan. We returned to the hotel and removed the dust of travel. Calve, desiring to open one of her trunks, could not find her keys. She searched excitedly everywhere, turning the room topsy-turvy and giving stormy vent to a temper which plays like forked lightning. The management was notified. There was great consternation.

"'The keys to my jewel box—they are lost,' wailed Calve, flinging herself upon her couch in utter dejection. Then who should appear upon the scene but the Hindoo, who, being admitted to our apartments handed the missing articles to her, saying: 'I told you we would meet again.'

"'But how did you get here so soon?' questioned Calve. 'The distance is great, our horses went fast, and you came on foot.'

"'My master of India helped me,' he responded.

"'My friend,' said Calve, 'if you can travel as fast as you did to-day, you must surely possess some occult power, and I most earnestly beseech of you to give us a demonstration of it here, and now.'

"'Very well,' acquiesced the Hindoo. 'I will do it for you because you yourself are gifted with great psychic powers which as yet lie dormant, needing only practice to develop them. Upon your bureau are some withered flowers, plucked a day or so ago, would you like to see them brought to life?'

"'With great joy,' assented Calve eagerly.

"'Then take that basin, fill it with water yourself and cover it with a towel.' Calve obeyed. The Hindoo commenced to make passes with his hands over the basin, not touching it, chanting meanwhile monotonously, then muttering, his eyes closed, his face taking on an ashen hue beneath its bronze. Perhaps five minutes elapsed. I was too absorbed to estimate time. Opening his eyes he sighed profoundly, saying to Calve in hoarse tones, 'Remove the towel.' She did so, tremblingly, and there, lifting their petals, fresh, fragrant, beautiful as before, were the flowers.

"'You have the same power,' said the Hindoo, addressing himself to Calve. 'Practice and pray. I will see you again.'

"When he withdrew, Calve for two hours talked to me of her investigations in the occult in foreign countries with famous scientists; how she traveled last year with mystics and Egyptologists of note to discover some of the secrets which the high priests there are known to possess; how she had been led to her investigations by being magnetized several years ago for an ailment which had baffled medical skill, and under this magnetic influence, while in a cataleptic condition, was carried to the seventh heaven, where such happiness existed that she did not want to return to earth.

"In Russia she met men most learned in the occult art, and in laboratories was given indubitable proofs of the existence and possibilities of unknown forces. Prince Alexander Oksakof and Dr. Franz Hartman favored her with satisfactory demonstrations."

Prof. A. Van der Naillen, of San Francisco, a scholar of distinguished attainments, analyzes the occult from a scientific standpoint in two volumes, "In the Sanctuary" and "On the Hights of Himalay." He is the associate when abroad of such men as Lombroso and Ducluax, the latter being director of the Pasteur Institute, and knows Calve well.

"Yes," he said to me, "Calve is a zealous student of the unseen forces which surround us and which are supposed to be the mysterious power guiding all our actions, if not controlling them. With her temperament she never does things by halves. She has studied with the known masters of psychological science in all the great capitals of Europe."

Creeds confuse. Some of us, too busy with breadwinning or the daily round of imperative duties to discriminate amongst them, have lit a little candle of faith by which we make out a path, and stumble along it as best we may. It does not fret us that this side of the grave we shall never find the key.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

MAN A CONSTANT CREATOR

Evolving Invisible Beings Which Become His Servants.

LILIAN WHITING, IN THE INTER OCEAN, REVIEWS ANNIE BESANT'S NEW WORK—ESOTERIC CHRISTIANITY.

The readers and followers of Annie Besant will be much interested in her latest work, entitled "Esoteric Christianity," which is brought out by John Lane, of "The Bodley Head," London and New York. It is a large book of some 400 pages, the argument of which is, as Mrs. Besant says in her "Forward," to suggest certain lines of thought as to the deep truths of Christianity. Mrs. Besant believes that the most profound truths can only be taught to the few, in a personal way, and never disseminated by the printing press; but that the lesser ones can be given in general circulation, and she claims that theosophy is as much esoteric Christianity as it is esoteric Buddhism. She discusses "The Hidden Side of Religions and of Christianity," "The Historical, Mythic and Mystic Christ," "The Atonement," "Resurrection and Ascension," "The Trinity," "Prayer," "The Forgiveness of Sins," "Sacraments," and "Revelations." A very interesting chapter is the one on "Prayer." It seems almost impossible for the ordinary student to discover the law according to which a prayer is, or is not, productive," says Mrs. Besant, and she proceeds to define the various kinds of prayer—petitions for definite worldly advantages, for the supply of physical necessities, and success in affairs. Again, the prayers for help in moral and intellectual difficulties, and for spiritual growth; for overcoming of temptations, for strength, insight, and enlightenment; and, again, the prayers "that consist in meditation, or an adoration of the divine perfection in intense aspiration for union with God."

Noting these three definite classes or orders of prayer, Mrs. Besant goes on to say:

"In the invisible world there exist many kinds of intelligences, which come into relationship with man, a veritable Jacob's ladder, on which the angels of God ascend and descend, and above which stands the Lord himself. Some of these intelligences are mighty spiritual powers; others are exceedingly limited beings, inferior in consciousness to man. This occult side of nature—of which more will presently be said—is a fact recognized by all religions. All the world is filled with living things, invisible to fleshly eyes. The invisible worlds interpenetrate the visible and crowds of intelligent beings throng round us on every side. Some of these are accessible to human requests, and others are amenable to the human will. Christianity recognizes the existence of the higher classes in intelligences under the general name of angels, and teaches that they are 'ministering spirits sent forth to minister;' but what is their ministry, what the nature of their work, what their relationship to human beings, all that was part of the instruction given in the lesser mysteries, as the actual communication with them was enjoyed in the greater; but in modern days these truths have sunk into the background, except the little that is taught in the Greek and Roman communions. For the Protestant the 'ministry of angels' is little more than a phrase.

"In addition to these, man is himself a constant creator of invisible beings, for the vibrations of his thoughts and desires create forms of subtle matter, the only life of which is the thought or the desire which ensouls them; he thus creates an army of invisible servants, who range through the invisible worlds seeking to do his will. Yet again there are in these worlds human helpers, who work there in their subtle bodies while their physical bodies are sleeping, whose attentive ear may catch a cry for help. And to crown all, there is the ever-present, ever-conscious life of God himself, potent and responsive at every point of his realm—that all-pervading, all-embracing life in which we live and move. As naught that can give pleasure or pain can touch the human body without the sensory nerves carrying the message of its impact to the brain centers, and as there thrills down from those centers through the motor nerves the answer that welcomes or repels, so does every vibration in the universe, which is His body, touch the consciousness of God and draw thence responsive action. Nerve cells, nerve threads, and muscular fibers may be the agents of feeling and moving; but it is the man who feels and acts; so may myriads of intelligences be the agents, but it is God who knows and answers.

"Nothing can be so small as not to affect that delicate, omnipresent consciousness, nothing so vast as to transcend it. * * In the deepest sense of the word there is no life, no energy, in his universe that does not come from God; but the intermediate agency, according to the Divine laws, is the desire form created by the prayer."

WORK AN INTELLECTUAL STIMULUS.

This remarkable analysis continues through a long chapter and the temptation to quote from it is almost irresistible. The book is one of exceptional value as both an intellectual stimulus and a spiritual aid. It has the large grasp of all contemporary thought, the deep knowledge of Oriental wisdom and of all the philosophies; the sincere, reverent spirit, and that crystal clearness of expression that characterizes Annie Besant. It is an indispensible book to take into one's inner life, and it is fairly a spiritual telescope, revealing an infinite region of truth bearing on the conduct and successive achievements of human life. Mrs. Besant's "Esoteric Christianity" may well be described as an epoch-making book, and is an added instance of the very fine literary judgment that characterizes that eminent international publisher, Mr. John Lane.

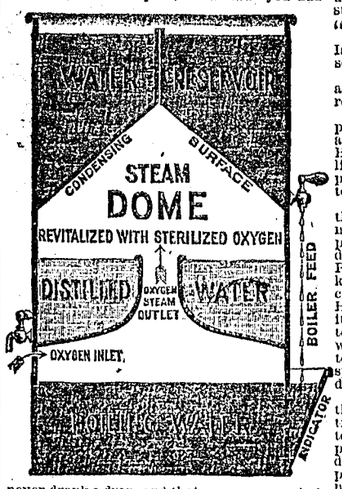
Poison in Drinking Water.



Alarming Increase of Death Rate Has Caused a Thorough Scientific Examination of All Waters Used for Drinking Purposes in Public Institutions, and 90 Per Cent Have Been Found to Contain Large Quantities of Animal, Vegetable and Mineral Poisons, Causing the Most Serious of All Conditions, Known to the Medical Profession as Auto-Infection.

Stop! Consider! Comprehend! that in every drop of water you drink there lurks the deadly germ of poison.

Water from a city reservoir, the spring, the well, or the cistern, teems with live matter. Any physician will tell you that this is true. The most serious complications of the kidneys arise from a decomposition of animal and vegetable matter, carried into the system through the medium of drinking-water. These substances, along with poisonous minerals, cannot be carried off with sufficient rapidity, and simply lodge there—a putrid mass interfering with and destroying the most important functions of the human body. Your kidneys must be kept clean. They are human filters.

There never has been a filter constructed, no matter how perfect, that has been able to completely remove this terrible parent of a thousand ills—THE LIVE POISONS.

Pure water is a food! You cannot live without it, but when impure, better that you had never drank a drop, and that you were parched with the burning fever of thirst, than to feed the disease with a live poison in the water you drink.

Do not carry into the system what will one day bring nothing but sickness, sorrow and a ruined life! Fevers, Gout and Rheumatism are simply the result of filth dumped down the throat.

Remember!

Nothing is given man complete. It remains for him to work out his own salvation this means the care of his health.

You are responsible for the health of every part of your body. Could the power of the human eye be increased to that of an ordinary magnifying glass, you would vomit at the sight of the putrid matter the insect life that you have unconsciously taken into your system.

All physicians acknowledge that disease is a live germ. To destroy the disease, destroy the cause—the germs that feed upon the refuse matter lodged in the kidneys, and carried there by the water you drink.

From its ceaseless and exacting labor the kidneys are subject to many forms of disease.

Typhoid Fever is always more prevalent where the sewerage is insufficient. The Spring and Fall of the year bring the usual number of victims. They are legion.

Nature's laws are fixed! You can not break them! They break you!

So, when you carry impurities into the blood, in the water you drink, you do not break any law, but Nature punishes you with Fevers, Gout, Rheumatism, Stomach Trouble, Diarrhea, Constipation, Diabetes, Gravel, etc.

But there is a sudden and more terrible consequence of Nature's punishment that but few realize, and yet the thousands who fill the wards of our Insane Asylums are living examples of this truth long disregarded—the close and intimate relation between the brain and the kidneys. Will people never learn that insanity comes in a vast majority of cases from sinful disregard to the healthful condition of the kidneys, and that these dire results might be avoided by the use of pure distilled water.

We offer you a remedy, in a natural and healthful aid that is so cheap that its purchase is within the range of any person, and so simple that a child can understand and appreciate its construction.

Once tested, and its wonderful, beneficent results are made known, and as pain leaves, and a new hope is born into your life, then, and not until then, will you realize the truth of our statement, that the

"Puritan" New Process Water Still

Is one of the greatest blessings that has been sent to man.

Water, to be pure, must be evaporated, aerated, condensed, thoroughly oxygenated and renewed in life. This distillation does

The Puritan Still is so constructed that no part of the precipitate once separated ever again becomes a part of the liquid you drink. By our process of distillation, the active and live poisons are killed and separated completely from the water, and are left in the bottom of the Still, and easily removed.

Do you value health? Do you want to attain that goal of every one's ambition in life—happiness? Then give attention to the first principles of attainment. See that the water you drink is made pure and wholesome by the Puritan Water Still. For unless you keep the kidneys and bladder free from unhealty accumulation, you can not expect to be healthy. Health means condition of personal purity in its highest and most exalted sense. You owe it to the children you have brought into the world, to the wife and mother, and to posterity, to prevent, by every intelligent means, the spreading of disease, suffering and untimely death.

The Puritan Water Still makes a long step in this direction. Won't you give it a ten days' trial? We will gladly send it to you on these terms. Its construction is based on scientific principles. It does remove every atom of a disease-breeding character, leaving the water a pure, wholesome and health-giving food. Do not forget this point. Water distilled in the Puritan is food and life. Water not distilled is poison. Do not be guilty of Self-Poisoning, when you can be saved these dire effects by the investment of a few dollars.

A ten days' experience will give you a lifelong confidence in the Puritan. Do not put it off.

It requires no plumbing, but is ready for immediate use. It is

You know the road to ruin is paved with many a cobble-stone of delay. Just think of it! 88 will save a thousand-fold the investment in time, health and doctors' bills.

Our reputation has been built on the character of the Puritan Water Still, and this statement is attested by hundreds of testimonials of those who have been saved from that slow and terrible death of Water Poison.

These testimonials come from all classes alike—the ministers of the gospel, physicians, trained nurses, lawyers, bankers, mechanics and the farmer—all unsolicited, and in one accord speak the highest praise of the benefits derived from the Puritan Water Still.

ENCOMIUM.

With Some Pertinent Suggestions.

To the Editor:—Your paper needs no encomium of mine. It needs only to be read to be appreciated by the thinker. It takes a brave man to conduct such a paper; for truth is not always a "welcome guest," and as you admit to its columns the best thought of our times, the "wise ones" always have a "protest," because it does not fit their pet theories. It is truth that will bring men and women out of darkness into the light; and whatever the source may be from which this may come, should be welcomed by mankind.

It is well, at the same time, to keep this thought in mind; that no philosophy, cult, or religion has, or ever had, the all of truth. In studying the world's four great religions, I have come to the conclusion that all of them have been useful factors in the evolution of the people to whom they came. And they who study them in the spirit that Annie Besant and others have done, will become more charitable, and less intolerant of the opinions and beliefs of others.

The Spiritualist who does not take a Spiritualist paper, and I regret to say, many who do, when names of Christian Science, Mental Science, Theosophy, or Occult Science are mentioned, raise their hands in holy horror and exclaim, "What is there in those things that can teach us anything?" To such I will say, the only competent witness in any case is the one who knows something of the facts; and the more familiar with the facts the more competent the witness. An important lesson for us all to learn is our own limitations. Mentally we may be compared to the microscopes of many different powers to magnify, each having its limitation. No. 1 takes in a limited view just out of the range of physical vision. No. 2 reaching a little farther into the realm of the invisible. No 3 a little farther still; and as we add to the magnifying power of our microscope, we enter deeper into the realm of the infinitesimal. Our first lesson is to know the power of our microscope. And if ours is No. 1 or 2, let us learn to be just and not find fault with No. 3, 4 or 5 because they reveal truths ours cannot take cognizance of.

A. J. CHAMPION.

Pray Without Ceasing.

I have never expressed myself on prayer, in your very liberal paper, but reading an article in your paper of Jan. 11, 1902, under the heading, Prayer, it finds many sincere debaters. The writer signs J. H. and M. T. Neff, M. D.

Many minds are relieved by prayer, so are they by swearing; both are cultivated by habit, yet they come from different departments of the human mind, and yet we are as apt to find as true manhood in the swearer as the prayer, and as for the power that prompts both praying and swearing, to me is the same power manifesting through different organs, the same as light from the sun, the rays impregnate all grades of matter, yet it is the same power of light. The ancient occult writers called God light, and also love, and God is also called spirit, the positive ray of life that impregnates all grades of matter. Matter and mother mean the same by occultists, it is the finite part of the educated animal that has misconstrued those occult writings, and personified a holy virgin, a Jesus and God.

Sincerity in prayer is no sign of moral and spiritual unfoldment. They prayed to their idol when they burned heretics and Quakers. There are good people in and out of the churches, but praying did not make them good. Right thoughts and actions develop the moral and spiritual faculties of the human animal.

Another Page in the History of Spiritualism.

As stated last week, The Progressive Thinker will introduce at no distant day a new page in the History of Spiritualism. It will be a great surprise to many who have supposed that certain profound statements led to a certain individual as their author, whereas quite the reverse is true. There is nothing grander, more beautiful, or more soul-uplifting than the truth, wherever it may originate. While this disclosure does not in the least discredit any one, it does make known a master mind that heretofore has not received proper credit, and who is entitled to recognition. The Progressive Thinker leads in trying to solve the great problems of the age, presenting each week a vast amount of Spiritual and Occult matters, which every Spiritualist and advanced thinker should be familiar with. Now is the time to introduce the paper to the attention of your friends generally, inducing them, if possible, to subscribe, and thus keep in the front ranks of the advancing procession.

The Progressive Thinker.

Published every Saturday at 40 Loomis St.

J. R. FRANCIS, Editor and Publisher.

Entered at Chicago Postoffice as second-class matter.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER will be furnished until further notice, at the following terms, invariably in advance:

FRANCIS, No. 40 Loomis Street, Chicago, Ill.

TAKE NOTICE.

☞At expiration of subscription, if not renewed, the paper is discontinued. No bills will be sent for extra numbers.

☞If you do not receive your paper promptly write to us, and any errors in address will be promptly corrected, and missing numbers supplied gratis.

☞Whenever you desire the address of your paper changed, always give the address of the place to which it is then sent or the change cannot be made.

FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER is furnished in the United States at $1.00 per year, the postage thereon being but a nominal, but when it is sent to foreign countries we are compelled to charge 50 cents extra, making the yearly subscription $1.50. Please bear that in mind.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 25, 1902.

The Morris Pratt Institute.

An appeal that should be heeded, and met with generous response by Spiritualists, is that made by the veteran worker, Moses Hull, in The Progressive Thinker this week.

The Morris Pratt Institute is an enterprise that holds out great promise of good to the cause of Spiritualism, if it is adequately supported. Its usefulness can hardly be over-estimated, in placing Spiritualism on higher ground before the world, and making it more worthy to stand, in the person of its representatives—its public teachers—in equal estimation, in literary culture, with the accredited teachers in the pulpits of the popular churches.

It has been a great detriment and a standing disgrace to our cause, that the illiteracy of many public workers has been painfully manifest to intelligent and educated listeners, whose ears have been shocked by gross falsities in grammar as well as in other respects in which a fair degree of education is especially desirable.

One who is not grounded in the essentials of an English education, to the extent that his public utterances are reasonably near correctness in the grammatical use of language, often makes a sorry display of his lack of literary culture, and causes well educated friends to blush with shame over his errors of speech.

To give an example, a somewhat noted Spiritualist "pastor" and "Rev.," being asked the question: What is the office of the spleen in the human body? he arose before his audience, and grandiloquently answered, "There are no spleen."

And some of his hearers were well educated and intelligent people. Just think of it! Such a display as that! On the part of a public teacher!

If his answer was given under inspiration, it showed that there were ignoramuses in spirit life as well as in the mortal. An educated and well-read medium would not be subject to such inspiration as that.

In any case it emphasizes the necessity for liberal education of public workers in the cause of Spiritualism.

Such and too many other similar instances that might be mentioned emphasize the need of an educational institution where not only the essential elements of English can be acquired, for the proper literary qualifications for public speakers and mediums, but also where the environments, and the work of president and professors, will conduce to send forth into the great world of life and business, men and women who shall be not only well informed in a general sense, but well informed and intelligent—as Spiritualists.

What Can We Do for Spiritualism?

This is a query that may well interest every Spiritualist—every one that loves its truths, and loves the great sweet message it brings to humanity.

This message is so different in many important respects from the ordinary types of religion, or doctrinal dogmas, enunciated in the church creeds and confessions of faith, that it stands out like the luminous sun amid darkening clouds of gloom and sadness.

If we but let our minds dwell on the terrible teachings of orthodoxy, till we in some real degree realize in thought the horrors unspeakable embodied in the old theology,—thousands of tender hearts have sunk under the burden, in deepest despair over the destiny of loved ones.

To many sorrowing despairing ones Spiritualism has come bearing a message of light and life, dispelling darkness and death.

Others have been rescued from the cheerless outlook of materialism, to rejoice in the knowledge of a future life, and the prospect of a destiny of progress in the endless Beyond.

Certainly Spiritualists have reason to rejoice and be glad, at the largeness and brightness of the great light of their truth and knowledge. Will not the degree of their appreciation be manifested by the interest they feel in efforts to uphold the Cause and extend to others the light and knowledge of the truth?

There are wide fields open for earnest beneficent effort. The Progressive Lyceum, the Home Circle, the local Society, and other means of upholding Spiritualism and extending its influence, appeal to the minds and hearts of all well-wishers to our cause.

Beside these, the Spiritualist papers are an efficient aid and should not be overlooked, but given hearty and generous support.

Our children and young people should be trained and educated as Spiritualists, and not as orthodox religionists. They should be taught the sweeter and brighter, the more lovely, humane and sensible ideas and knowledge that pertain to Spiritualism in its best and truest import. The facts of genuine spiritual phenomena, and the philosophy and ethics grounded on spiritual facts and knowledge, should be taught, inculcated and nurtured, till they become settled fixities in the mental being.

The minds of children should not be left as fallow or uncultivated ground, nor left to the plow and harrow, the sowing and reaping of orthodox Sunday-Schools.

In connection with these things, the important matter of the proper education of the workers and those who would become such in the field of spiritual labor, as mediums and lecturers, should not be ignored or forgotten. A brave and noble attempt is now being made by Moses Hull and others to establish an educational institution adapted to meet this great want of Spiritualism, which will place our cause on a better footing, and enable it to have a higher standing among the intelligent and cultured minds of the world.

The Morris Pratt Institute should receive the hearty and generous support of all who have the good of our cause at heart.

Another good project that should not be forgotten is the Mediums' Home at Reed City, Mich., under the auspices of the National Spiritualists' Association. This is a distinctly humanitarian enterprise, for the benefit of disabled and wornout workers in our cause, and is deserving of liberal support by all Spiritualists.

The establishment and support of such institutions as these mentioned will give strength, weight and momentum to our cause, and the world will be made the better by their influence.

Last, but not least in importance, to be mentioned at this time: There is with each Spiritualist the great, the excellent, the beautiful work of beautifying one's own soul by the cultivation of a high, pure, beautiful spirituality. This is the true and abiding riches, which we shall carry with us into that other life when the mortal falls on earth.

Such are some of the things we can do for Spiritualism.

Parallel Cases.

A girl fell dead in a ball room! And the preacher made the incident a text for exposing the great wickedness of dancing parties. He told how God abhorred the act; and the sudden death, cutting the poor girl off in the prime of life, was evidence of his awful displeasure. He warned the young and thoughtless to avoid the ball room as they would instant death.

A preacher, grown gray in the service of the church, tells the Lord on his bended knees, of the great grief he is experiencing because of the sins of his flock. His voice trembles, falls; his arms drop; he falls forward upon his face; is dead! No warning voice is heard advising non-attendance on the church. The latter was as much an "act of God" as the former, and the lesson is as pointed in the one case as in the other.

HULL---JAMIESON DEBATE.

The Hull-Jamieson Debate will be resumed at an early date. There was unavoidable delay in preparing the manuscript for the printer.

THE SPIRIT WORLD IMPINGES ON THIS.

DYING LUMBERMAN KNOWS HIS FATHER IS KILLED—A GIRL HEARS HIS CRY.

Believers in what is occult or the telepathic, as set forth in a special letter to the Chicago Inter Ocean, from Hull, Canada, will perhaps find no difficulty in accounting for the following occurrences in a Gatineau lumbering shanty. Ordinary mortals of conservative ideas find it not easy to explain them. The facts are vouched for by a clergyman.

A party of lumberman were engaged in piling logs on Christmas eve. They made the piles unusually high. The teamsters expostulated with the log rollers for doing so, because of the danger to the lumbermen, if their cant-hooks should slip while they were rolling the heavy logs to such an elevation.

Joseph Gingras, a young French-Canadian, had just made some jesting reply when his foot slipped and the forty-inch thirteen-foot log slid down upon his shoulder and rolled over him to the ground. His companions carried him to the shanty, where he was immediately put to bed and made as comfortable as possible.

As night came on he fell into a kind of stupor. From this he awakened in a high fever, talking about his father.

"I know you would come, I was sure of it, father, mine. You had better hurry; step along; come quick, my father," he kept calling.

After a time he went on, "Keep away from that rollway; don't rest there; get away from the logs." And then, in greatest excitement, "There! just what I told you! Oh, he's killed, he's killed! I know it. Mon Dieu, il est mort!"

With that a quantity of blood gushed from his mouth, and he fell back in the rigor of fast approaching death. There was just one last sobbing cry, heard above the litany of his comrades as they knelt around him in the old habitant fashion, "Marie, oh, Marie!" and he had gone.

DEAD MAN AT LOG PILE.

Perhaps it was natural that on Christmas day some of the idle men should make their way to the pile of logs, the scene of the accident of the preceding day. But they were quite unprepared for what they found there.

During the night several of the logs had bulged out of their places in the heap and rolled down to the roadway. And underneath them, crushed into the snow, and, of course, stone dead, was an elderly man, and nearby a little valise he had apparently set down while resting on the pile.

The body was carried to the shanty and laid in the next bunk to that occupied by Joseph Gingras' body. In trying to learn the man's identity the lumbermen discovered in one of his pockets this letter, written by Joseph Gingras:

"My Dear Papa:—All goes well so far, and now we are settled for the winter near Catfish Lake. You must know the place—just near the Tomassine portage road, three or four miles north of the lake. But yet I know not why I stay, unless it be to forget all about Marie and her deviltries. For the work I like not, and Israel is not here, after all. No matter; the good God will not let him escape for what he has done to me with his lying tongue.

"And me? My father, you must do just this one thing for me: Come to me here. Come for the Noel sure. Maybe you will see me never more if you come not now. I did wrong to leave you, to persuade you not to come with me as before. Sure, sure come for the Noel. Your affectionate one,

"JOSEPH."

So it was father and son, killed within a few hours of each other, at the same spot, who were lying in neighboring berths in the same shanty in the stillness of death at the Noel or Christmas tide.

Just two days later, the clerk of the shanty and one of the teamsters were in the office awaiting their turn to report to the local manager of their employers' firm at River Desert, when they heard a voluble, showily dressed woman asking for the address of the shanty where Joseph Gingras was employed.

MARIE'S VISION AT NIGHT.

Her sleigh was outside and she was distracted until she could reach that place. Monsieur would not believe her, for truly, yes, truly, she had been told in a vision of the night and in her own soul she felt that she was wanted.

Two, three days before had she heard her Joseph call to her and go to him she would, to leave him never more no matter what people said any more. And the old man Gingras he had himself sent a boy to her house on Christmas day to tell her to make haste and go to River Desert if she wanted to meet Joseph once more.

And the lumbermen were compelled to tell her that the bodies of father and son were even then on the sled at the door.

It was at 11 o'clock on Christmas eve, when Marie was putting on her wraps in the hallway of her home to go to midnight mass, that she distinctly heard her lover call her name in agonizing tones, she fancied from the head of the stairs. At which hour the man she had parted from in anger because of evil reports of his sayings respecting her, was dying 300 miles away with her name on his lips.

The Reign of Blood.

Whenever a preacher is driven to the wall in discussion, the habit is almost universal, to tell of the terrible carnival of crime that prevailed in France during the French Revolution, which they ascribe to Atheism. They seem ignorant of the fact that the reign of blood culminated under the administration of Robespierre, who was not an Atheist, but was loyal to the Christian faith, a Catholic by birth and education. It was he who decreed a festival to the Supreme Ruler of the Universe, on which occasion he presided in solemn pomp.

Instead of Atheism being responsible for those terrible orgies of blood, at that festival there were figures representing Atheism, Discord and Selfishness. Robespierre on assuming his place as presiding officer over the fete, made a grandiloquent speech extolling the reign of Wisdom which personified God, then he descended from his exalted place in the amphitheatre, and receiving a lighted torch, set fire to the monsters against whom he had exhausted his vocabulary of invective. These were soon consumed in flame, whilst the youths drew their swords, and joining hands with the old men and mothers, pointing towards heaven they made solemn vows of homage to the Supreme Being. See Thiers "History of the French Revolution," London edition of 1845, Vol. 2, pages 29, 30. That does not sound like Atheism.

Let us place along side that era of blood in France a paragraph extracted from an article in the English Sunday Magazine for July last, just coming under our observation, which shows very forcibly the sources of blood and violence. We quote from this truthful Christian publication:

"It is a historical fact, and one of the most lamentable in morals, that bigotry, which the Church has counted almost a virtue, and of which very few people repent, has been the cause of larger misery to the human race than any other sin, than the love of money, or the lusts of the flesh. It has been the cause of the bitterest and cruelest wars ever waged, where mercy was shown neither to man nor woman, from the Crusades to the War of the Thirty Years; from the Civil war in England to the massacres in Ireland. For the sake of religion, and in the name of God, Mohammedans have massacred Christians, and Christians Mohammedans; Romanists have tortured Protestants, and Protestants Romanists; Episcopalians have persecuted Presbyterians, and Presbyterians Episcopalians; the Waldensians were hunted in their valleys like wild beasts, and the blood of the Covenanters was mingled with the wine of the Sacrament on Scottish moors; the flower of the French nation was cut down on St. Bartholomew's Eve; the Spaniards erected the Inquisition, and forfeited their place among the free nations; the Friends, gentlest of all Christian communities, were treated as criminals by the Puritans; and Unitarians, the most ethical of all denominations, have been made religious outcasts. All this has been done in the name of faith, and most of it in the name of Christ."

The sorrowful feature in this terrible arraignment of Christianity, by one of its own members, it is true to the letter! Don't we read in an old Saxon proverb, "The smoke-colored kettle should not call the soot-begrimed spider by hard names?" But in this case the spider was not begrimed. The French Revolution was a reflection of our own Revolution, to overthrow kingly and priestly tyranny, and the usurpations of the aristocracy, while the bloody sacrifice was incidental to that contest. Priests have misrepresented the facts pertaining to it for a purpose.

Psychic Influence in Church Work.

Spiritualists and managers of Children's Progressive Lyceums, and as well all who have the care and training of children, may gather a profitable lesson from the utterances of the Rev. Clifford Snowdon, as epitomized in the Chicago Daily News:

At a meeting of the Congregaational ministers of Chicago a paper treating of the novel subject, "Religion and Psychology," was read by the Rev. Clifford Snowdon, pastor of St. Paul's Congregational church at Beverly Hills, which aroused deep interest and brought forth a lively discussion. In the course of his paper Mr. Snowdon urged the application of psychological methods to church and school work, emphasizing the importance of the Sunday-School, and criticizing the present methods of teaching as antiquated. He also intimated that church members might profit by the exhibition of faith made by the Christian Scientists, followers of Dowie and other so-called divine or mind healers, declaring that through the use of mental suggestion they were undoubtedly accomplishing many cures, and that it would be well for the churches, instead of sneering at the subject, to recognize the question of suggestive therapeutics as a practical reality and a field from which church members should not be barred.

Speaking of the subject of his paper, Mr. Snowdon said:

The study of psychology according to modern scientific methods has done incalculable good for our common-school system. There is nothing occult about the processes or methods of modern psychology. The investigators simply observe the phenomena, tabulate results and formulate conclusions which they call laws. Religion is perhaps the latest great object of human interest to be examined by this method. We have been in the habit in prayer-meetings to tell our experiences, thoughts and feelings. The psychologists simply enlarge the field of the prayer-meeting and compare the experiences of religious people by means of printed lists of questions. From the answers to these questions averages are taken, results compared and general tendencies shown.

It is very clearly shown by this study that what we religious people call "conversion" is not at all an abnormal experience, but clearly normal. The physical and mental change is so great that no other name is more applicable than the one given by the founder of our religion in the "new birth." It is in the study of this transition period that psychology has been most effectively applied. In the transition period of a child's life, if a minister is alive to his opportunities and in touch with the child, he will be able to assist incalculably in that change which comes to the mind of the child when it finds itself emerging into a larger and richer world of experiences, and to exert a lasting influence for good upon it. This is done by individual work and with definite knowledge of the individual characteristics of each boy or girl, fitting the method to the individual.

A better understanding of the boys and girls by the ministers and Sunday-School teachers must result in keeping the young people in the churches. The Christian training of the young people is the most important consideration of all and methods of teaching must be applied by which they will learn that honor, purity, humility and love are not mere abstractions for study and application on Sundays only, but are vital parts of everyday life. The brightest and keenest minds of the Christian world are devoting their attention to the problem of religious education.

Do I think that faith is waning? Well, there is an unanswerable argument in the present tendency to believe in Christian Science, Dowieism, and fifty other cults and isms. I was speaking recently with a young man on the subject of religion. He was an intelligent Chicago business man. He told me that he had lost faith even in the fundamentals of Christianity. The clause in the apostles' creed that spoke of the miraculous birth was to him utterly unbelievable. I asked him what his present religious attitude was. His reply was: "Well, I think that the transmigration of souls is nearer the truth." Now, that fellow couldn't see how utterly ridiculous was the state of mind that could swallow the transmigration of souls and not believe the possibility of the miraculous birth of Christ! I know half a dozen so-called skeptics who believe in telepathy and disbelieve things much more probable.

A little light from the study of modern psychology would do more for such cases than years of preaching. The trouble is that the general public is enlightened by everybody except the specialist who really knows, because he, unfortunately, doesn't care whether the general public knows anything or not. To the newspaper and the pulpit this mediating of knowledge must remain for years to come, and it behooves us to gain our information as clearly as possible.

Some teachings on suggestive therapeutics will dispel the halos that burden the brow of a good many "healers."

The Foundation Is Defective.

Very Reverend Frederic W. Farrar, Dean of Canterbury, and without question the ablest person intellectually among the many scholarly prelates in the Church of England, has startled the entire religious world with the declaration that the established church must make radical reforms in its system, else lose its influence with the English people. The Dean says: "Ceremonials, rituals and theological subtleties must be abandoned, and a living spirit infused into the forms of the state religion." He adds: "The drift of working people is from the church. The prayer book no longer attracts the people. The poor complain the services are too long and tiresome. The saloon and gambling dens are more valued than the sanctuary. He demands immediate action to prevent the pending calamity.

The only salvation for the Church of England, or any other resting on the same foundation, is to discard its antiquated creed, with its base in Paganism, and build anew on the rock of Eternal Truth. The old structure rests on quicksand, and it cannot endure the great pressure which modern knowledge has imparted to it. Even propings won't save it; neither will temporary reconstruction of crumbling basic walls. A new foundation must be sought, and from corner-stone to turret perfect material must be used, such as has been tested by the wisdom of the ages which the corroding tooth of time cannot destroy.

Alarmed at the Advance of Mormonism.

Great anxiety is expressed by churchmen at the spread of Mormonism. It is reported two Mormon churches are in active operation in Brooklyn, one in Manhattan, one in Philadelphia, and a strong and growing Mormon settlement on the borders of Pennsylvania and New Jersey, and the strongest church in a section of fifty miles from Jersey City is Mormon.

It is further stated, Mormons own land from the Rocky mountains to the Sierras, and control the politics of four Western States. Two thousand Mormon missionaries are actively pursuing propaganda work, sixty in the State of New York.

The Mormons are many times more numerous seventy years from their first organization than were Christians at a corresponding period, accepting church history as valid authority.

The activity and zeal displayed by this sect of Latter Day Saints, and the rapid spread of the faith, suggests the possibility that the time may come when it may become the dominant religion. Who should care? In every essential feature they are orthodox. They swear by the Father, Son and Holy Ghost. They have great respect for the Junior God's mother. Their heaven is identical with that of the prevailing religion; their hell is just as broad, deep and enduring; the fire is just as hot, and their Devil is just as mean as was John Calvin's. The early Christians were polygamists—those who thought enough of a home to marry—and were denounced as bitterly, persecuted as savagely, and hated as supremely by the ruling classes as are the Mormons.

How to Usher in the Millennial Dawn.

I.

Much has been said in reference to a millennial day when all wrongs will be righted; when the sunshine will be more genial, the flowers richer with incense, the fruit more luscious and nourishing, all things needful more responsive to the wishes of man, the golden sunset richer in colors, and the morning dawn sweeter with the smiles of nature and the songs of birds. Then each human being will become a savior—to save some one beneath his station in life from pain and anguish, always making an effort to elevate him or her to his own plane of happiness and comfort. But the millennium is not here yet with its golden stairs and its angelic scenes that lead to perennial happiness, where one can hold sweet communion with the brightest and wisest beings; as yet it is only a fairy-dream, with enchanted chambers where one's aspirations only have to be expressed to be realized and enjoyed—a happy delusion that for a time sends thrills of ecstatic pleasure through the soul, and presents scenes of oriental magnificence and luxury. With some the millennium is a golden stairway that leads out of misery into the glorious scenes of bliss; out of poverty into the gilded domain of wealth where every want is anticipated and supplied. It is the dream of all religions to experience sometime the enchanted millenium where all wrongs will be instantly righted and where pains will be turned to perennial joys of peace. Every individual expects to attain to the millennial state sometime on the spirit side of life, the home of angels and of Gods.

II.

Leaving the world as it is expected to be sometime in the golden fairy-like millennial future, where thoughts are supposed to be really things—the thought of a mansion producing one; the thought of a garden robed in flowers of exquisite sweetness, bringing it right by your side; the thought of a fountain iridescent with all of nature's varied tints and colors, resulting in it standing out in bold relief before you; the thought of the warbling birds of the air with their songs baptized with the sweet dew of the morning bringing them before you with throats attuned to heaven's melody—leaving the world as it is expected to be in the millenial era, we draw in our fancy and step down on solid facts—the world as it is!

III.

While the millennium is not here with its bounteous blessings or benedictions, we still can begin to see its dawn in certain persons whose natures are mirrors which reflect the angel, the beauty of heaven and the grandeur of goodness, and the sweet peace and happiness that flows in rippling melody into the soul when toiling for others. They are mirrors which reflect sunshine from the smiles of love that proceed from the features of philanthropists on the spirit side of life. They are simply God-like. They labor incessantly for others; from the garden of their souls there goes forth sweet tendrils of affection that entwine themselves around the unfortunate and draw them up to a higher plane. Their very thoughts are rich in philanthropic plans that, as they go forth, blossom into fruition in many different ways. They are angels who, in the disguise of mortals, walk in the darkness and gloom of earth, and dissipate the same with the charming radiance of their features and the vibrations of their warm, wholesome natures. The millennial dawn is beautifully foreshadowed in them, and were it not for their presence on earth, it would soon become a charnel house. Usually they are not on the rostrum, nor in the higher walks of life, nor in fashionable, exclusive circles. They seem to live to reflect like a mirror the millennial dawn, to foreshadow the good time coming when the whole world will be linked together in bonds of fraternal love and good will. Are you such a mirror? Do you reflect in your life the millennial dawn?

IV.

There is nothing so beautiful, so angelic, or so God-like as a thoroughly good woman, whose love cords like sweet flower-laden vines, coil around in fond embrace every poor and unfortunate mortal, and draws them up higher just as the sun's rays in the morning's golden dawn draws the dewdrops of the night up to sweeten the clouds before they send down their refreshing showers upon the earth. The thoroughly good woman is the advance courier of the millennial dawn and she in her works and deeds heralds the good time coming. The thoroughly good woman lives for others. Her life is a perennial source of good deeds and benedictions, as at one time related by a Chicago daily.

She devoted herself to the one blessed task of looking after the children brought to the police station on various charges, and, if possible, preventing their entrance upon a criminal career. Some idea of the number of little creatures that our laws seem deliberately framed to injure may be obtained when it is stated that she goes to but one station-house and concerns herself only with prisoners under 14 years of age, and yet her time is more than occupied. To be sure, she has chosen the station for her base of operation, where the business of five precincts is conducted. Here she is on hand every morning at 9 to see if there is not some way of saving the trembling lad who has broken a window or pilfered fruit from being thrown into the companionship of older and more hardened offenders. She makes herself answerable for his future good behavior, she goes to his home and impresses his mother with the importance of seeing to his steady attendance at school, she goes to his teacher and arranges for special oversight over that boy, including a report as to whether he does or does not appear regularly at all sessions. For almost invariably children brought before the police station are children who have been playing truant and have been urged on by bad advice from older boys.

V.

Thus it is that the really good woman reflects like a mirror the millennial dawn, and assists in advancing the world to a higher plane. Every human soul should be a mirror to reflect nothing but good deeds, generous impulses and philanthropic acts. That alone is the divine object of its mission. The human soul that reflects anything else is distorted, has never gained its proper adjustment, and is not in touch with the angels, and is now on a low plane.

VI.

"What are you doing, my good fellow?" I inquired of one of earth's unfortunate creatures, as I saw him emerging from his room after a night's debauch. "I have been polishing myself, cleaning myself, shaving myself, and having a general housecleaning," he replied. "Hereafter I propose to reflect from the mirror of my soul, all that is clean, pure and noble; good-by darkness and evil; good morning the light of a day scintillating with new hopes and high resolves. Early this morning, just as I was recovering from the revelries of the previous night, my room seemed to become grandly illuminated, and there stood an angel sister, robed in white, with a smile of ineffable sweetness playing on her features, with its lights and shades, as if placed there by the brush of one of God's own artists. Entranced I gazed on the scene, while she in piteous tones pleaded with me, for my own dear mother's sake, to leave my wicked ways. Entwining her arms around my neck, she uttered a fervent prayer for my redemption, and exacted a solemn promise from me, that henceforth my soul should be as a mirror to reflect nothing but pure thoughts, good deeds, generous impulses, and kind acts to lead to the redemption of the unfortunate. I stand forth redeemed!"

VII.

Thus a human soul, steeped in debauchery, was reformed, resolving to reflect in a measure the millennial dawn when the whole world will stand forth redeemed. As the angel sister saved her erring brother, so should each one save somebody less fortunate, and so polish their natures that they will reflect nothing in their daily walks of life, but that which is pure and holy.

TAKE NOTICE--WATSON.

Wm. Lovegrove, 453 South Flower street, Los Angeles, Cal., warns all Spiritualists to avoid a materializing medium by the name of Watson, pretending to have come from Chicago and Detroit. This man Watson claims that we have endorsed him. In that statement he is a base liar; we never saw him, and never heard of him before.

NIGHT STUDY.

I am alone; and yet
In the still solitude there is a rush
Around me, as were met
A crowd of viewless wings; I hear a gush
Of utter'd harmonies—heaven meeting earth,
Making it to rejoice with holy mirth.

Ye winged Mysteries,
Sweeping before my spirit's conscious eye,
Beckoning me to rise,
And go forth from my very self, and fly
With you far in the unknown, unseen immense
Of worlds beyond our sphere—What are ye? Whence?

Ye eloquent voices,
Now soft as breathings of a distant flute,
Now strong as when rejoices,
The trumpet in the victory and pursuit;
Strange are ye, yet familiar, as ye call
My soul to wake from earth's sense and its thrall.

I know you now—I see
With more than natural light—ye are the good,
The wise DEPARTED—ye
Are come from heaven to claim your brotherhood
With mortal brother, struggling in the strife
And chains, which once were yours in this sad life.

Still keep! O, keep me near you,
Compress me round with your immortal wings:
Still let my glad soul hear you
Striking your triumphs from your golden strings,
Until with you I mount, and join the song,
An angel, like you, 'mid the white-robed throng.

Send in your Clubs of Ten on the following terms: Each member of the club, for the small sum of $1.15, will receive The Progressive Thinker one year and that remarkable book, "A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands." The one who gets up the club will receive the paper one year, and his choice of any two of our premium books.

Send in your club of twenty on the following terms: Each member of the club, for $1.15, will receive the paper one year, and also that wonderfully instructive book, "A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands." The one who gets up a club of twenty will receive the paper one year, and any five of the premium books he may select—a valuable library indeed, worth its weight in gold.

Send in your club of twenty-five on the following terms: Each member of the club, for $1.15, will receive the paper one year and "A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands." The one who gets up the club will receive the paper one year, and the eight remarkable premium books. They are a library within themselves of occult and spiritual knowledge. No other eight books in the whole spiritual literature (and you may select the cream of the same,) are any more valuable. They are neatly and substantially bound in cloth; they are finely printed; they contain information invaluable to every student of our philosophy. Each volume should be read yearly by every one. Every inland city and town should get up a club of twenty-five. Organize a circle or a home meeting and get up a club. Call in all the Spiritualists of your place, to YOUR residence, and then get up a club.

Man's Aural Self. = By Charles Dawbarn.

CHAPTER FOURTEEN.

Homo Misrepresents Ego.

Perhaps there is no more favorable case in the history of Modern Spiritualism for our proposed examination and analysis than the assumed return of the well known Kate Field to her dearly loved friend Lilian Whiting. This case having been offered to public criticism by Miss Whiting is no longer sacred to private memory and experience. It is, as it were, dedicated to the public, for "instruction, correction and reproof" by the careful student.

Psychical phenomena seem absent from Miss Field's experience of spirit return to her old friend. It is mutual interchange of thought, by suggestion, which is taking place. Miss Whiting experiences certain sensations, which she interprets. She believes herself in direct conversation with the spirit; almost as much so as when the twain were mortals. Certain of these sensations vibrate into mental vision, so the immortal Kate is at once suggested as present in her old form.

We here stop a moment to note that this is suggestion from the mortal side. Such suggestion could not possibly picture the spirit form as it is now. Memory is evoked, so the form will be visualized as it is remembered, with probably a little of the "weird" infused into the mental picture, as befitting the supposed appearance of spirit. This phase of spirit return would not be possible to a sensitive who had never seen Miss Field, or heard a description of her appearance. Let us keep in mind that the influence suggested to Miss Whiting is from her old friend, but whether the visitor is a few feet away, or at an unknown distance, we have, so far, no means of determining. The suggestion is that she is there, actually present, and in her old form. If the pictured form be sufficiently clear and distinct there will be seen the movement of hands, lips, eyes, etc., customary in social intercourse.

The form having thus become an auto-suggested fact by the mortal, the vibratory thought of her spirit friend takes mental shape. There is an interchange of affectionate greetings, and probably so interpreted by both mortal and spirit. It is when conversation actually commences that we find how impossible it is to determine the part taken by the spirit. Everything that can be echoed by the old memories flows smoothly between Miss Whiting and her visitor. Presently there is the suggested thought of some fact of which Miss Whiting is sure she herself is ignorant.

Here again we pause to recall the fact that Miss Whiting, like every other mortal, has an aura, with a center of consciousness of its own. This aura has its own experience and memories, far wider and deeper than those of the mortal. Although these experiences and memories remain, for the most part, unknown and unrecorded by her mortal mind, they are yet a part of her inner life. The extent of this knowledge we cannot now stop to discuss. For the most part the untrained mortal is ignorant of the existence of his own aura, and is startled when its existence is assumed as, in the jargon of to-day, a perpetually existing state of "subconsciousness." While it may be impossible to determine the outreach of Miss Whiting's inner selfhood, that selfhood involves a fact of tremendous import to be now taken into consideration.

It is certain that Miss Field, having forsaken her mortal form, is now manifesting in what was once her aura—her outer self. We have already seen that the mortal cannot possible determine the shape of aura, so the form of the visitor is, of course, a suggested interpretation of the sensation experienced by the mortal. But from whom does this sensation come?

Miss Field, now living in aural form, is easily in direct association with the existing aural form of her mortal friend. Their aural forms were in the close touch of devoted friendship in earth life. Death cannot touch the aural form, or even limit its memories or experiences. So the friends are in as direct aural sisterhood as when both were in earth life. Miss Field and Miss Whiting have experienced no aural bereavement. They can mingle in sweet gossip as in days of yore. But the Miss Whiting of to-day is a very limited partner in the blended life, catching only occasional whispers from her own inner self, much less that of her old friend. Thus the talented writer catches her friend's appearance by suggestion, and her thoughts must be received in the same way.

But Kate Field has not returned to mortal life. Why should she? She is in as deep sisterhood with her old friend as ever, and the aura knows it. But the mortal only senses it. It flashed its way from the mortal's own aural center of intelligence out into her mortal brain, there to be interpreted into the language, the experience, the limitations of her earth life.

We now see that when facts are given to Miss Whiting, as from her spirit visitor, and received as wondrous tests because unknown to the mortal, they may be perfectly familiar to her aural consciousness, as well as to that of her friend. In fact in such intimacy it is not likely that one has a secret from the other. But when the mortal would claim the old love, measured by its old limitations in earth life, it is not there, and never will be again. That love has become, once for all, as unlimited as aura. But all the same the mortal struggles to rebind it to herself.

Miss Whiting is a sensitive, with the privileges of clairvoyance and clairaudience. That is to say, when she senses thought vibrations struggling earthward she interprets them in terms of her own daily experience—and a nice little mess she makes of it.

The spirit walks in a garden to refresh herself—as Miss Whiting would do. She declares herself fatigued by the effort of an hour's conversation with her old friend. She describes her daily life, its pleasures and duties, in the terms of earth experience. They must be so translated by the mortal. She has just been attending a morning concert in a world that has always been suggested as without morning and evening. And the chief singer at that concert is not some angel with a million years of practice and an evoluted larynx, but one who recently crossed the Styx, and whose name is perfectly familiar to the two friends.

The spirit goes to the concert—whether to a reserved seat is not stated. Bellamy in Looking Backward pictures the coming mortal as enjoying concert or lecture in his own arm chair, by his own fireside, through his own phonograph. Shall spirits be less privileged? In the spirit's description of her home life, passed with her beloved parents, are suggestions of domestic happiness and luxury such as would naturally picture themselves to the mortal mind of Miss Whiting.

The writer contends that the talented but mortal Miss Whiting has never heard or seen Miss Field; that her intercourse with her old friend has consisted of thought flashes, vibrated into her mortal brain from her own aural center; and that her interpretation of those vibrations was, necessarily, in terms of mortal experience. And yet further, there is not one spark of evidence that any single fact of Miss Field's life and experience finds its way into earth life, through the organism of Miss Whiting. The attempt at such expression and description by the spirit, at the request of the mortal, proves the impossibility by the resulting absurdities. We see that even under the most favorable conditions of which we can conceive, no such vibrations could be interpreted by the mortal, save in terms of her own experience.

With such an object lesson the student will realize the absurdity of the constant attempts by inspired writers and orators to picture scenes in spirit life for the benefit of mortals. We need not examine this particular case of "spirit return" any more closely. It has told its tale of impossible or imperfect assumptions by a mortal sensitive, founded on total ignorance of the existence of aural selfhood, with all that it implies.

Such mental phenomena are but one phase of the "spirit return" which has been claimed as the modern improvement upon ancient experience. We need not linger to specially examine the clairvoyant vision which has told us of the "something" issuing from the head of the dying man, and assuming more or less of the old and well known mortal form. We have seen that such an interpretation of the sensations experienced by the sensitive mortal could not be otherwise. We do not for a moment dispute that the departing "something" has been sensed under very exceptional conditions, but let us remember that in such a case the sensation is all from the mortal's own aura, since the escaping intelligence is in no condition to be seeking contact with mortal life. It is the Ego of the mortal expressing what he sees to mortal brain, and, as usual, necessarily interpreted in terms of the mortal's own limited experience. When Ego and Homo have been trained into closer association in earth life there will be less difficulty in mutual interpretation of each other's thoughts.

We now pass to what is called "physical phenomena," which, for the public at large, seems to offer the only real proof that the dead live, and walk the earth as in days of yore. Here we find the assumption that the spirit comes to earth wielding not only his old power over matter but often exhibiting greater energy than was possible to mortal limitation. Universal history tells the tale of ghostly power for weal or woe over poor mortals. When the experienced scientist perceives a movement of some material object, or hears a material sound under conditions where its mortal production was impossible, he faces the one truth of the highest import to himself and all humanity. Such experiences are to-day on record—experiences freed from the emotional influences that usually accompany asserted evidence of spirit return. As they can be repeated at any time by similar patient and prolonged investigation, we need not stop to quote any particular instance. The man who could follow the scientific experiments of the renowned Englishman Sir William Crookes, or the American Professor Hare, and remain unconvinced of their verity is simply not amenable to evidence. But the acceptance of such successful experiments and learning their lessons are very different processes in mortal mind.

There is a fact connected with all such physical phenomena that cannot be too strongly emphasized. Any effect produced upon our planetary matter by a returning spirit would demonstrate the existence of energy in whatever may be the form of that spirit. It would further demonstrate that such energy is precisely of the same nature as that of mortal man, as otherwise it would not produce a similar effect upon mundane matter. It follows that the existing aural energies belonging at the present time to the outer life of every mortal must be capable of exhibiting similar manifestations. We have here a case of an existing force, unknown and therefore unused by the mortal of to-day. We say unused, but the mortal may sometimes ignorantly compel it to his service, and thus produce ghostly effects of whose source he is unaware. When we would analyze physical phenomena we must keep these truths carefully in mind. We will thus realize that such phenomena may be strictly veridical, and yet not necessarily be the product of powers impossible to mortal man.

The rap is, perhaps, the very simplest form of the physical phenomena we are investigating, as it is supposed to offer satisfactory proof that the dead live, and can talk back into mortal ears. But as far as mere sound is taken into consideration there is nothing to indicate the source. Even if every supposed case has been investigated without results there still remains the assumption that the external energy of mortal man may be producing either the tiny rap or the shock that can sometimes upset furniture, and even shake the building.

But we face a different problem when the rap becomes the messenger for human intelligence, spelling out messages that seem to need no interpretation. As such raps were the first chapter in the history of Modern Spiritualism we must analyze them with some care. We have first the sound, which is the result of energy, acting upon matter, and of course associated with intelligence. Mortals are experiencing vibratory effects from Cosmos at every moment which they cannot interpret. Their intelligence is evidently not for the mortal, but it is there all the same. The only difference in the case of the rap, as of so many mysterious noises that "affright the dark," is that the mortal ear catches this vibration and records it as sound, albeit it may be a sound the mortal cannot interpret. The earthquake shock that rends and tears the planet is a Cosmic rap. Homo is trying his best to interpret it, and discover its meaning. But our little raps every now and then proclaim themselves as if they were prisoners in one cell conversing by raps with prisoners in the cell adjoining. They cannot see or feel one another, but intelligence, embodied in sound, breaks through the barrier. At this point, if wise, we trouble ourselves no more about unknown causes for such raps. The intelligence manifested is evidently human, and therefore the effect of a human cause.

In our last a very important point was settled, but it was only the first letter of the alphabet. It does not follow that anything else is to be accepted as settled. We must go slowly. There is no intelligence for us in a rap we cannot interpret. If the message slowly spelled is French, and we do not understand French, we could not interpret the thought. But if we can recognize it as French we have an assured fact, which is that the intelligence whose energy is compelling the rap, is trying to express his thought in French. That would be another advance, for such a rap cannot be evolved by chance. It has become merely a question of interpretation. But the Rochester intelligences rapped in no unknown tongue. Their tale was in plain English. It was intelligence addressing itself to intelligence in a language mutually understood. But here we meet a serious obstacle. Intelligence comprehends intelligence just so far as mutual education and experience will permit, and no further. If the rapping intelligence be really a returning mortal, as he claims, his communication must be limited to terms of mutual experience, or it cannot be interpreted. Everything he has learned or experienced in his new life may be rapped till the very planet is shaken, but it cannot be interpeted by the mortal.

Suppose he converses "over there" in a language unknown to earth, and of structure unknown to philology, he must not use a word of it when he raps to mortals. Yet it may well be that he now thinks as well as talks only in that language. He may have almost forgotten the tongue of his native village, and thus be himself dependent on an interpreter, nearer to earth life. That is to say, one who has not fogotten quite so much.

So much is recognized by every student. But its lesson is that the returning spirit it limited by our ignorance; and that all he would teach must be expressed in the terms of our ignorance or the mortal cannot interpret it. Every fact that we can attest we receive, and forthwith proclaim the glory of spirit return. Perhaps it comes to us rapped out letter by letter. The assumption has always been that the sensitive can have no influence on such a message. But whether that be so or not we see that the message must be absolutely limited by our powers of interpretation. It is profitless to discuss the method by which the unseen intelligence can produce a physical rap. We do not know how our own intelligence and energy can wield a pen or move a tongue; and quite likely the spirit visitor knows no more about it than we do. But it is of immense importance to know that the spirit can bring us no knowledge we cannot interpret into the terms of our present limited consciousness.

There seems to be reasonable proof, plenty of it, that spirit can produce sounds imbued with intelligence; can recall events of his mortal life; and can look abroad on earth and form opinions as to what he sees. Such a spirit may be wise or foolish, virtuous or degraded, weak or strong. He might even have acquired vast spirit knowledge, but we can have none of it for lack of experiences by which alone it can be interpreted.

If this be the case with communications by rap, where we seem reasonably safe from mortal interference, we shall find our mortal limitation still more marked as we now proceed to examine other phases of phenomena associated with spirit return.

DEAFNESS CURED

By No Means Until "ACTINA" Was Discovered.

Ninety-five percent of all cases of deafness brought to our attention is the result of chronic catarrh of the throat and middle ear. The air passages become clogged by catarrhal deposits, stopping the action of the vibratory bones. Until these deposits are removed a cure is impossible. The inner ear cannot be reached by probing or spraying, hence the inability of aurists or physicians to cure. Ear drums are worse than useless. That there is a scientific cure for deafness and catarrh is demonstrated every day by the use of Actina. The vapor current generated in the Actina passes through the Eustachian tubes into the middle ear, removing the catarrhal obstructions as it passes through the tubes, and loosens up the bones (hammer, anvil and stirrup) in the inner ear, making them respond to the slightest vibration of sound. Actina has never failed to cure ringing noises in the head. We have known people troubled with this distressing symptom for years to be completely cured in only three weeks' use of Actina. Actina also cures asthma, bronchitis, sore throat, weak lungs, colds and headache; all of which are directly or indirectly due to catarrh. Actina is sent on trial postpaid. Write us about your case. We give advise free, and positive proof of cures. A valuable book—Professor Wilson's 100 page Dictionary of Disease, Free. Address New York & London Electric Association, Dep. LISBETH.

An Interesting Story of Two Worlds.

Elevating, Fascinating, Instructive Throughout.

This work by Carrie E. S. Twing is exceptionally interesting. She well says: "These characters which have brought out the highest and lowest in different religious beliefs, have moved me, not I them." The whole book is interesting, fascinating, and instructive. Price $1.00.

WISDOM OF THE AGES.

Revelations from Zertoulem, the Prophet of Tlaskanata.

A Mine of Valuable Reflections and Suggestions.

This work was automatically transcribed by George A. Fuller, M. D., a gentleman who stands high as a lecturer and medium. It is a mine of valuable reflections and suggestions. The paragraphs are short, suggestive and inspiring. Every one of them leads to something higher, grander, nobler. Price $1.00.

THE MIND IN NATURE

To the Editor:—In your issue of Nov. 30, appeared an article by Mr. Channing Severance in criticism of the position taken by Texas Spiritualists concerning an "Infinite Intelligence." The general tone of his critique shows that he falls in line with Theists in assuming that if such intelligence exists it must necessarily be of a high order—possess the various attributes of omnipotence, omniscience, wisdom, benevolence, in fact every quality that may exalt it (or him) in the estimation of man. It is through this unwarranted exaltation of the mind in Nature that many of the world's greatest thinkers and scientists have rejected the hypothesis of such intelligence in toto, not considering that in the acceptance of an extremely inferior mind-principle which is as subject to development or progression as are its associate physical attributes the solution of the world-riddle will in all probability be found. Future generations will not be confronted with the question, Is there a God? but with, What is the degree or nature of the Infinite Intelligence? And it will not be regarded as one mind, but rather as an infinite number of atomic mind-units co-operating to produce (not with a clearly defined purpose and pre-determination such as the human intellect exercises), the multifarious organic and inorganic bodies of the universe. Arguing from these premises it follows that since the Infinite Intelligence has its basis in the atomic constituents of matter it must necessarily be of the very lowest order.

Assuming that there are evidences of design and purpose in (especially) morphological structure which the various mindless factors of evolution are unable to explain, we must judge the mind thus manifesting itself in precisely the same way as we judge that of man and the beings below him in the scale of life, i. e., by their actions and accomplishments.

Mr. Severance says: "In expressing a belief in Infinite Intelligence the Texas Spiritualists omit a very essential thing, they do not attempt to explain what they mean by the term, and I doubt if they could, should they try."

Mr. S. need not wait for those who believe in an Infinite Intelligence to define the meaning of these terms; all he has to do is to look up the definitions of "infinite" and "intelligence" in a ten-cent pocket dictionary, join the two definitions together, and he has a full explanation of the degree and the qualities of the infinite mind, though he did not express himself to that effect. He rejects it in toto because he sees no evidence of such a mind as the Theist pictures to himself. Mr. Severance concludes that there is either such a God, or none at all, and that settles the matter. By pointing out everything in Nature which appears to disprove an all-powerful and an all-wise Creator, he forthwith jumps to the conclusion that there can be no Infinite Intelligence of any kind in existence.

Thus, while his article is replete with, in fact, entirely composed of instances which seem to indicate the non-existence of such a being, he deliberately shuts his eyes to the palpable evidences of purpose and design which appeal to our senses on every side. He even goes so far as to say that, "Reason has thus far sought in vain to discover the least sign of any plan or purpose in all the countless phenomena that greets the human vision." So far from his failing to perceive a plan or purpose in the countless phenomena constantly clashing upon our senses I call upon him to point out a solitary single fact or phenomenon in which design and purpose is not manifested. Of course he cannot do it. We can even perceive it in "the endless mutations Nature is forever engaged in...in life and death forever alternating...in big fish eating little fish...and in this carnage going on forever."

A great God that, I hear him say, that permits all this. He may well say, great God in a sneering, contemptuous sort of way, for I do not believe myself that there is anything "great" about the Infinite Intelligence, except its extent. Outside of that I hold it to be of the very lowest, most insignificant order, totally devoid of sentimetality such as mercy, justice or benevolence. These exist only in man as the result of education. But we have evidence that it possesses the qualities we call love and hate, these manifesting themselves in attraction and repulsion. But since love and hate assert themselves only after the exercise of judgment, the latter is proved by the existence of the former. Thus there can be no love or hate without judgment, and no judgment dissociated from love and hate. These three psychic properties constitute the true trinity of Nature, inseparably connected as they are, and though they are primarily only of the very lowest order, they are all-sufficient in themselves to account for every psychic phenomenon, and for all which indicates purpose and design in the building of the organic and inorganic worlds.

Now, if Mr. S. should be unable to point out a single instance, especially in the organic world, wherein purpose and design is not clearly manifested, then the question concerning an infinite intelligence resolves itself merely into one of degree or calibre. The instances he cites of the struggles of life of "the brute creation, and of the fiendish acts going on between man and man that make the soul sick with horror," etc., simply prove that said intelligence is devoid of the qualities called mercy, benevolence and justice. But now he will ask: Where, then, is the purpose manifested "in the endless mutations that Nature is forever engaged in...and no sooner than maturity has been reached by anything, than decay and death are sure to follow?...Why this building up and tearing to pieces; why this eternal feeding of one form of life upon another with such cruelty and heartlessness that every sensitive human being is shocked?"

I would say in reply that our mind is but the result of education; that we view these things from our own arbitrarily established standards; we have been taught to believe that they are wrong, hence consider them so. But must the Infinite Intelligence not possess an entirely different mind than ours? let its caliber now be what it may. What kind of a universe would we live in if life and death did not follow each other in endless succession; if worlds were created destined to exist forever? If devolution were not followed by evolution, would infinite space not eventually become congested with constantly evolved suns and planets; nay, would such congestion not have ensued an eternity ago, precluding all further evolution or creation?

This contention is based upon the nebular hypothesis, now proved by the Lick Observatory photographs, showing worlds in every stage of development from a nebulous mist to planets in their life-evolving prime. Also by the discoveries recently made by Prof. Ritchie of the Yerkes Observatory. Viewed from these standpoints is devolution, retrogression and final dissolution of worlds into their primal attenuated state not an absolute necessity?

And lies in the term "mutation" not the principle for every enjoyment conceivable by man? Mr. S. can see no purpose in these ceaseless mutations. Let him but describe a single one and he will see the purpose himself; that is, provided he will not shut his eyes to it. Let us take, for instance, the worst ones known to man: floods, hurricanes, earthquakes and other catastrophes. They are great evils, every one will admit, but their purpose lies in the fact that death is essential to the generation of new life, of new beings. Moreover, could there be any enjoyment of the good this life affords, if we had no conception of the evil? There would be no good, in fact, because this is but a relative term, and realizable only by intuitive comparison with its opposite—thus what we call evil. The keener, then, our perception of evil, the more intense our appreciation of its absence.

Mr. Severance stigmatizes the third declaration quoted by him, to-wit: "We affirm that a correct understanding of such expression (of the Infinite Intelligence) and living in accordance therewith constitutes the true religion," as "twaddle, for it means nothing." I interpret this declaration as the others, i. e., that all evil, mutations or other phenomena of Nature are absolute necessities in the evolvement of worlds, unless Mr. S. holds that this world was created for his special benefit alone, and future generations have no business in it whatsoever. In that case the Infinite Intelligence certainly made a great mistake in introducing mutations into the world, and in not running the universe in accordance with the views held by Mr. S.

"A correct understanding of such expression" would simply lead the mind to the contemplation and realization of all the (comparative) good there is in the world, and to stimulate us to enhance it as far as lies in our power, thus affording us not only healthful exercise of all our faculties, but also leading us to higher planes of life, to vanquish the evil, if possible; endeavors "which constitute the true religion." If we cannot always live in accordance with the Infinite Intelligence as expressed in the phenomenon of life, we can at least try to do so, and in these very attempts we will find our reward.

To Mr. S. it is shocking to contemplate that: "All through the works of Nature death and disease lurk in the footsteps of man." Well, if he can conceive of a better plan in which new worlds and new beings can be called into existence, I would like to have him point it out. He may give the Infinite Intelligence a pointer or two, perhaps.

He asks: "Is a wrong act not committed when Mr. Worm is not expelled" (from a man's stomach? Now let him be ever so "divinely appointed," the infinite mind has provided us with intelligence for that very purpose, so Mr. Worm must go.

This applies to all other evils, so that in the exercise of our intelligence to combat evil in all its forms we find our greatest sources of enjoyment. If there were no evil in the world we would simply be debarred of all intellectual pleasure. It is that what develops brain; just that what has afforded Mr. Severance the keen pleasure in formulating his ideas and presenting them to his numerous readers. Would his life not be shorn of half its pleasure if he found no evil to combat?

In his concluding remark he "wonders where Infinite love,' of which we hear so much, has any connection," with the trials and tribulations mentioned by him. Love, I reply, is of as many degrees and intensities as its opposite—hate, and that of the Infinite Intelligence is necessarily of the lowest order because it has its seat in the constituents of matter, and must, therefore, be commensurate in degree with its associate physical or dynamic properties. Both psychic and physical properties develop through aggregation and especially through organization as seen in the marvelous co-adaptations of organic structure. Can Mr. S. see no intelligence and design in the construction of an eye, a brain, a heart, lung, liver or other intricate parts of an organism, which jointly and separately have certain functions to perform? Does he attribute their development entirely to the non-entities called "factors of evolution?" If so, he takes a position different from that of Darwin himself, who admitted that the theory which bears his name is totally inadequate to account for the intelligence and purpose manifested in organic life.

Now this objection will present itself to the reader: If intelligence and purpose of a high order are indicated in the construction of a complex organism, how, then, can this contention be reconciled with your former assertion that the Infinite Intelligence you accept is of the very lowest order? I answer that the intelligence in Nature (as a whole) has nothing whatever to do with the building up of an organism, but that this is accomplished by the biological or protoplasmic mind, a mentality diffused throughout the entire organism, animal and vegetal, and known to psychologists as the subconscious, subjective, secondary and subliminal mind, though of its source, genesis and real functions they appear to be totally in the dark. These constructive minds, or active factors in the upbuilding of each individual organism, have their source in, or are derived from, the atomic minds, these latter possessing no further capacity than to assemble the essential elements into protoplasm when terrestrial conditions are favorable, and there its functions cease. The mind diffused through each protoplasmic cell is now thrown upon its own individual resources which are of a self-developing nature because the judgment existing concomitantly with love and hate inevitably exerts itself in that direction. It adapts the cell or combination of cells to its environments; it gathers experiences of various kinds; these suggest modifications of structure, the entire fund of which (experiences) determine the processes of cell-formation and are perpetuated through the function of cell-reproduction after the organism is evolved for that purpose. (What I have here stated in one sentence probably covers a period of millions of years and countless generations of the lower orders of life.)

Thus in man we see the entire ancestral fund of experiences of the protoplasmic mind asserting itself, these being preserved through the memory which constitutes the most essential element of mind in all its various phases and degrees, from the lowest to the highest. The law of heredity—that great unsolved problem of science—has its fundamental principle in the memory of the protoplasmic mind, the mnemonical impressions communicated by the parental mind to that of its generative germs determining the resultant processes of cell-formation. The biological minds of these germs or seeds not being cognizant of any other conditions than those transmitted to it, can, of course, build up no different organism. It knows just that and nothing else.

Thus all mind in Nature is simply determined by the degree of development it has attained as manifested in the graduated scale of organic life.

THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE.

A VERY IMPORTANT WORK.

The Spiritual Significance is by Lilian Whiting, author of "The World Beautiful," "After Her Death," "Kate Field, A Record," "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning." Cloth, $1.00.

Miss Whiting finds the title of her new book in these lines from "Aurora Leigh:"

"If a man could feel
Not one, but every day, feast, fast, and working-day,
The spiritual significance burn through
The hieroglyphic of material shows,
Henceforward he would paint the globe with wings."

The aim of this book is to reveal the curiously close correspondence between the developments of modern science and spiritual laws; to note that new forces, as discovered and applied in wireless telegraphy, are simply laws of an unseen realm into which humanity is rapidly advancing and thus gaining a new environment. From this evolutionary progress, as illustrated by physical science the author of "The World Beautiful" continues the same argument presented in those volumes in a plea that the future life is the continuation and development of our present life in all its faculties and powers, and that the present may be ennobled by the constant sense of the Divine Presence, and a truer knowledge of the nature of man and his relations to God tend to a higher morality and increasing happiness. The book is characterized by the same essential style and qualities that have insured for "The World Beautiful" volumes an almost world-wide popularity.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

Bear in mind that all notices for this page are cut down to suit the space we have to occupy when received.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Mark Jones writes from Worcester, Mass., that Mrs. Mina Seymour, of Lily Dale, N. Y., had delivered a lecture there, which was well received.

Dr. T. A. Bland writes: "I desire to express my sincere approval of the action of the Bangs sisters in declining to accept the challenge of Mr. Mangasarian, accompanied as it was by an offer to test that they could not get writing from spirits under his prescribed conditions. Their declination is not only in accord with the principles of moral ethics, but it is dignified and will tend to raise them in the estimation of the better class of people."

The Chicago Record-Herald says: "Hypnotism is the latest innovation among the students of the University of Chicago. Julian H. Brode, a freshman, demonstrated to a group of companions in one of the student society club rooms, Thursday evening, that he was acquainted with all the secrets by putting a number of them to sleep and then making them amuse the others with absurd antics. Among his feats was the 'Trilby' trick, in which, like Svengali, he succeeded in making one of the students, who has a reputation as an iron-throated 'rooter,' sing like an operatic star. Another one of his tricks was to make a subject repeat long sections of the lectures which he had attended during the day. Some of his friends claim that he is able to help a man through examinations by the force of hypnotic suggestion. Brode is a Southerner, coming from Memphis, Tenn. He spent a year at Harvard before coming to the University and is said to have acquired the art of hypnotism there. Although this is the first time a student has shown hypnotic powers, some of the professors are known to be adepts in it. Professor H. H. Donaldson, the head of the department of psychology, has often demonstrated his powers at little faculty parties. It is said that he has sent ladies of the faculty down into the laundry to iron clothes while in the hypnotic trance. Professor Starr is also an experimenter in this line of work."

Scribe writes: "G. W. Kates and wife had wonderfully interesting and successful meetings in Wheeling, W. Va., January 5 to 15. By request, they remained for two additional meetings. The lectures and messages attracted very large audiences and received much favorable notice by both the press and public. It is the general verdict that better lectures upon Spiritualism were never given in our city than by Mr. and Mrs. Kates. We added several new members to our society; and with new zeal and hope we are working for a co-operative effort that promises great good for our cause. We think our people everywhere only need enthusiasm in order to succeed in an organization."

The Register, of Wheeling, W. Va., says: "Dr. Quackenbos, of Columbia University, holds that hypnotism is quite as wonderful as the most imaginative writers have ever represented it to be. Du Maurier's idea of the hypnotic inspiration of Trilby to the point of singing in harmony with the musical power of her master is entirely reasonable under the theory and according to the experience of Dr. Quackenbos. He finds that it will not only cure all human ills, but effect a change in the very nature of a person. Space is no obstacle to the exercise of the hypnotic influence. 'Minds can be brought into telegraphic communication, though miles apart,' he says. Dr. Quackenbos tells of his preparation of a young woman for a successful stage career, and of students for examination through hypnotic influence. In short, nothing in the claims of any school of mental therapeutics is too extravagant to be sustained by this venerable professor. Telepathy with him is a matter of course. Dr. Quackenbos in his enthusiasm may be a trifle credulous, but there is nothing impossible in his report. Of hypnotic suggestion as a means of treating disease, Dr. Quackenbos says much that is both remarkable and credible, and there is no doubt that it is well worth the serious study of scientists. Of the multiple personality of a single person, ample evidence has been afforded in the examination of insane persons and of persons who have suffered from injury to the brain. Hypnotism is now used in many hospitals in place of anesthetics, and there is certainly a wide field and one that is practically unexplored for scientific research presented in the development of this mysterious science now in its infancy. Most people are skeptical on this subject since the general public's idea of hypnotism is gained chiefly from the operations of men who are obviously charlatans. It doesn't do, however, to jump at conclusions."

Charles A. Kiehl writes from Williamsport, Pa.: "The reorganization of the First Church of Spiritualists began Sunday, January 11, with the election of new officers, and a readjustment of by-laws governing this society. This change, introduced new life and energy and a greater interest is being manifested in the welfare of this society. The newly elected officers are: President, Chas. A. Kiehl; vice-president, David Hess; secretary, Mrs. Eugene Kieffer; treasurer, Mrs. L. Dimmock; trustees, H. Bates and Eugene Kieffer."

The Mattoon (Ill.) Journal says: "Mr. and Mrs. Rufus Towpley, a newly married couple of Coles Station, say they have reason to thank a fortune teller for the recovery of a quantity of jewelry which they lost two days after their wedding. Our readers will remember the romantic wedding of Mr. Rufus Townley and Miss Lenore Chisenhall at Sullivan a couple of weeks ago. Both belong to prominent families of the neighborhood of Allenville and Coles. Although there was no objection on the part of the parents, the young people concluded to elope and get married, going to Sullivan, where the ceremony was performed. Their parents knew nothing of the marriage until after it occurred. A few days after, while on their way to the bride's home she lost her watch and four valuable rings. As soon as they missed the valuables they retraced their steps, but could not find the jewelry. Several days were spent hunting for the missing articles, but the search was in vain. Then someone suggested that they go to Mrs. Warren, of Charleston, to see if she could tell them anything of the lost property. At last Mr. and Mrs. Townley visited Mrs. Warren and she told them that a certain man in the neighborhood had found the jewelry and was keeping it. She described the man so thoroughly that they started to confront the man with the knowledge they had obtained. But he had learned where they had been and before they could accost him he turned over the missing property, saying as he did so that he knew they had found him out. He said he was not trying to keep the jewelry, but that he did not at first know who it belonged to. Mr. and Mrs. Townley say Mr. Townley's picture was in the watch, and he and the man were well acquainted. The Townleys say they owe the recovery of their valuables to Mrs. Warren."

The Boston Traveler says: "The brilliant French Sardou, author of Sarah Bernhardt's plays, says over his own signature in a New York Sunday paper that he has had spirits materialize roses (white ones) in his own private study, drop them on his desk, with a tag attached, having the name of a dead young lady he knew years before. He also says that spirits make him write, draw and even engrave on copper in the dark, etc. In Boston we can beat Sardou's case all to pieces, as we have here mediums whose record-breaking work is the amazement of the civilized world to-day, yet, strange to say, the press, with few exceptions, the clergy, the scientists, and the politicians fail to recognize this grand work as they should. At one medium's seances the spirits of the so-called dead actually materialize, life-size, as they were before their death, and have been seen, felt, weighed, examined, talked to, embraced, kissed, etc., as when alive on earth. One man visited a strange medium's seances in Florida and the same spirits came to him from the cabinet as do from a Boston medium, showing that the spirits are genuine. Two other ladies came to a seance at Mrs. C——'s and to their amazement the three spirits of Lucille and Helen Weston and her daughter (singers) materialized before them. The two first named spirits sang together in front of the cabinet. So overpowered with emotion were the two ladies that both of them wept tears of joy; they knelt down before the spirits, and on their knees prayed and rejoiced that their three dead friends were alive in the spirit land and could come to them again."

The Syracuse (N. Y.) Standard has the following from Gouverneur: "Ghosts are said to be stalking about this town during the midnight hours. Until within a week or so the family of Charles Papinaw has lived a quiet life and why he should now be singled out for the nocturnal visits of spooks is more than Mr. Papinaw can understand, but such, however, he believes to be the case. A few nights before Christmas he was awakened at about 1 o'clock in the morning from a sound doze by an unearthly noise which seemed to come from the stairway. Believing that burglars had effected an entrance he leaped from his bed with the intention of foiling them at their game. Upon reaching the stairway no noise could be heard nor could anything be seen. A few moments after he had investigated the stairway uncanny noises were heard coming from the parlor, but upon searching that room nothing there could be discovered. While Mr. Papinaw was trying to fathom the mystery he was suddenly aroused to a sense of fear by what seemed to be some heavy substance falling upon the stairway. He thereupon hastened from his house and aroused his neighbors, who went to his assistance with muskets and axes. Searched Mr. Papinaw's house from top to bottom, but nothing was found to indicate that ghosts had taken up their abode with him. Since that night Mr. Papinaw's life has been made miserable. Should he fall asleep during his midnight watch his dreams are of spooks and imps. Within the past two days the family allege that they have seen a hand and arm waving to and fro from between the curtains that cover the door between the parlor and sitting-room. Terror reigns supreme and unless something happens soon to clear up the mystery, the house will be without an occupant."

G. W. Kates and wife, the N. S. A. missionaries, desire calls in Missouri for the month of April. They have open time also in May, June and July for the Middle-West. Address them 600 Pennsylvania avenue S. E., Washington, D. C.

The Chicago American has the following from Paris, France: "Mme. Valasquez de Morales, formerly Mrs. Gilerman, of Minneapolis, claims that the ghosts of the late Senator Cushman K. Davis and other deceased members of the Peace Commission disturb her house and keep her awake. Davis was her cousin, and she frequently entertained him and other members of the commission, who incidentally had much to say about the articles of the treaty. Mme. de Maroles asserts that a ghostly dance occurs nightly and that frequently she finds the cups arrayed on the floor in the morning. She also finds plates and glasses broken, as if the result of nocturnal spookish revelry.

When writing for this paper use a pen or typewriter.

She has called in a noted scientist to study the phenomenon."

The New York Herald has the following from Paris, France: "Madame V. recently lost her husband. On his deathbed he said his spirit would return. The other night she went down to her cellar to get wine. Suddenly a sepulchral voice from an empty cask said: 'I am Auguste, your deceased husband. I finished my period in purgatory to-day. You see, my first thought is for you.' The widow shrieked and fell senseless. She is now in bed and swears she spoke to her husband's ghost. Her neighbors say they have missed bottles of wine from their cellars recently."

The St. Louis Star-Sayings has the following from La Porte, Ind.: "A series of remarkable tests will be made this coming week in the Indiana State Home for the Friendless, located in Vigo county. Prof. Henry, of Chicago, who possesses marvelous powers as a hypnotist, believes that while the children are in a hypnotic state, he can work upon their minds so that their thoughts will be turned toward better things. He will take the children of depraved parents, whose associations have been vicious, as his subjects, and he will make repeated tests. Prof. Henry believes hypnotism is destined to become a factor in reform work in public institutions."

Geo. P. Colby is now doing efficient work in Nanaimo, B. C., where he can be addressed for engagements.

The Inter Ocean has the following special dispatch from Detroit, Mich.: "Prof. Lombard, of Ann Arbor, instructor of physiology in the University of Michigan, believes that he has located the dwelling place of the soul in the spinal column. He has arrived at this conclusion after many months of experiments with frogs. Results of the last two days' experiments seem to demonstrate that death through the medium of the brain does not terminate the control of the muscles. Thursday the professor produced before his class a live frog, from which he removed the brain. It was then suspended by its under jaw. An hour later a drop of acetic acid was touched to its foot. Instantly the frog began to jerk and twitch to get away from the stings of the acid. To-day, twenty-four hours later, a tiny bit of filter paper saturated with the acid was placed against the body. The frog kicked with both legs and dislodged the paper. Placed upon its back, the paper was shaken off. Every time it was placed on any part of the body the legs sent it flying. Professor Lombard calls this activity 'reason movements,' and will continue the experiments for the purpose of ascertaining how far the reasoning instincts may go."

Geo. W. Peak writes: "I received the four premium books I ordered, also The Progressive Thinker. I have nearly finished reading the books and find them very interesting and instructive. I now have all the eight Divine Plan books advertised in The Progressive Thinker."

The friends of Prof. J. Jay Watson, the well known musician, and a pupil of the world-renowned artists, Ole Bull and Franz Liszt, is to be tendered a testimonial entertainment at Steinert Hall, 163 Boylston street, Boston, Mass., on Thursday evening, January 23, 1902. Prof. Watson and his accomplished daughter, Miss Annie A. Watson, have frequently and gratuitously given their musical talents to various benevolent and charitable objects, and it is hoped that a generous response will be forthcoming.

The American Medical Union held its third annual meeting in Chicago, on the 14th inst. The secretary, Dr. T. A. Bland, reported quite a large increase in membership, and the general feeling of the members was one of hopefulness that this organization is to ultimately overthrow the medical monopoly trust, and secure the repeal of all oppressive medical laws. Dr. Bland was again chosen as secretary by a unanimous vote.

The St. Paul Globe has the following from Clinton, Iowa, illustrating the power of hypnotism: "F. L. White, a St. Louis traveling man, while seated at a hotel in this city, saw his wife seated at the dining-room table with J. L. Jordan, a Chicago drummer. Going to the hotel register he saw written there the name of J. L. Jordan and wife. White was so enraged that he told the landlord to call for the police, otherwise he would kill Jordan in his rage. The chief of police was summoned, but refused to arrest Jordan unless he also had a warrant for the woman's arrest. White objected to this and said he would settle with Jordan. He found the two in the parlor and administered such a beating to Jordan that it was necessary for a physician to work for an hour over the injured man. Soon after the encounter White and his wife left the city, and Jordan departed in the afternoon. White said he did not blame his wife for her actions, as Jordan was a hypnotist, and had her under his evil influence."

Thos A. Barker writes from Cleveland, Ohio: "If the Spiritualists would devote one-tenth of the money they fool away in chasing after phenomena, we would be able to present the philosophy of Spiritualism in a proper manner and in our own meeting-places, and then we would command the respect of the thinking minds of the country. I hope that I may live long enough to see the change, and The Progressive Thinker have a hundred thousand subscribers."

The Chicago Inter Ocean has the following from St. Louis, Mo.: "That the dead can come back to warn the living is believed by the children of Mrs. Christina Binninger. Hilda Binninger, 16 years old, says she was awakened by her father's voice early this morning and warned to look after her mother. Only for this warning the woman would have died from morphine and chloroform which she had taken with suicidal intent, in order, she says, to join her husband, who was killed several months ago. According to Hilda she was awakened by a voice which seemed to call her from a distance. It sounded like that of her father. She struggled against paying attention to it and tried to go to sleep, but the call seemed imperative and she finally sat up wide awake in response to a more determined call than any. The voice warned her to look out for her mother and reaching for her caught her hand which was cold and clammy. The young girl ran from the house to the home of a neighbor, who summoned a doctor."

The Wheeling (W. Va.) Register says: "The lecture of the evening was delivered by Mrs. Kates, and an able and eloquent address it was. She is a fluent and pleasing speaker and held the close attention of her large audience to the close of her address. Herself, the picture of health, and the embodiment of good nature, Mrs. Kates is an earnest advocate of looking at the bright side of life. 'If you cannot smile go and stand before your mirror and practice until you learn how. Health is just as catching in the life as is disease. When a man gets dyspepsia in his stomach he is bad enough, but when he gets it on his brain, then look out. All things that are, are best. Woman has never yet been able to say she was free. If a woman falls when trampled by the man the world says it's all right—for the man, but damns the woman forever. If the woman is stoned, let the man be stoned as well.' The foregoing are characteristic sentences from her lecture."

Mrs. Amanda L. Coffman, of Grand Rapids, Mich., writes: "My engagements are as follows: Indianapolis, Ind., the rest of January; February at Alliance, Ohio; March, Jackson, Mich. I would like engagements in New York for April and May. I also have open dates for camp-meetings of 1902. Permanent address, 419 Crescent avenue, Grand Rapids, Mich."

S. A. Keys writes from Worcester, Mass.: "The People's Spiritualist Society held its usual Sunday meeting, and Madame Bruce had a large house. There was special singing in the evening. The Monday evening circles are very largely attended, there seldom being less than 150 persons present. Madame Bruce is a great worker."

G. W. Kates and wife will hold meetings in Cincinnati, Ohio, Sunday afternoon and evening, Feb. 2, 1902, under auspices of the National Spiritualists' Association of the United States and Canada. They will each evening lecture and give spirit messages. A liberal contribution to aid the National Association will be asked.

Mrs. M. E. Gilliland-Howe writes from Los Angeles, Cal.: "At 8 o'clock, New Years Eve, over 300 Spiritualists and friends gathered together in Lincoln Hall and listened to an entertainment furnished by members of the different societies, after which baskets of lunch were auctioned off to the highest bidder, said baskets bringing a fund of $35. Then the young folks engaged in dancing until 12 o'clock, when there was a general hand-shaking and best wishes for the new year. The proceeds amounted to about $05, and will help pay lawyer fees for defense of one of the ordained mediums now under arrest for not paying a license; said license being $10 per month. We are fighting to have our cause recognized as a religious body, and right well have the different societies united together at this time, making manifest our interest in our sister, and the desire to stand together for the cause."

A. Barton writes from Portland, Oregon: "Long before the midnight bells and the noisy whistles announced the passing away of 1901, and the birth of 1902, a large number of Spiritualists had congregated together at the residence of Capt. J. H. McMillen, on Crosby street, for the purpose of holding a watch-night meeting, and a right glorious time they had. The spacious room in which the Friday afternoon and Sunday evening circles are held, was filled to its utmost capacity with good and true Spiritualists, some having come miles to get there. Never did grander expressions of spirit love and power come to mortal man as came through the mediums while under the influence of their controls on this occasion. Geo. Wigg, M. D., took the lead, followed by Mrs. McMillen, Mrs. Flannagan, Mr. Campbell and others. At 9:30 a recess was taken, when all present partook of a rich and bountiful repast which had been prepared by the ladies present. At 10:30 the exercises were renewed and continued until midnight when, just as the new year was born, greetings to each other in the words of Robert Burns, followed. In this city (Portland) Spiritualism is fast taking hold of the minds of the people who are in earnest about the matter. What is needed here, is mediums who can set before them a richer, nourishing soul food than what they get in the churches. Mrs. J. H. McMillen conducts a large circle (composed of ladies) at her home on Friday afternoon. On Sunday evenings, Dr. Geo. Wigg conducts another circle at the same place. This is a mixed circle, for all are welcome to it. No money is taken from anyone. What is given at either meeting is as free as was that given by the Master."

C. H. Figuers writes of the Christmas ceremonies at Cleveland, O.: "Our lyceum held its entertainment on Sunday, Dec. 22, and was a complete success. Songs and recitations by the children of the lyceum, and sweet music by a quartette of young gentlemen who volunteered their services. We have about 30 children in constant attendance, no matter what the weather is. Sunday, December 29, 1901, was the anniversary of C. H. Figuers taking charge of the East End Spiritual Society. Mrs. McCaslin, one of our valued workers, was present and assisted in the dedication of six children to spiritual lives. White flowers were used instead of water. Mr. Figuers' remarks were listened to with much interest as he reviewed the work of the past year, and as he said that not one dollar of indebtedness was over the society and that all bills were paid as soon as due, his remarks were received with applause. The German Societies, of which we have two, are doing nicely. The West Side Society is still alive. Mrs. Alice Baker holds parlor meetings which are highly successful. Dr. R. McS. Angus holds a meeting at 221 Superior street, and the East End Spiritual Society, at 123½ Euclid avenue, and the Temple Fund Society in Pythian Temple; they are all doing nicely. On the first Sunday in February the mediums of Cleveland are going to unite forces, take a hall and give a grand benefit seance for the N. S. A. Mediums' Home, at Reed City, Mich. All mediums should hold benefits for our home and make it a success."

S. Hartman writes from Wheeling, Va., speaking highly of the work of the N. S. A. missionaries, Mr. and Mrs. Kates: "Mr. Kates is a pleasing and effective lecturer, while Mrs. Kates is a medium of very rare qualities. She is as magnetic as it is possible for a medium to be. The First Progressive Society of Spiritualists added many new members to its list during their stay. Mrs. Kates also held a woman's meeting with over 200 attendants, at an admission fee, and the manager was compelled to adjourn the meeting to a larger hall. It was an imposing scene, when the ladies marched like a great army, from one hall to the other. The meetings will be continued after this in McClain's Hall, with Mr. G. W. Way as medium. These meetings created great public interest, awakened by Mrs. Kates' tests, assisted by Mr. Way."

W. C. Mann writes from Louisville, Ky.: "The annual election of officers of Speed's Memorial Temple (formerly People's Spiritual Church) was held Sunday evening, January 12. The following are the officers: Val Speed, president; J. L. Franck, vice-president; C. Kircher, treasurer; W. C. Mann, secretary. F. J. Lentsch, John Oestrich, John Cully, trustees; Mrs. Kircher, Mr. Hazard and Mrs. Dale, stewards. On New Year's eve we had our annual watch meeting and supper, which was a grand success, both socially and financially. One of the features of the supper, we always set plates with a bouquet of flowers on, one for each of our members who have passed over. We had thirteen plates this year."

Correspondents can address Henry H. Warner at Missouri Valley, Iowa, until January 27, and after that at Franklin, Neb., until February 3.

There will be an informal reception under the auspices of the National Sunlight Center Club, at Great Northern Hotel, L. 38, January 23 1902, from 8 to 11 p. m. A fine program has been arranged, and a jewel medal will be presented to the president, Mrs. Sarah E. Bromwell.

Progressive Spiritual Society No 2, will hold service every Sunday evening at 7:30 in Hall 220 Atheneum Building, 26 East Van Buren street. Mrs. Hilbert, pastor, will be assisted by other prominent mediums. Good singing and tests.

Dr. Freedman, the Australian Healer, writes from 3036 Indiana avenue, Chicago: "My case with the State Medical Board has been postponed until January 21. I can't see how the Medical Board can make out a case against me; however, if they choose to give me some newspaper advertising, I am perfectly willing. Up to the present time only two people have responded to my previous appeal in your paper of two weeks ago, for funds to help me pay the lawyers engaged to defend our rights. I have up to date put up $20 as a retainer. Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley sent one dollar in a very kind note of expression for success, from Milwaukee, Wis., and John F. Handlon, from New York City, with no address enclosed one dollar. I trust the public will see the necessity for contributing liberally to assist in carrying on this struggle against medical tyranny."

L. Hawkins writes: "After reading about the vision of Mr. R. W. Bowman, in No. 634 of The Progressive Thinker, in reference to the display of the flags of the different nationalities in the heavens, I received a message from somewhere in space, stating that the flags represented the bright tutelary angels of the different nations; that in the year 1918 all the nations whose flags were displayed would espouse the cause of Spiritualism, the United States leading. The train of cars signified prosperity. All the nations whose flags were seen, will, in the year 1918, by being freed from the thraldom of superstition, and espousing the glorious truth of Spiritualism, enter into a state of prosperity unknown before in the history of the world, the United States in the lead."

W. A. Rozelle writes from Cleveland, Ohio: "We have reorganized our society by electing the following officers: President, R. D. Smeaton; vice-president, Fred Hayes; secretary, W. A. Rozelle; treasurer, J. C. Hemmeter; trustees, Fred Hayes, Thos. Isitt and J. C. Hemmeter; pastor, Mrs. Alice Baker; musical director, Miss Tilley Isitt; usher, Thomas Isitt. What success we may have remains for the future to unfold, but we hope for the best, and would be glad to see it as large and prosperous as it was a few years ago."

L. Hawkins, M. D., writes from Oklahoma: "I have four of the premium books and am well pleased with them, Art Magic leading, by odds, to my notion. I have taken The Progressive Thinker, with very little intermission, since the first of November, 1891. Should have taken it sooner if I had known of it, as I think it is the best paper of the kind in print."

Mrs. Elizabeth J. Demorest, platform test medium and speaker, can be addressed at 28 South Fourth street, Reading, Pa., until April 1.

Captain Geo. W. Walrond, of Denver, Colo., is still confined to his bed, critically ill with mental and nervous prostration. His medical adviser has every confidence of pulling him through in a few weeks. Captain Walrond desires us to request the many hundreds of his clients, who have sent him orders, to have a little patience, and all orders, inquiries and correspondence will be duly attended to.

GOD DEFENDED.

The Scriptural Writers and the Church as Blasphemers.

A more dishonoring account of God than that given by the Scriptures and the church is hardly conceivable.

We are told by those that God created the universe and all things in the earth in six days, and that he then rested on the seventh as if, forsooth, he was tired. He created the balance of the universe to give the earth light, and everything in the earth for man's benefit.

Of men the Jews were his chosen people or special favorites, and he did many "miraculous" things in their favor in a futile effort to make them a great or mighty power. He went along with the Jews wherever they went, looking after their interests, and fighting their battles for them. In these battles his instructions were to slay not only the enemies, but every living creature belonging to them. He was a jealous God and very much given to anger. These jealousies and angers were very much after the fashion of those of men under like circumstances, and were shown in substantially the same way. If the Jews worshiped him all things went well with them; if they forgot him they were sent into captivity by way of a reminder. And, by the way, the Jews must have been a most forgetful people; for they leaped into idolatry in quick succession in the very midst of all these miraculous things which it is said God was doing for them. They even set up the golden calf while Moses was gone up in the mountains for the commandments, one of which read, Thou shalt worship no other God than me.

Finally this God of the biblical writers and the church, after giving man such nature as that he sinned, sent his only Son to save him. And now, the man who believes goes to heaven, while the unbeliever goes to another place, regardless of other qualifications.

The God of the Bible and the church is a God of large and most glaring contradictions. At times he is omnipresent and omniscient; at others he sits on a throne in a local heaven and employs a mighty host of angels carrying dispatches to and from the earth. He is credited with all foreknowledge; yet sends a flood to wipe out antediluvian people because they had not panned out as he expected. He is said to be an infallible God; yet is represented as the great experimentor; and often his experiments prove abortive, notably in the creation of man, the great majority taking the broad road. Moreover, the God of the Bible and the church is represented as shirking responsibilities, when sin in the world is attributed to the devil whom the omniscient God must have created in full view of all the consequences.

Now we are here to inform any pious judge and jury that we believe in God, and that our purpose is to defend his character against the many vile aspersions of the Bible and the church. If you must try anybody for blasphemy, try yourselves, if you believe the many damaging things that have been said about God by these people. A rabbi said of Ingersoll's lecture on Moses: "Let the man alone, he but ridicules the pigmy gods of these Christians; the God of Moses is too much for him, he can't understand him."

"But in another sense the God of Moses is also too much for us, if the account which Moses gives of creation and the purposes of God in that creation, is to be taken as literally true. We can't believe God created the universe in six ordinary days. If it be said that each day means a long creative period, what becomes of the foundations of Sunday? If we are only to rest each seventh period instead of each seventh day, it is a long time between drinks.

Again, in view of the immensity of the universe we can't believe it was all made to give the earth light, nor that the God of all this took such a lively interest in the affairs of a handfull of Jews down in one corner of the earth. And the probabilities that all these are inhabited by intelligences not wholly unlike ourselves is calculated to cast grave suspicion on the statement that God sent his only son to save man. Why not a savior for those other people?

But, says an eminent divine, the inhabitants of the earth were the only people allowed to sin, and they were allowed to sin to give the others an object lesson—which is seen by some sort of diamond light. How is that for high?

Perhaps the day is gone when it was entirely safe for a man to put through himself just any old rubbish in the name of religion.

Afton, Tenn. F. J. RIPLEY.

A Visit to the South Side.

The visitor to the South Side, Chicago, finds some very pleasant things to record in spite of the fact that an old worker, noted for fuss and feathers, is anxious to be transplanted to the North or West division of the city to get out of the atmosphere of "tin horn mediums."

On the evening of January 16, Mrs. Dr. De Lascau's double parlors at 3031 Cottage Grove avenue, were packed to their limits with pleasant people. In one room Mrs. Isa Cleveland held the attention by many good readings, both psychometric and clairvoyant, while in the other, Mrs. M. A. Linn was listened to with equal interest. Later, Mrs. Dr. Warne gave a few messages that were welcomed with satisfaction by the recipients. Sandwiches and chocolate were served to the company. Not the least important feature was the collection whereby a helpful sum was realized to purchase needed articles of apparel for an old and sorely afflicted medium who is an acquaintance of Mrs. De Lascau. The guests bid their hostess good night with the unanimous testimony that they had enjoyed a pleasant evening. The meeting was noticeable for the large percentage of young men and women present—a hopeful sign.

The meetings in Mackinaw Hall, corner of Evans avenue and Forty-third street, are growing in size so much that lack of seating capacity is causing Mrs. Cleveland, the conductor and medium in charge, to consider securing a larger hall for use Sunday afternoons and evenings. Dr. Arthur Houghton is speaking here for a few Sunday evenings, and his platform efforts are always worthy of attention, for there is more than a mere jingle of words to them—they bristle with thought. He would be appreciated for that reason at some of the summer camps. The Doctor has been giving his time for some months to special studies, but is again actively engaged in the practice of medicine.

The First Spiritual Church of the South Side—Mrs. Cooley's society for some time—is resting in peace. While it survives in name, it is practically dead. A variety of reasons account for this regrettable condition, among them failure of the membership to properly sustain the efforts of the officers, the desire of a few faithful ones to rest for a time from labor and responsibility, and especially an unexpected bill of about seventy-five dollars for hall rent, which the society holds there is no legal ground to make. It looks as though business done in an unbusiness-like manner might be responsible for this misunderstanding. Too much taken for granted, and too little in black and white.

The atmosphere of the Englewood Spiritual Union is one of earnest activity. Mrs. Emma Nickerson Warne is speaker for January. Good audiences are present. Many sympathetic thoughts go out to Mrs. G. S. Lincoln, the society's excellent medium, because of recent loss of a brother, whose death was very sad. A noticeable feature in the services here is the very tasty song cards compiled by the president, Bro. T. S. Russell, of 6143 Wentworth avenue. They are printed on good card board in clear type, without the disgrace of misspelled words, or any distressing attempt to follow rhyme and preserve meter. It is a very happy combination of appropriate sentiments and tunes.

The Truth Seekers' Society, corner of Halsted and 59th streets, held interesting services on Sunday, the 12th inst. Addresses in German were made by Robert Grabe and Mrs. M. A. Linn. Mr. Ed Durkes followed with a very practical one in English, and then came Mrs. D. Besler. President Warne, of the Illinois State Association, then formally installed the officers chosen for 1902: President, Chris Hilgens; vice-president, Fritz Gluesing; secretary, Mrs. F. Gluesing; treasurer, Mrs. P. Freund; medium, Robert Grabe. The afternoon closed with messages by Wm. Lynn.

Mrs. D. Besler opened a new meeting on Sunday evening, the 12th inst., at 5212 Halsted street and was greeted by an unexpectedly large audience. Mrs. Linn, who is growing in power, aided her.

Mrs. M. A. Burland, well known to Chicago workers a few years ago as Mrs. Jeffries, is reported to have returned to the city ready for work in Illinois. Her address is given as General Delivery, Chicago P. O.

FREE
A NEW CURE FOR KIDNEY AND BLADDER
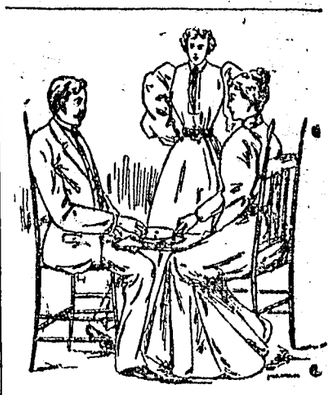
Diseases, Rheumatism, etc.

Disorders of the Kidneys and Bladder cause Bright's Disease, Rheumatism, Gravel, Pain in the Back, Bladder Disorders, difficult or too frequent passing of water, Dropsy, etc. For these diseases a Positive Specific Cure is found in a new botanical discovery, the wonderful Kava-Kava Shrub, called by botanists piper methysticum, from the Ganges River, East India. It has the extraordinary record of 1,200 hospital cures in 30 days. It acts directly on the Kidneys, and cures by draining out of the Blood the poisonous Uric Acid, Lithates, etc., which cause the disease.



Rev. John H. Watson, testifies in the New York World, that it has saved him from the edge of the grave when dying of Kidney disease and terrible suffering when passing water. Mr. Calvin G. Bliss, North Brookfield, Mass., testifies to his cure of long standing Rheumatism. Mr. Jos. Whitten, of Wolfboro, N. H., at the age of eighty-five, writes of his cure of Dropsy and swelling of the feet, Kidney disorder and Urinary difficulty. Many ladies, including Mrs. C. C. Fowler, Locktown, N. J., and Mrs. Sarah Tharp, Montclair, Ind., also testify to its wonderful curative power in Kidney and allied disorders peculiar to womanhood.

That you may judge of the value of this Great Discovery for yourself, we will send you one Large Case by mail Free, only asking that when cured yourself you will recommend it to others. It is a Sure Specific and can not fail. Address The Church Kidney Cure Company, 401 Fourth Ave., New York.

THE PSYCHOGRAPH
—OR—
DIAL PLANCHETTE.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than seven years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means of developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive Communications?

The Psychograph is an invaluable assistant. A pamphlet with full directions for the Formation of Circles and Cultivation of Mediumship

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages, a volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt. D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I and communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

NEW EDITION.
THE LYCEUM GUIDE

Do you want to organize a society, for the social, intellectual and spiritual advancement of the children and adults?

THE PROGRESSIVE LYCEUM

furnishes all you desire.

Do you want a self-sustaining society, founded on the basic principles of the spiritual philosophy? You have it in THE PROGRESSIVE LYCEUM. It furnishes a system of evolution by internal growth; not the old cup and pitcher Sunday-school. It has something to interest and advance every member, and those who are most active in teaching are the ones who learn most.

NO SPECIAL INSTRUCTOR REQUIRED.

THE LYCEUM GUIDE gives every detail needed for effective organization, and for conducting the society when established.
It has Golden Chain Recitations; the prettiest songs and music; choral responses; a service for a Band of Mercy; calisthenics; how to make the badges, flags and banners; marching exercises; full instructions in conducting the exercises, with parliamentary rules, etc.
Many Spiritualists living in isolation, have formed lyceums in their own families; others have banded, two or three families together, while large societies have organized on the lyceum platform, and found great interest in this self-instructive method.
Do not wait for a "missionary" to come to your assistance, but take hold of the matter yourself, procure copies of the GUIDE, and commence with the few or many you find interested.
Mrs. Emma Rood Tuttle (address, Berlin Heights, Ohio) will answer all questions pertaining to lyceum work.
The price of THE LYCEUM GUIDE is 50 cents, postpaid, or by the dozen, 40 cents each, by express, charges paid by receiver. Address

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. M. R. T.: Q. Who was Zoroaster, and when did he live? Can you give some passages from his religious books?

A. The eminent scholar, M. Haug, places Zoroaster 2,300 years B. C., thus antedating Moses. But far better authorities are the Greek writers. They agree in placing the era of Zoroaster more than 6,000 years B. C.

One of the first writers on the subject, Xanthas of Lydia, wro wrote about 450 years B. C., makes Zoroaster to have lived 6,500 years B. C. As Xanthas was contemporary with Darius, the Zoroaster said to have lived at the time of Hystaspes, Darius' father, could not have been the historic personage who composed the Avesta. Zoroaster was a common name among the Persians as Jesus was among the Jews, and hence the confusion that has arisen.

Aristotle places Zoroaster 6,000 years before the death of Plato, or 6,350 B. C., and Eudoxus Hormodorus makes similar statements. Hermippus, who made the religion and books of the Magi the study of a lifetime, stated, according to Pliny, on the authority of Agonakes, his teacher, that Zoroaster lived about 5,000 years before the Trojan war, or 6,180 B. C. The date of the Trojan war is indefinite, it is even doubtful if there was such a war, as sung by Homer, and the fixing of the date of an event, itself mythical, by another equally illusory, may be delightful fiction but not reliable history.

To fix pre-historic dates; to separate the true from the false, the real from the myth, is difficult if not impossible. Until the Greeks came in contact with the Persians, Chaldeans, Assyrians and Babylonians, the history of these peoples was little more than legendary. It was reserved for modern exploration to open the vista into their almost measureless past. The Zend language in which the religious books were written was a dead language at the time of Darius.

Zoroaster did not write those books. They are the remains of an early literature, all that remains, and belong to an age when all writings were believed to be living and sacred. Written no one knows by whom, or when, copied and changed by succeeding generations, until the language in which they were written became lost except to the priests trained to read and interpret it. Some one by the name of Zoroaster may have brought the writings together, and became the impersonation of all those who had written before him, as Homer is probably a name for all the poets who wrote before he condensed their songs into the Iliad.

To translate these ancient writings into modern speech, is among the most difficult tasks, and has not been, nor can it be perfectly performed, for the forms of thought have radically changed.

Yet the moral maxims had at that early age been formulated, and on them religion was necessarily built.

The following may be taken as examples of the teachings of the Zend Avesta, or Persian bible, referred to Zoroaster as author.

Prayer: In the name and friendship of Ormuzd (God). Learn purity. Be worthy of good praise. May the mind think good thoughts, the words speak good, the works do good. May all wicked thoughts hasten away, all wicked words diminish, all wicked works be burnt up...Win for thyself property by right dealing. Speak truth with the rulers and be obedient. Be modest with friends, clever and well-wishing. Be not cruel. Be not wrathful-minded. Commit no sin through shame. Be not covetous. Torment not, cherish not wicked envy, be not haughty, treat no one despitefully, cherish no lust. Be chaste. Actively engage in good works. ...Enter into no strife with a revengeful man. Be no companion to a covetous one. Go not on the same way with a cruel one. Before an assembly speak only pure words...May that come to you which is better than good...May that not come to you which is worse than evil.

So may it happen as I pray.

"All good do I accept at thy command, O God, and think, speak and do it. I believe in the pure law, by every good work seek I forgiveness for all sins.

"I praise Ahura Mazda who has created the cattle, who has created purity, the water and good trees, who created the splendor of light, the earth and all good. To him belong the kingdom, the might and the power. We praise him first among the adorable beings...with our bodies and life praise we him...The good spirit we honor, the good kingdom we honor, and the good law, and the good rule, and the good wisdom."

Spiritualist: Q. How much of Christian Science ought we to receive?

A. Let us give an outline of this lauded religion, and then judge of its merits. Mrs. Eddy in 1866 founded it, and then mainly applied it to "healing." She said her book was infallible, and no pen or tongue could pull it down, yet she has issued several editions, constantly revising. She really, although not under the name, set up for a messiah. Her disciples believe that she is the woman spoken of by St. John as "clothed with the sun and the moon under her feet." The book the woman holds, is this book of hers!

She claims that sickness and pain are illusions, belief of the mental mind. They have no real existence. She says: "You say a boil is painful, but that is impossible, for matter without mind is without pain. The boil manifests your belief in pain through inflammation and swelling and you call your belief a boil."

Weariness is impossible, eating unnecessary. Alcohol is intoxicant only to those who believe it is. If they did not so believe, it would have no more effect than water.

If one did not believe arsenic a poison he could eat it with impunity. When given by mistake, when the subject does not know its nature, he is poisoned because other people believe it is poison.

Another line of talk is that God is everything, and man a part of God. As a part of God he cannot be sick. It is because he does not believe this that he suffers.

It is said that woman of the Apocalypse has accumulated out of her dupes a fortune that makes her the wealthiest woman in the world. She holds her books at the highest price, demands extortionate fees for lessons, and mulcts her followers at every turn.

The doctrines are wild rant of insanity and the verbosity of ignorance. It is a queer freak to call them Christian Science, when they have nothing in common with Christianity, and as far away from science as Grimm's wonder stories.

cause they are true but because they are meaningless. When one is met with this rigmarole, "You have a boil; you have it because you have belief in a boil; hence if you had not the belief you would not have a boil," there is no argument admissible. One can only deny wholly the vicious method of reasoning and point to the absolute, undeniable fact that the boil exists, is painful, and will after awhile yield to the vital processes of cure.

If it be true that all mankind are a part of God, then has he some very leprous and undesirable members which he had better lop off. Then God has boils, ague, fever and plague, and by no means is exemplary in his conduct.

Mrs. Eddy was once a Spiritualist and has inducted a little of the spiritual philosophy into the vast rubbish heap of verbosity she calls Christian Science. In this small measure it is true. As a whole, it is calculated to work immeasureable mischief. Numberless deaths may be directly referable to its belief. Not perhaps because drugs prescribed by a doctor would have been preferable, but because care and nursing were neglected for the "treatment," which was valueless. It is commendable that in most instances, after vigorous protest, when alarmingly ill, the teachers of this science send for a physician or nurse. They thereby repudiate their doctrines, but show their good sense.

When the blind millionaire offered Mrs. Eddy $1,000 to restore his sight, she said she had performed more remarkable cures, but really had not the time!

Think of Christ, whom she represents, turning away from a Lazarus because he had not the time!

It is unpleasant to speak harshly of a doctrine that has gained so many truthful and ardent followers, but how can anyone quietly have such doctrines presented, and by silence tacitly admit their claims? To ordinary common sense are they not absurd from beginning to end? They are false in inception, put forth for the purpose of deception, and to gain the money of those who fall victims to the delusion. The wonderful book of Mrs. Eddy is not a profound treatise on science or religion, but a conglomeration of meaningless phrases, and senseless verbosity. The profundity of meaning of which her disciples boast, is the profundity of a muddy pool. The bottom cannot be seen, not because of the depth, but light cannot penetrate its turbidity.

The Bloom of the Asphodelea.

When one finds a source of serene enjoyment, a well-spring of pleasure, if not very selfish he wishes for soul companions to enjoy it with him. I have just been enjoying Mrs. Tuttle's Asphodel Blooms, and wish to know that all truly attuned friends are enjoying a like pleasure.

After reading various parts of the sweet little book, I could not but exclaim, "How well named!" Asphodelen, a genus of the order of lilies.

"The Passing of Tennyson," and "A Visit to God's Highlands" are alone worth the price of the book. But from a poetical standpoint I am not sure that these take precedence of any of the rest of the book. Like all Mrs. Tuttle's writings, each piece seems to be a bright flash from the land of spirits; a sweet symphony from the home of celestials.

One of the chief requisites of a true poet is the power of imagination. Pure, sweet flights of fancy unmixed with jagged art.

This is marked in every verse of Mrs. Tuttle's poetry. It is so common to read in papers, lines meant for poetry, which exhibit the vain effort of the writer to soar, while none of the natural grace of the poetic can be discovered. Such writers remind one of the jerky flight of the jay or the kingfisher. Mrs. Tuttle's fancy flights remind one of the upward soaring of the swan, or the steady soaring of the eagle as he leaves his rocky home to seek the invisible regions of the sky. One who reads the Blooms with spiritually attuned heart will forget earth, and find himself locked in the embrace of Fancy.

I have looked in vain through these poems to find an unskilful blending of poetic feet. There is none of that inharmonious blending of the trochaic with the anapestic or other unskilful and inharmonious jangling so often met with in those who fancy they can write poetry. But even for those who are not fond of the muses sweet rapture, there is the prose by Clair Tuttle, which is not only beautifully written, but carries with it many sympathetic lessons.

But, dear reader, send for the Blooms, and you will surely enjoy them.

AN INSPIRED VISION.

Cyclic Dawn of Spiritual Day; or the Mystery of the Dark Ages Revealed.

My special phase of mediumship is such that intelligences from far-away spheres find it their pleasure to utilize; and what is true of me is so of every one. If we create favoring conditions, they come and teach us concerning great questions of which we can gain no knowledge in the world of men and books. At a recent sitting for spiritual unfoldment and revelation, a teacher came, and conjoining his intelligence to my own, gave the valuable lesson, of which the following is only an imperfect repetition; but the best my finite abilities can effect in reporting well-nigh infinite expression.

We were told that, even as the earth, together with all planetary bodies, completes its circuit round the sun in obedience to cyclic law, and as great calendar, lunar and other varying periods of time are reckoned after the same manner, so the entire solar system, constituting a mighty phalanx, in turn revolves about an inconceivably great and distant center, requiring six thousand years of our time to complete its cycle. Moreover, that in this long march through what we recognize on the material plane as time and space, our sun, its satellites, and every living creature inhabiting them, passes through periods of spiritual light and darkness three thousand years each in duration, corresponding to our day and night.

This assertion was somewhat startling; and its comprehensiveness too broad for our immediate conception; but our teacher proceeded to submit proof of the statements by referring us to a brief panoramic view of the world's history for six thousand years. Every student knows that four to five thousand years ago, great empires had already risen, and highly civilized peoples dwelt in various portions of the earth; and also, that in the erection of their wonderful monuments, they accomplished feats through methods unknown to the world of arts and sciences to-day. The weavers, the goldsmiths, the engineers and many other branches of industry and art were far in advance of anything in the same line known at present. This same student knows that during these early ages, human life was of much greater duration than throughout recent centuries; and, viewed from this plane of vision, many proofs exist supporting the proposition set forth by this wise, invisible one.

When we remember the fatal destruction of ancient literature in so many instances, by not only the Moslems but, alas, by the early Christians as well, we must also reflect that if the world's scholarship to-day had access to these great libraries, we might find, too, that they—the dwellers upon the earth five thousand years ago—were far more enlightened in many respects than ourselves, with all our boasted greatness and satisfaction over our achievements. As we take this birdseye view of "The Great Cycle," suppose we notice that about the time of Solomon, or roundly, about three thousand years ago, judging by the progress of race as history informs us of them, a season of twilight, spiritually speaking, had begun to close into night. In other words, blunders and mistakes, conflict and dispersion commenced to characterize all peoples everywhere. As though all guiding or sure light had ceased to illuminate the ways wherein mankind must move forward. This state of confusion increased gradually—the reader bearing in mind that in the transition from day to night of such long periods, several centuries must pass in twilight and dawn.

During the sixth, seventh and eighth centuries, B. C., many wise men lived and wrote inspired and consequently immortal works. Their number steadily decreased, however, and four hundred years B. C., the Jewish Temple worship ceased. This is recorded in their history to have been a recognition on the visible plane, of the invisible God; but with its departure, the sun of righteousness seemed totally obscured; its light shining no more upon the earth. Then, with meteor-like brilliance, Jesus of Galilee visited the world, teaching pure Spiritualism. He selected his pupils from among psychic men and women; and the religious truths he taught, after suffering bitter opposition for many years, through the persecution of his disciples, and finally being emblazoned upon the banner of Constantine the Great, continued to illumine the earth till the fall of his western empire, about 475 A. D.

Now observe; from the fifth to the ninth century, notwithstanding that the Messiah long promised through the Jewish scriptures had come, yet the deepest midnight gloom fell and enveloped the whole world. So profound was this spiritual darkness that even secular writers, taking no account of spiritual things, have named these centuries "The Dark Ages." Nor has a single one of them ever attempted an explanation as to why they so named them; at least so far as I can learn. Why this season of darkness should have fallen, especially as it did so soon after the advent of Jesus, that figure around whom the entire structure of christendom has been reared, none even of his own followers pretend to explain; but by their wisest men is denominated a mystery.

Contemplated in the light of this wonderful revelation, however, all mystery vanishes. The children of humanity were groping blindly in the thick darkness of the long, dread, spiritual night. Failing both in sight and hearing as well as in spiritual understanding, they fell into wars and devouring conflicts of every nature; much as would result on a less extensive scale upon our own earth during physical night, if left without light or the means of obtaining it. During all these centuries the inhabitants of the earth sought vainly for light and guidance. Hearing the voice of the church calling to those lost in the treacherous darkness to come into its fold, and knowing naught else to do, they flooded into this port of supposed safety and refuge; eagerly embracing such theories as they were led to believe was truth. All were struggling, doubtless, as best they might, to find a safe spiritual haven; but in the church, alas, they were taught by those equally blind and helpless as themselves; because equally far away from truth or spiritual light. Inside these folds, selfishness crept and crystallized into priestly power. Great burdens were imposed upon the enslaved ones, increasing their darkness and decreasing their remaining strength, and finally destroying utterly their power of doing aught except slavishly believing what the priesthood instead of spirituality taught them. This pernicious and soul-destroying doctrine of relying upon an atoning Savior for salvation instead of the truth that "As ye sow, so also shall ye reap," has so paralyzed the thinking faculties of mankind to this day, that whoever proclaims the truth that we must work out our own salvation, that another is powerless to do it for us, is denounced as a heretic and unworthy of recognition by the established believers—believers formed into a body through priestcraft and ignorance.

The sable shadows cast by false teaching and ignorance throughout long periods of darkness, lie sorely now, across the lives of humanity; aye, so bound, so wholly enslaved still are the masses by the chains of dogma and the shackles of creed, forged by the minds of men to false beliefs in such soul-destroying, strength-slaying and spiritually dwarfing doctrine as a vicarious atonement; a creed teaching the pretense at nullifying the unchanging laws of justice as that one person can bear the guilt and suffer the penalty for another. And now, so firmly riveted upon the intelligences of humanity is this spiritually darkening belief, that when one out from the masses awakens, awakens and sees with enlightened spiritual vision, the fresh, sweet dawn of a glad new day, catches the glimpses from the mountain-tops of the rising sun of righteousness, and hears the voices of the Creator, as did holy ones of old, listen to the cries of "heretic," "renegade," etc. Listen to the ignorant denunciations hurled at such by those who are wholly destitute of a solitary idea of their own, and only pretend to think according to rules laid down by some self-styled teacher.

Notice that during the dark period through which the solar phalanx has been traveling, nothing was written by which the intelligences of mankind could be profited. I mean the darkest of the centuries just past, and before the dawn of the sixteenth century; the years preceding that time to about the close of the fifth century A. D. Nothing except wars and life-storms of a most awful nature characterized the races of the earth; but now, these wise ones tell us, as the long, dark night is lifting, and the full radiance of spiritual light is beginning to illuminate the earth again, great revelations are at hand. Children born now will partake of the brightness of renewed spiritual light, and manifest such wondrous signs as well-nigh confound the senses of those who bear them. Inventions in the electrical and other scientific realms of knowledge which have already so astonished mankind, are but the shadows of almost unspeakable achievement which will be wrought out through the instrumentality of those who are prepared to hear and see revelations from the infinite to the finite. And also, that those who courageously press onward and upward toward loftier and brighter heights, bearing aloft before the world the white and beauteous banner of Truth, will be crowned with the just honors their faithfulness has won. That as the heralds or vanguard of this glorious work, spiritualized, glorified life shall be their reward.

THEOLOGICAL.

Is Theology In Its Decadence?

I hold that Christian grace abounds
Where charity is seen; that when
We climb to heaven 'tis on the rounds
Of love to men.

And when a man can live apart
From work, on theologic trust,
I know the blood about his heart
Is dry as dust.

—John G. Whittier.

It is safe to say observant readers will agree in this, that the trend from many so-called orthodox pulpits justify the inquiry: Is theology in its decadence?

By theology is meant that belief of late so universal, that the Bible was an infallible guide and record. Also a local heaven and hell. Jehovah—the name of the Jewish God as a personality, and the same of another equally omnipotent force, more popularly known in theological phrase as his Satanic Majesty, the Devil. Some thirty years ago that fine English poet, Gerald Massey, came over to deliver a course of lectures; the first was, "Why God Does Not Kill the Devil." The theological devil—in other words, the devil of theology. Ninety-nine out of a hundred now would anticipate the answer, none to kill.

Infallibility and inspiration are in a literal sense one. And represent that which is accepted and demonstrated as TRUTH.

There is so much embraced in that one word, that is subtle, vast, complex, it is hard to find something tangible, visible to make a comparison with. So must draw on the imagination to find a symbol that will bring out in part its most profound significance. Imagine an ever-blooming, everlasting flower—its fragrance always expanding, but never fully expended. In its hues are blended all the colors of the rainbow, and could we distill from it an essence its manifold virtues would be for the healing of the nations.

Admit the inference that the old Bible is not true—the same is apparent of the New. Fall the parent tree, the branches fall with it. Its truth or falsehood rests entirely on the old.

Among the many, but not the least is that most astute and learned theologian, Washington Gladden, who has written much and labored hard to prove the Bible like each and all other books, full of mistakes and utterly unreliable. But where can be found utterances so emphatic and pronounced in opposition to an infallible Bible, the creeds and dogmas based on the same, as are those from that high-toned and dignified theologian, Heber Newton?

But a most marked feature, while free and full in expressing what they do not—are silent as the dumb or dead in telling what they believe. Allow due consideration for utterances like those from such high authority, there can no longer be use for the word theology, having become obsolete.

Having a Greek version of the New Testament, printed in London more than 200 years ago, and wishing to test the accuracy of the accepted English—I asked an able and eminent Greek scholar to compare some texts which I hoped would prove to be inaccurate with the original. Among them were the following:

"And the graves were opened; and many bodies of the saints which slept arose."—Matthew xxvii:52.

"And he brought him to Jerusalem, and set him on a pinnacle of the temple, and said unto him, If thou be the son of God, cast thyself down from hence."—Luke v:9.

"Now in the morning he returned into the city, he hungered, and when he saw a fig tree....and found nothing thereon but leaves only, and said, Let no fruit grow on thee henceforward forever. And presently the fig tree withered away."—Matthew xxi:19.

The answer: "The English version is in harmony and accord with the original Greek."

To all unprejudiced it must be apparent that the fig-tree business is in direct conflict with the miracle of the bread and fishes. Overlooking the manifest anger and folly, because he could as easily have made each branch of the fig tree bend with ripe and luscious figs, as to have done what is claimed in the other. And it would appear to be in direct line—if not duty, for those theologians who are making those indirect and half-way assaults on the bible, to try and harmonize such startling incongruities, or pronounce them false. As with most all other things, there is a humorous phase, no matter how serious or grave it may be. I will relate the following: Having a friend in the person of a colored theologian, and knowing him not averse to controversy, I ventured the inquiry:

"Have you formed a definite opinion as to the literal truth of the story where it reads, 'And the graves were opened,' etc?"

"I have, and do believe it all literally true, every word, sah."

"And now, please, your opinion as to what became of them—and where they now are?"

"Well, sah! I have thought those Arabs that danced the can-can, on the Midway Plaisance in Chicago, were some of them."

"And again, have you the same opinion in relation to this, where it reads, 'And the devil taking him to Jerusalem, set him on a pinnacle of the temple?"

"I have a most decided opinion, and have always thought it true, sah."

"And now I am most anxious to know how long he remained, and how he came down."

"He saw the devil go into a saloon just over the way, and waiting till he got in a drunken debauch, just slid down the lightning-rod, and hid in the coal box out in the alley, sah."

The reader will form his own opinion as to which contain the most truth, the stories as we find them, or the opinions of my colored friend and theologian.

It should be remembered that at the time of those alleged happenings, Roman soldiers marched and countermarched the streets of Jerusalem all hours of the day. And Roman scribes with most minute accuracy and detail noted every event—as the same would be of a happening in Boston or Chicago to-day.

There need be no hesitancy in saying those things never happened.

False, utterly false in particulars and detail. Phantoms from a disordered brain. No graves did open, no dead came forth, and no devil placed Christ on a pinnacle of the temple.

RENDING THE VAIL.

A Most Remarkable Book Concerning the Existence of Man, and All Things, and All Being

It Was Written by Materialized Forms at the House of J. H. Pratt, Spring Hill, Kansas, William W. Aber Being the Medium.

"Rending the Vail" is pronounced by Col. R. T. Van Horn, of Kansas City, Mo., as a most remarkable work. That Col. Van Horn is fully competent to judge, we will say that he has been a member of congress for four sessions, an editor of a leading daily, and a profound thinker along scientific lines. He says:

"The principal contributors to the book are four in number: Dr. W. H. Reed, who is called the chemical control of the medium; William Denton, Thomas Paine and Michael Faraday. There are numerous others giving a few incidental and mostly personal messages or dissertations on scientific, philosophic, religious, theologic and occult topics—from world-building, the origin of life, or religions, of scientific discovery, and the laws of cosmos or nature—in fact the entire field of human thought. The limitation seemed to be only that of the spectators to ask questions.

"In addition to this mass of messages, there are in the book about sixty illustrations—44 of them portraits. These were drawn by a form standing out in the room at a desk, the form or personality to be sketched at the doorway of the cabinet and the finished picture handed to one of the circle and filed away by the secretary.

"What will attract the attention of even the non-Spiritualist reader is that the topics treated by Prof. Denton, Thomas Paine and Prof. Faraday, are in kind, in thought and style with those to which their active lives in this world were devoted—in literary character as different here as in their works extant on our book-shelves.

"The Spiritualist press and its contributors are just now discussing a number of questions as to the nature of spirit, of spirit return; the want of agreement between those returning as to conditions in their present world; the limitations—that the organism of the medium imposes upon communication, and various kindred questions. All these are treated, some of them very fully, but all rationally understandable. Also phenomena, inspiration and such, to many, knotty subjects, are freely and fully discussed.

"The work is not written by the medium nor by any one connected with the society or circle. All was delivered by personalities distinct from either, written down by the secretary as spoken, or if in writing, filed away. At the next meeting the minutes in full were read, corrected, or criticised by those present and by the authors, and when approved by both laid away for the book.

"The work is unique in the history of spirit communication. Swedenborg, Andrew Jackson Davis, and Maria King wrote under inspiration. Newbrough wrote Oahspe automatically by typewriter. "Rending the Vail" was written and spoken by full-form personalities and is printed as given. One remarkable thing about the writing may not be amiss here. As high as 1,200 words a minute were written by actual timing by the watch.

"It is but just to the secretary to say that his work has been admirably done—not only faithfully and efficiently, but with excellent taste. There are no dogmatic parentheses, no interpolations or ipse dixits of the scribe. He simply states that "a form purporting to be" So-and-So, "appeared and delivered the following"—stating whether it was oral or in writing.

"In reading the book, and I have read it all, this modest, self-retiring, literal rendering of these extraordinary happenings by the secretary has been a source of constant admiration. It adds character to the book and inspires constant confidence in the integrity that from the first page to the last enhances the respect and interest of the reader."

This remarkable book, "Rending the Vail," is for sale at the office of The Progressive Thinker. Price, $2. It is a large volume of 500 pages.

BEYOND THE VAIL

A Sequel to "Rending the Vail."

The two volumes together as a record of practically obtained facts demonstrating the claims of Modern Spiritualism as to post mortal survival, are unique and overwhelming.

Every communication is from a full materialized spirit form, in good light, and either spoken audibly or written in full view by the form. There is not an automatic or trance message in the book.

It is illustrated by several engravings, the originals of which were drawn in the presence of the circle by a full form materialized spirit artist.

BEYOND THE VAIL is, as a rule, the experiences of spirits in both worlds—their own account of their lives on earth and their progress after death to their present condition of freedom from earth conditions. The narratives are intensely interesting, instructive and often highly dramatic.

Coincident with these are the profoundly philosophical comments of the controlling spirits of the seances. Prof. William Denton, Thomas Paine, Dr. W. H. Reed and others—covering, law, medicine, jurisprudence, theology and metaphysics. There are no books in existence of like character or of higher authority. Price, by mail, $1.75.

THE BEAUTIFUL SOUVENIR VOLUME,

By A. LEAH UNDERHILL,

(Of the Fox Family.)

The Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism.

Thirty-three chapters, 477 pages, superbly printed, and bound in colors and gold, 15 illustrations, 5 steel engraved portraits of the celebrated Fox Family, a full page engraving of the old house at Hydesville, which to this day, by the act of its wealthy and respected owner, Artemas Hyde, Esq., bears the inscription, "Here Spiritualism Originated in 1848."

A complete history of the initiation of the movement known as Modern Spiritualism, from the epochal period which dates from March 31, 1848. Since that day, starting from a small country village in western New York, Spiritualism has made its way against tremendous obstacles around the civilized globe.

Only a limited number of copies of this rare book, now out of print, are to be had, and these can be obtained only at this office. Those who remit at once will receive a copy, post paid, at the GREATLY REDUCED PRICE OF $1.

Note.—By failure in 1885 to complete contract with the author, a large portion of the edition was left unbound, and so remained for a number of years, when they were rescued and bound at additional cost, hence this valuable contribution to the cause of Spiritualism was not properly presented to the Spiritualistic public, and a host of investigators have not had the opportunity of securing a copy until the present time. Do not fail to send for a copy at once. J. R. FRANCIS,

"THE UNKNOWN"

—BY—

CAMILLE FLAMMARION.

"The Unknown" created a marked sensation in France when first published and can scarcely fail to arouse the greatest interest in this country. It is an eminent scientist's study of the phenomena of the spirit world. In touching upon the various physical manifestations the author cites many absolutely authenticated instances, and chapters of his book are as weirdly fascinating as the most fantastic of Poe's tales. It treats on incredulity, credulity, hallucinations, psychic action of one mind upon another, transmission of thought, suggestion, the world of dreams, cerebral physiology, psychic dreams, distinct sight in dreams, actual facts, premonitory dreams and divination of the future, etc. 487 pages, cloth bound. Price $2.00.

"THE LANGUAGE OF THE STARS."

A Primary Course of Lessons in Celestial Dynamics.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE LIGHT OF EGYPT."

This important primary work is the first practical exposition of the Astro-Magnetic forces of Nature—in their relation to man—that has yet been issued by the American press. It contains fourteen special lessons, embracing each department of human life, in such plain, simple language that a child can understand the elementary principles laid down. And in addition to these lessons is an Appendix, containing a full explanation of all technical and scientific terms in general use upon the subject, thus forming a brief, yet practical Astro Dictionary. This work is illustrated with special plates.

DR. G. E. WATKINS,

The Noted Chronist,

Is Now Located at

No. 1087 Boylston street, Boston, Mass., where he will be pleased to meet all who may call between the hours of 10 a. m. and 2 p. m. The wonderful work in healing the sick that Dr. Watkins is accomplishing is indeed most astounding; his patients live to testify to his wonderful powers as a healer. For the last year his work has been most wonderful. He says himself that his cures this year have been more than ever before in numbers, as he confined himself to only 30 new patients a month. Dr. Watkins attends personally to each case, and therefore he can do better work than if he had a great many assistants; no staff of visible helpers are in his office to annoy and suggest this and that. He knows what is the trouble with each patient, and knows the right specific to give. He prepares and puts up all of his medicine, and has no help in his medical treatments that is visible help. Write him to-day, and by return mail you will receive the diagnose. No charge made for diagnosing your case. Send age, sex and leading symptom.

WHAT IS GOD?

God Is the Totality of All Things.

We can reason out how our solar system evolved, for we have the history of the evolution of the world written in the rock strata; and in the nebula we see the embryo of future universes.

All the solar systems that at present exist have evolved from the product of past universes; and so on back into beginningless time has this process been going on; and the past is as eternal as the future.

To the philosophic mind it is a question whether the positive God-Mind evolved from the negative substance of the universal expansion, or the expanse of infinite nature is a product of the God-Mind. By God-Mind I mean the boundless ocean of Omniscience.

We know that this solar system was produced like other solar systems now seen in formation from the nebulous fire-mist, and that the fire-mist is but the disengaged elements of existence individualizing around a new center, and as that center of force which begins in drawing elementary forces into a visible nebula, and ends as the sun center of a new solar system, can be traced back into the realm of spiritual forces; and as spiritual forces are being evolved from gross forces, we see that the first cause is lost in an endless chain of cause and effect, and it is impossible to state what the first cause was like, for there really was never a beginning to anything. And it is of no consequence to us what transpired in past universes or how they evolved, for such things transcend the memory of the Gods. All that is known is that past universes were not so fine or intelligent as the present universe. The Gods were not so godlike; the spiritual realms were not so glorious; there was not such perfect order in the movements of solar systems; and the highest evolved being was not so human; and altogether the intelligence of the whole was not so intelligent.

When I write of past universes, I mention times and conditions which are beyond the comprehension of human minds, and in fact there is no line of demarkation between the universe that is and those that have been, for none ever became extinct and none were reformed as a whole. Planets may have disintegrated or exploded, and solar systems evolved into such etherical conditions that they were nothing but essence, but from the essences of old conditions new and more perfect forms would evolve, so that parts of the old were gradually replaced by new parts, until in the course of myriads of eons an entire new universe was existing in the place of the old cosmos.

A few figures will make it plain to us that all this transpired some time ago. According to the deductions of scientific research the fossil remains in the rocks show that 500,000 years have elapsed since the developing animal races succeeded in producing the man-like ape, and 2,800,000 years have passed over the head of this hoary planet since an animal as intelligent as an opossum first lived in ancient forests. Of course you understand we are taking the position that the higher species were evolved gradually from lower species, until the developing animal races resulted in the animal man who has been bred and educated to his present condition of intelligence.

14,300,000 years have elapsed since the lizards, salamanders and other reptiles first frolicked in the sun, and 100,000,000 years—a very small space of time in the history of a planet—have been counted by the circling earth since the water and land had cooled sufficiently to allow the earliest almost atomic forms of life to come into manifestation. We can safely say that it took another 100,000,000 of years for the surface of this huge ball of molten fire to cool and condense into solid rock. It certainly took a thousand times a hundred million years for the molten ball to form from the nebulous substance suspended in space, and this whole process which seems so interminable to us, is only an incident in the evolution of a universe.

We may from this slight outline satisfy our curiosity and gain some comprehension of the process by which the immutable laws of evolution produce such stupendous results, but we cannot expect to fully understand the infinite until our mind has grown to infinite proportions. It is enough for us to understand that the result of all this vast evolutionary process is immortal individualities.

The law of attraction works alike in the formation of a crystal as in the production of a planet, for unchangeable law reigns supreme in the least as in the greatest parts of existence. If we understand the principles that dominate visible things we may apprehend that the invisible creation is controlled by the same principles, for whether visible or invisible to our mortal sight, it is all the same thing to the law. It is all the manifestation of the one law. It is all different degrees of vibration of the one substance and substantial being. And our investigations compel us to believe that as all matter produces sentient and intelligent formations, it must all be latent intelligence. No matter what the condition of past universes, the present universe is composed of an evolved substance which is capable of responding to the action of thought, and of producing thoughtful minds. The whole universe is evolving subject to an intelligent law, an orderly principle, so we say that a mighty, an omnipotent Intelligence is everywhere evident in the workings of natural law. It is all Mind. The evolutionary process holds good throughout the whole. Evolution is God's method. It is the process by which God has become God, for the whole of immensity is an evolving Intelligent Being, and the whole can only be as intelligent as the sum of all its parts.

What is beneficial for us is of benefit to God. We are each a part of God as we are a part of the whole. The whole is God. God is nothing more and nothing less than the whole. God is the totality of all things.

As the most intelligent vibrations of thought are generated in the brain, and as the will and thought power which is evolved from the body and brain acts through the brain to dominate the whole nature, so there is a positive center of thought and intelligence to the great body of God, in which the resultant bliss and will and thought of the God-Mind exists, but this omnipotent Center of Consciousness is not the All of God, no more than the brain and intelligence is the all of the individual. The Mind of God has grown so large through the progressive developments of eternity that it transcends in size, in power and in consciousness the whole of His vast body. The infinite ocean of His omniscient love infuses His whole creation, just as the thought force generated in the brain is infused in every atom of the body.

This atom in His great body, our planet, is just evolving into that degree of fineness or spirituality that humanity are beginning to realize in a faint degree the presence of the omnipotent God; that God is immanent in all their lives and in all their substance, as well as a transcendent Being greater than the whole of manifested existence.

As the atoms of our food become fine enough they enter into the nerve centers or into the brain substance, where the vibrations of thought intensify their nature and spiritualize them. In like manner the planets become so highly evolved that they vibrate in unison with positive centers of divine thought and intelligence, and planets and people draw closer to that state of the God-Mind which is omniscient, omnipotent and omnipresent bliss.

God is immanent in His universe. God transcends His universe, and All, the Whole is God.

A SPIRIT'S WARNING.

O wondrous thought; gigantic truth,
Divulged by spirit band,
Written by aged, also youth
Who come from their fair land;
And how can mortal man now doubt
What mortal eyes have seen,
And talked with those who have passed out,
Now hid behind the screen.

O, doubting man, when will you learn
That spirit never dies,
But leaves the body, then returns
To open blinded eyes.
If you would only heed their voice,
And care for those below,
And make them happy and rejoice—
Make Heaven as you go.

What happy homes could then be found
While fitting ourselves below,
For happier that yet abound
For all who choose to grow.
What does your conscience tell you, when
You do a wrongful act?
A spirit whispers to you then,
"Tis wrong; 'tis not a fact."

Some believe in God, and yet they say
When death comes that's the last
Of soul and body, yet they pray
That they be saved at last,
And saved from what; come, tell me true,
Did your God make a hell?
Then make you think he had no crew
To torture you quite well?

O, fickle man, when will you learn
To look beyond the veil,
And know that happy spirits mourn
For you when thus you fail
To learn the truth, and hold it fast,
Enjoy your heaven on earth,
And when once called to go at last
You'll have a happy birth.

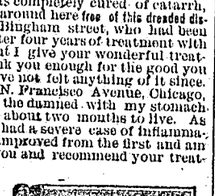
A MESSAGE OF HOPE

The Eminent Dr. Peebles with an Able Staff of Assistants has Discovered and Perfected a Treatment that Gives Hope to Every Suffering Home in the Land.



J. M. PEEBLES M.D., A.M.

Dr. Peebles' Institute of Health, composed of some of the leading physicians of the country, have perfected their method of healing so that it can almost be said that there are no incurable diseases. This system of treatment is a combination of Medicinal Remedies, Psychic Treatments, combined with a system of Hygiene and Physical Culture and is so perfected that any one can take it in their own home without detention from their business. Years ago the Doctor concluded that nature had wisely provided a cure for all diseased conditions just as she had for all injuries such as cuts, bruises, etc., and he at once set to work to discover what this mighty power might be and how it could be used. After almost half a century of persistent study and investigation he, with his able staff of co-workers have given to the world a perfected system of treatment that is destined to revolutionize the art of healing the sick. The entire country is astonished at the almost miraculous cures performed by these physicians, but the Doctors claim there is nothing mysterious about it at all. They say they are able to cure thousands of those pronounced incurable by other physicians because they work IN HARMONY WITH AND EMPLOY THE MIGHTY HEALING FORCES OF NATURE IN ADDITION TO THEIR MILD YET POTENT MEDICINAL REMEDIES. In a perfectly natural manner it builds up the system, enriches the blood, improves the digestion and appetite, gives strength to the nerves and muscles and repairs wasted tissues and organs, causing the invalid of many years to rejoice after having been told by the local doctors "there is no hope for you."

Mrs. J. D. Stevenson, of Hillsdale, O., in writing the Doctors after a three months' course of treatment thanks them heartily for curing her of a long standing case of female trouble and falling of the womb. Miss Daisy Burke, of Kalama, Wash., who was completely cured of catarrh, sends a thousand thanks and says "I am almost the only person around here free of this dreaded disease." Harry McClure, of Pittsburg, Pa., corner Fifteenth and Bingham street, who had been troubled with kidney trouble and rheumatism for years, writes after four years of treatment with local doctors: "I cannot express in words the hearty endorsement I give your wonderful treatment." Mrs. Joel Curtis, of Method, N. C., writes: "I cannot thank you enough for the good you have done me." You cured me of asthma two years ago and I have not felt anything of it since. I recommend you to all suffering humanity." F. Villiers, of 992 N. Francisco Avenue, Chicago, Ill., writes: "When I wrote you I was suffering the torments of the damned with my stomach and had been told by the best physicians in Chicago that I had about two months to live. As a last chance I wrote for your free diagnosis and you told me I had a severe case of inflammation of the stomach. Under your treatment and sound advice I improved from the first and am today in better health than in years. I most heartily endorse you and recommend your treatment to all."

FREE TO ALL

It makes no difference how serious your case may be or how long you have been suffering there is positive hope for you in this grand treatment. If you have not read their late book entitled "A Message of Hope" and do not understand the wonderful system of treatment you should write them at once for it. It will give you the key to this GRAND TREATMENT and explains fully how thousands of chronic sufferers are being cured after giving up all hope. If you will write them a plain, truthful letter about your condition they will go over your case carefully and send you free of charge a full diagnosis and their expert opinion of your case and candidly tell you what treatment you should have and the probable length of time it would take to cure you. You cannot afford to miss this opportunity to come into correspondence with these eminent physicians. They can tell you your exact condition and whether or not your case is curable and will give you their services in diagnosing and advising ABSOLUTELY WITHOUT COST. Write them at once for their opinnio in your case and their grand book, entitled "A Message of Hope." PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

(Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.)

At Factoryville, Pa., Nathan Wells passed from this life, December 14, 1901, at the age of 78 years. He had been a strong believer in Spiritualism for many years. His funeral was held at his home, and was largely attended by neighbors and friends. His wife preceded him seven years ago. He leaves seven children, four sons and three daughters, to mourn the loss of a kind father. NELLIE WELLS.

Passed to spirit life, Jan. 2, at Medway, Mass., my dear mother, Mrs. Catherine R. T. Stone, aged 75 years. She went with a full belief and confidence in Spiritualism. She had been a good trance medium for many years. She was a great reader, and liked The Progressive Thinker best of all.

MRS. C. F. IDE.

Passed to the higher life, from the home of his daughter, in North Prairie Crosse, Wis., Silas Boardman, a veteran Spiritualist and well known writer for the Spiritualist journals. He now realizes the fulfillment of the promise of future life. He was strong in his belief of the philosophy of Spiritualism, which knowledge buoyed him up during his last physical illness. Services conducted by the writer.

WILL J. ERWOOD.

Don Harper Spencer, Riverton, Neb., son of Dr. E. T. Spencer and Nellie Spencer, passed to spirit life, December 8, 1901, aged 5 years and 8 months. A short service was held at the residence. A selection from Lizzie Doten was read, The Spirit of Nature. Rev. S. Williams, Congregational church, whose Sunday-school little Don attended, offered a short prayer. "Nearer, My God, to Thee," and "When the Mists Have Rolled Away," were sung, after which his little body was laid from our sight, but we know his little spirit is very often with us. COR.

Passed to spirit life, Jan. 5, 1902, Obed Foss Wentworth, aged 71 years. Mr. Wentworth was an ardent Spiritualist, having joined the ranks at the time of the Rochester rappings. From the first issue of the Banner of Light, his home was never without at least one Spiritualist paper. Funeral services conducted by E. E. Parker, trumpet medium. COR.

Passed to spirit life, Sydney Macumber, at his residence, in Berlin, O., of consumption, aged 49 years. He has resided for over thirty years in the beautiful home made by his own efforts, and was esteemed by all who knew him. He was a Spiritualist by organization; an extensive reader and close thinker. A very large number of his friends and neighbors assembled at the funeral. His Masonic brothers came from Huron and other lodges, and the ritual was given in a most impressive manner. Before this ceremony, Hudson Tuttle gave an address. ***

RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

By S. Weil. Cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents. This is a work of great value, written by one of the keenest, most powerful and most truly religious minds of the day. It is particularly a work which should be put into the hands of those who have freed themselves from the dogmas of orthodoxy and from the dogmas of materialistic science, for it will strengthen the conviction of the free mind that mind and senses are not the whole of life.

The chapters reveal a new method in psychic and spiritual research. They show vivid glimpses of a stupendous moral cosmos that will supersede moral confusion, that only verifiable tenets can survive, and the childhood period of faith and fancy will be superseded by knowledge and facts.

Esoteric Lessons.

An Argument Against Physical Causation.

The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely physical health upon a purely psychical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom, insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief in which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

VOL. 25. CHICAGO, ILL., FEB. 1, 1902. NO. 636.

THE DESIRES AND PLEASURES OF THE VIVISECTIONISTS

Elucidated by Quotations from Their Own Alleged Utterances.

Reading the following which we clip from the Chicago Chronicle of recent date, impels one to ask whether we are really living in the twentieth century, when the humaner feelings and sentiments are supposed to actuate cultured human beings; or is it all an illusion, a dream, and we are still existing in the period of Torquemada and the Spanish Inquisition, with its cruel methods of torture, its inhumanity in the guise and for the sake of religion, purporting to act with a view to the best interests of man and the highest good of the church.

Read—and wonder with amazement at this illustration of modern medical fiendishness in the name and for the cause of science.

Read—and blush with shame that you are human. Read—and feel sorrow that you are the human kin of the class that expresses such heartless sentiments. Read—and fear that by some miscarriage of justice you may fall into the greedy outstretched hands of worse than savage torturers.

Read the statement given by the Chronicle:

"Vivisection instead of the gallows or electric chair may be the fate of the criminals who may be condemned to death in the near future if surgeons of Chicago have their way respecting the disposition of men and women sentenced by the law to die.

"Scores of doctors in Chicago favor the vivisection of men who have incurred the death penalty through crime. The surgeons say that in this way the men who have been a damage to society and a menace to human life may be made to be of some good to posterity by submitting their bodies to the surgeon's knife, the specialist's inoculations and the psychologist's experiment. It is thought that the practice might tend also to lessen crime.

"It is said that if the Anti-Vivisection Society can be kept from interfering a law providing for a national hospital under the control of the government of the United States and its health department will be introduced in Congress during the coming session with the hope that science may have the benefit of studying man in all his parts while he lives and can relate his sensations.

"This is not an unheard-of thing. In the sixteenth century human vivisection was practiced in Italy on condemned criminals, and it is but a few years ago that a man condemned to be shot in the Hawaiian Islands was inoculated with the virus of leprosy to demonstrate that the disease was infectious. This man died of the loathsome disease instead of from a bullet and he aided science by showing that leprosy was indeed infectious.

"Outside of these instances, however, human vivisection has never been practiced in medical science. Many persons in the United States are even opposed to the vivisection of dogs, rabbits, guinea pigs and rats. It was but last winter that the doctors had to rush down to Washington to prevent Congress from passing an anti-vivisection law in answer to the pleas of the Anti-Vivisection Society.

"'Vivisection of men condemned to death is just right,' said Dr. Charles G. Roehr, of Harvey Medical College. 'What is the benefit of dragging a man to the gallows or to the electric chair in this day and age? When once a man is executed by law he is of no use to anyone. He has lived a worthless life. He has taken the life of another or he has betrayed the country that gave him protection.

"'There is nothing so horrible in human vivisection if one but looks at it aright,' said Dr. Charles J. Whalen, of Rush Medical College, when asked about the new movement. 'I have openly advocated the scheme for several years. Even if we are not allowed to vivisect those who are condemned to die, we should at least be allowed to use them to experiment with as to the inoculation of certain diseases.

"'It is time that we had some returns from the outcasts of society. It would have to be fixed so that no one condemned under circumstantial evidence could be thus used. Only those caught red-handed or those who confessed to murder would be taken to the vivisection hospital. The desire for human vivisection is quite universal among members of the medical and surgical professions.'

"Dr. D. R. Brower, who has made considerable study of vivisection, said:

"'I am in favor of anything that will advance the knowledge of scientists. Vivisection of condemned criminals is desirable, but I fear that it is impracticable at present. I am afraid we will stir up the anti-vivisectionists. It is true that it would be a grand thing for science if we were permitted to study the organs of living men and it would no doubt make men hesitate more before they took life.'

"Dr. J. B. Murphy fears that the idea would appear too inhuman for the ordinary man."

Is it not time to inquire whether the education of the Medical Colleges does not tend to blunt human sympathies, harden or obliterate human feelings, and develop a cold bloodthirstiness that would shame even a savage race?

Did anyone ever read in the annals of savage warfare, of deeds of cruelty surpassing or even equaling the cruel torture these doctors would fain inflict upon helpless human beings delivered into their power?

There seems to be something in the regular course of study of medical science that tends to brutalize, not only, but also to beget an insane desire to cut and haggle the living human form, to perform "surgical operations," even to the risking of the lives of the victims.

In one instance, in Chicago, a husband, wiser than the "doctor," to protect his wife from one of these medical would-be "operators," threatened to shoot the physician, who was insistent that an "operation" be performed, even against the husband's will and wish. She expressed years ago, and that life, without any "operation," is still alive and well, and bids fair to live beyond the ordinary age.

How often we read of a "successful operation" having been performed—and if the patient speedily dies—why it was a "successful operation," all the same—and it is blazoned in the newspapers and medical journals as such.

There is such delight to cut and carve in the name or for the sake of medical science!

Readers of the daily papers have recently been regaled with accounts of the deaths of more than a dozen children in St. Louis, from tetanus caused by antitoxin serum administered by "medical science," for the cure of diphtheria.

Now comes the following report:

"St. Louis, Mo., Dec. 10.—The second session of the tetanus inquiry commission, organized to fix the responsibility for thirteen deaths following the use of city antitoxin, was commenced this afternoon in Mayor Wells' office.

"Martin Schmidt, assistant city bacteriologist, declared that Dr. Armand Ravold, the city bacteriologist, had directed him on October 3 to prepare for distribution serum drawn from the horse Jim, which had been shot the day before because it had tetanus.

"'I knew,' the witness declared, 'that the serum was poisonous and unfit for human beings, but I felt that I could not question Dr. Ravold's order. So I went ahead and carried out the orders.'"

In view of the vivisection proclivities of the medical fraternity, as stated before, and the collateral case of the man in the Hawaiian Islands, who was "inoculated with the virus of leprosy to demonstrate that the disease was infectious," and who "died of the loathsome disease," and "aided science by showing that leprosy was indeed infectious"—in view of these and many other similar instances, the query naturally arises: Was this horrible affair of antitoxin poisoning in St. Louis, this wholesale slaughter of the defenseless innocents, enacted for the purpose of "aiding science?" The query is pertinent.

Years ago the writer of this rendered some slight assistance to the surgeons who cared for a poor boy, at Port Huron, Mich., who accidentally had his hand caught in the "scraper" of a planing machine. As the cylinder with its knives revolved, it drew him in and sliced his arm by degrees until it reached his shoulder and he could be drawn in no farther. The surgeons kindly administered anesthetics, so the poor boy might not be sensible of pain while they dressed his wound.

But vivisection—in the interest of medical "science"—must be done without the deadening influence of anesthetics. The victim must be in possession of all his natural sensitiveness to pain, while he is lacerated or carved piecemeal, and the terrible torture may continue during several days. It is so in the case of animals—horses, dogs, etc., and of course "criminals" could not expect their agony to be shortened—the cause of medical "science" demands the fullest quota of experimentation; the more prolonged the sufferer's agony, the greater the benefits to medical science, and the longer the miserable victim's life endures the torture, the greater the amount of cruel experimentation that can be practiced for the blessed sake of "science" and the gratification of the merciless desires of the doctors.

Better were it to fall into the hands of Fiji cannibals, who kill outright, roast and eat their victims—they do not murder their human prey by the slow and exquisitely cruel process of vivisection. Have the cannibals more kindness and humane feeling than these men of medical science? It would seem so. And be it understood that vivisection is but one of a dozen different forms of torture employed by vivisectionists.

It would be well for these scientific medical practitioners to devote a season to a study of the psychological effects of cruelty—especially in modes of punishment. The statistics of present and past times show that cruel punishments do not lessen crimes, and English history proves that when harshest punishments prevailed most crimes were committed; and that when humaner methods prevailed, crimes decreased. And why? It is psychologically true that harshness begets harshness; hatred begets hatred; cruelty begets cruelty; and there you have the solution of the matter, the reason for the failure of cruel punishments to accomplish the result intended.

Would it not be far better in every way if such criminals as these medical professors desire to vivisect, were considered as morally diseased, and consigned to an institution where under proper surveillance and instruction they would work for the State, and pay the expense of their keeping, and be medically, psychologically treated for the renovation of their moral defects?

Humane treatment tends to humanize; brutal treatment tends to brutalize.

It is probable that, if any one of these medical gentlemen were to undergo just a moiety—a taste of vivisection on his own physical body, he would speedily come to the conclusion that, after all, vivisection of human beings is not quite the right and proper thing. But would it not smack of what is called "poetic justice" if these men who so glibly favor vivisection of criminals were compelled to undergo the process themselves—"to advance the knowledge of scientists?" "It would be a grand thing for science."

Certainly, if these medical gentlemen are so eager to advance in medical science that they are "in favor of anything that will advance the knowledge of scientists," let them, by all means, practice vivisection, inoculation with the virus of leprosy and other diseases, upon themselves; let their experimentations with vile serums be upon their own sacred personal Perhaps even the Anti-Vivisection Society would not object to that.

It does not argue well for the observing powers of the practitioners of the "science," "art," or unconscionable humbug of "medicine," that, after thousands of years of medical experience, they do not know that the virus of leprosy is infectious, until they inoculate a healthy man with it, and he dies of the loathsome disease. They must demonstrate the fact by cruel experiment, before they know it. And so of other infectious diseases.

And not satisfied with practical observation of surgical cases from mishaps and accidents, they must needs take a sound and well human being, and cut and carve, dissect him alive, a long, cruel agony, so that these precious men of "medical science" may know something they ought to learn without this cruel vivisection, in their course of instruction in the medical school or college.

Naturally this practical experimentation on the bodies of living human beings must beget a cold, unfeeling indifference to human pain and suffering; just as the slaughter of animals at the stock-yards hardens the feelings of those engaged in the bloody work of slaughtering. Beside, there is the powerful incentive of prospective fat fees when it comes to performing "operations" upon unfortunate human beings, whether they live or die under the "operation."

It may be labor lost, but it is proper to remind these apparent medical relics of the Dark Ages that we are now living in the Twentieth Century; that old savage notions of punishment are now outgrown by civilized people; death by hanging, as a penalty for petty stealing, is a thing of the past; and "cruel and unusual punishments" are contrary to the genius of enlightenment and progression.

Except as an unlawful outburst of passion, or of a spirit akin to hellishness wreaking its heart-ess gratification upon the defenseless unfortunate, cruelty is shunned in the infliction of lawful punishments.

The burning of negroes at the stake, for crimes committed, has horrified many people; but roasting to death is a quick and merciful punishment compared with the slow torture and long drawn-out agony of death by vivisection.

The spirit of kindly humanitarianism is abroad in the civilized world, and winning its way into the hearts and minds and laws of all enlightened and cultured peoples; and it is not to be supposed that the humane progress and humane sentiment of an advanced moral and intellectual people will allow itself to be cast aside and trodden under foot for the sake of gratifying the cruel, inhuman, heartless propensities of a coterie of worse than ghoulish vivisectionists.

Dorothy Ann Roff.

Born to the higher life, January 17, 1902, Mrs. Dorothy Ann Roff, of Watseka, Ill., in her 77th year. Sister Roff was, as one of her city papers said, "a notable woman," famed for her sweet and gentle ways, her pure, womanly life, and not least, for her steadfast advocacy of her faith. For over forty years she, and her husband who survives her, have been pronounced Spiritualists, even when to be a Spiritualist was to subject one to almost social ostracism; yet she outlived all prejudice and created in the place of prejudice, a feeling of love and respect, almost of veneration in the minds of all who knew her. As the writer of the obituary in the paper I have mentioned, said, "During her illness her home was constantly visited by people from all parts of the city, representing every walk in life, who came to inquire after her condition, and if they could do aught to alleviate her distress." Death was caused by pneumonia, and came after a week of endurance. To the readers of The Progressive Thinker her name will be familiar as the mother of Mary Roff, so well known through the narrative of "The Watseka Wonder," that at the time created a world-wide interest. The birth-day services (we may not call them funeral, for there was nothing of the old-time gloom of such occasions) were on Sunday, January 19, at the old home, by the writer; and her mortal remains were given back to Mother Earth. It was a beautiful day, a seeming tribute to the beautiful life she had lived.

DOROTHY ANN ROFF.

Entered into life eternal, Friday morn, January 17, 1902.

The day dawned fair, the sun in splendor rose,
And with the dawning day and rising sun
(Type of a life auspiciously begun,
And of a life-work nobly, grandly done,)
She closed her eyes to mortal cares and woes
Which chilled her heart so oft—the heart that beat
In tender sympathy for all distress,
Or throbbed in rapturous joyousness.
When love and duty urged her eager feet
To some kind ministration of relief
For the unfortunate in pain or grief;
With cheering words and willing hands she gave.
Nor spared herself if she could help or save.
Her work is done, how bravely, nobly done!
Lamented and beloved—foes she had none—
A crown celestial adorns her brow;
With loved ones gone before she dwelleth now
In love, and joy, and peace, the victory won.
Sweet be her peace and joy, while souls distressed
Will bless her name and hold her mem'ry blessed.

IN RE MANGASARIAN AND THE BANGS SISTERS.

Differing Views of the Matter Are Held by Honest and Able Minds.

Their Course Approved.

To the Editor:—It is with pleasure I note the Bangs Sisters have declined to accept the wager of the gentleman who offers to bet that no writing can be produced on slates while he is holding said slates. Now it seems to me that the Bangs Sisters have, in their refusal, taken the wise and dignified course in the matter, for it goes without saying, that if this was an honest and earnest investigator, striving to learn the truth, he would proceed in an entirely different manner. The honesty and thoroughly demonstrated mediumship of the psychics in question is too widely known and well established to make it necessary for them to submit to such a test or resort to any such means as proposed. It is the similarity of the case that reminds me of the time when a Rev. Crumbine, from Cochranton, Pa., visited Cassadaga camp, with slates waxed and screwed together for the purpose of obtaining writing within the securely fastened slates, avowing that if such phenomena was produced he would proclaim the fact of independent slate-writing and the truth of Spiritualism to all the world.

Having a special interest in the experiment, I had charge of the slates and, after a public seance in the auditorium, held for the purpose of obtaining writing, with W. A. Mansfield as medium, I returned the slates to the reverend gentleman, with seals unbroken, per agreement. In brief, after the slates had been opened in the presence of the committee who sealed and riveted the same, and, after careful examination, being satisfied they had in no way been tampered with, and writing was found upon them, how did the reverend gentleman accept the demonstrated fact and fulfill his pledge by proclaiming the truth to all the world? He at first accepted the spirit origin of the writing, claiming, however, that it was from the devil! This aroused such a sentiment in his church that he was driven from this position to that of recanting, and later on claiming it was all a fraud.

Now I ask, did this effort on our part pay? Was it not "casting pearls before swine?"

While I will give all possible aid to honest investigators earnestly seeking for the truth, I would pay no attention to the bombastic gambler who wishes to prove this or that phenomenon may or may not be produced.

A. GASTON.

$500 Reward Offered!

In The Progressive Thinker of Jan. 11, I see a challenge from Mr. Mangasarian of $100 against $25 for the production of writing on blank sheets of paper placed between two slates, in the presence of the Bangs Sisters, Mr. M. to be allowed to place his hands at both ends of the slates.

Now, if what we have been taught about Spiritualism be true, then the perturbation of mind caused by a desire to earn the hundred dollars, or the fear of losing the twenty-five dollars, if the conditions were not right, might prevent any writing at the test trial, and yet these women be genuine mediums for independent writing under certain conditions.

If these women are frauds, then no one would be more pleased to find it out than I.

In The Progressive Thinker of last August 24 was published an article from my pen relating an experience of independent writing which I obtained in the presence of one of the Bangs Sisters at Lily Dale.

I went to that private seance, a total stranger to these women, with the full determination to find out how the trick was done, if it was a trick. I had been an amateur prestidigitator for over forty years and knew something about the conditions necessary for the successful accomplishment of tricks.

But I did not hint to the sisters that I was there looking for fraud or tricks, although in fact I was there wholly for that purpose; and therefore I did not vitiate at least one presumable necessary condition for good results if they really were genuine spirit mediums, by perturbing their mind with the idea that they were dealing with a fraud hunter.

At this sitting, in broad sunlight I placed my sealed envelope containing sheets of blank paper between the two slates and bound the slates together on every side and end with a long, stout cord, and then I kept the slates held tightly in my own hands till I untied them and took from between them my still sealed envelope, and with my knife cut it open and found the four sheets of paper which I had recently put inside the envelope in a blank condition, now filled with writing, the like of which appeared to be absolutely fresh. These sheets of paper I had taken with me from my own private stock of paper.

Now I have issued no challenge, but I have offered a reward of $500 to any one who will show me how the trick was done, if it be a trick.

So, that if Mr. Mangasarian feels certain, as his challenge implies, that the Bangs Sisters produce all of their independent writing by trickery, I hereby invite him to come after my $500, or shut up.

D. EDSON SMITH.

Santa Ana, Cal.

An Open Letter to the Bangs Sisters.

Ladies:—When several weeks ago I saw the challenge of Mr. Mangasarian in The Progressive Thinker, calling on you to prove the faith in yourselves—or in the spirit world—which uses you confessedly as its intermediaries to carry the "glad tidings" to the hungry world—when I saw this large, interrogation point of a noted thinker and leader—and the means of its presentation in the paper—large, open-faced, fearless type—I said, Christian Truscio, your faith is great. You are already has had the courage of his conviction in luxuriating in the prospects of an unhesitating acceptance, one which you could proudly display still more conspicuously. In a worldly way alone here will be an opportunity for one of those "scoops" which is heavenly manna to the progressive editor and publisher. But from a higher point of view, what a glorious chance to strengthen the cause. A Mangasarian swept into the fold by the irresistible logic of facts. Another Savage enthralled—a mighty object lesson to the scoffer and doubter."

This all was in my heart when I read the strong words, backed by the uncompromising stand of the editor. Aye, much more was read between the lines—but this must be unsaid.

Instead, I beheld what appeared! Would that invisible type had carried the message. Silence may be interpreted any way; but such expressions from the banner carriers of a mighty truth! In vision there came to me the multitude of martyrs who went forth to every form of torture, in order to carry their news to the needy. Did they wrap the saintly robe of "dignity" around their precious persons? Did they demand pretty speeches before they gave of their bounty? I look back and remember how Home invited every form of inquiry and investigation, how he courted and aided experimenters in every way possible. I bethought me of Henry Slade before he had besmirched himself, who offered to return to England to the home of his persecutor Lancaster, and stand the scrutiny of an avowed enemy. Did not Florence Cook put herself wholly into the power of the great Crookes? Within my immediate knowledge, did not Mrs. Simpson—peace to her sad, stricken soul—give Herrmann every opportunity of proving her a cheat? Did these (among a host of others similarly honest and earnest) attempt to conceal aught in a pitiful "dignity?"

These words are not dictated by any opposition to you as persons or mediums, as proof of which I once sent you one sitter to be convinced. It was one whose adherence to Spiritualism would prove no mean addition to its ranks—and who personally richly deserved a knowledge of its truth. My friend and I both begged the privilege of my presence during the seance. This request was refused. The sitter came away bewildered but not convinced. I have a full report of that seance.

Now, ladies, as to your queen-like, dignity-injured attitude toward an inquirer of the standing of a Mangasarian. But first I must tell you a story which is worrying my pen. Once upon a time there was a wire stretched between two distant cities. Peculiarly it had the gift of self-consciousness. Chance revealed the fact that under circumstances people in the one city could establish communication with those living in the other. The discovery was fraught with tremendous consequences to both cities. But a most curious thing happened. When the wire had secured many friends it became very purse-proud and arrogant. It demandeded a number of sneers and very soft words and entreaties to act as go-between. Dig—well, the story is long enough.

Now, ladies, let me dissect your words a bit. I quote: "1. Because we deem it beneath the dignity of a lady and below the plane of a spiritual medium to offer or accept a bet."

First let me agree with you heartily that Mr. Mangasarian was somewhat unwise in the wording of his challenge. But in it there was no more insult directed at you than one aimed at Mrs. Piper by the Psychical Society, when for years it dogged her every footstep and watched her like a criminal. She did not take refuge in insulted dignity. And what has she not done in convincing other Mangasarians.

If the challenge read foolishly, how did your declination sound? Truly it was far from turning one cheek when the other was smitten.

But far beyond the mere incident, is this your quarrel alone? What are you in the world for? As mediums, you do not in any manner belong to yourselves. Your duty and only duty lies in ever giving. I am not repeating the folly of saying that it shall be gratuitously! But when your price is offered—give. Give to the king or bootblack alike, but give in the manner of his wants. Answer doubts, not by abuse, but by facts, reason, tests. If you have gained wisdom from your experience you must know that the battle of convincement must be fought all over with every new comer. To convince the world, you must win over every member.

"3. We do not believe that to convert Mr. Mangasarian to belief in spirit phenomena would be any greater triumph for our cause than to convert the humblest member of his congregation."

Ladies, your dignity must indeed have been hard hit when you could pen such nonsense. Cut out Mr. Savage's (the Boston Mangasarian) contribution to "our cause," and you have dealt it a severe blow in this country. Your remark is so self-evidently absurd that I will not waste any more ink upon its discussion. When you have converted Mr. Mangasarian (and you surely will and must after this amiable prodding), you may say with satisfaction which is begotten by such an important deed, "Well done, good and faithful wire"—you may now go to the workshop for final repairs."

Your "secondly" does not deserve quotation. It is a confession of great weakness to harp so much on the word "bet." I have found that the crude earthly way of deciding sincerity is very valuable that is—by a bet. It does not sound a bit like an echo from the celestial sphere to hear the cold-blooded "put up or shut up." But I'll take my chances that Mr. Mangasarian is not wanting in those qualities that make manhood, and that once convinced he will "shut up" in his opposition as he offering to "put up." He means business; do you, likewise?

Admitting frankly that Mr. Mangasarian has some reasons for doubting the manifestations which occur through you. But what of it? The same doubts possess the minds of probably the majority of your sitters at first, but simply suppressed.

Ladies, let me suggest a way of enhancing your dignity, about a hundred fold. Just hurry and earn (not win) that hundred dollars. Then turn them in for the good of "the cause," as to help somebody who is in greater need than you. You will have the mighty host who partake of Brother Francis' weekly bounty applaud you in your good work. Not alone that, but you may also win over a champion to "the cause" whose influence might rival that of our noble Savage. Leave that audience decide whether it be not a greater deed to slay a general-in-chief than one of his lowly followers.

But, I hear the warning cry, "time." Now, listen, Misses Bangs. Let me dictate a letter which you surely will have inserted on the first page of the next paper, giving order to have it adorned in the largest and most conspicuous type of the printing establishment. Here it is:

Mr. Mangasarian:—Sir:—We have answered your "To Whom It May Concern" in a previous edition of this paper, as it seemed best to us, and in accordance with the spirit which apparently dictated your words. It was the implied suspicion of our work which justifiably embitters us. Upon maturer consideration we conclude that your knowledge of the laws of mediumship, or psychic phenomena, is of a kind which led to the harsh challenge as published. We do not blame you for that, but will say that the unprejudiced calmness of the earnest investigator is not a disturbing factor in such investigations. But betting, ungrounded suspicion (even though unexpressed) is a positive detriment to the highest or finest spiritual manifestations. Failure under the last condition is but too frequently, and wrongly, attributed to a flaw in the medium. We will charitably infer that you have been misinformed concerning our methods. Had you come as any ordinary seeker, we would cheerfully have given you all opportunity to convince yourself. We will forget the warmth of our feelings in behalf of the greater needs of others, and meet you half way. But as you have doubted us, it is perfectly fair that you suffer under a similar imputation—if your words were inspired by anything but direct and exact knowledge. Hence we make you this offer: You are to attend as many seances as may be necessary to build a positive judgment upon. These may be at our home or any mutually designated place. You will be given every opportunity of learning the exact truth concerning our mediumship, premising that although you may not be satisfied, yet such a disappointment shall not bias you against the truth of Spiritualism. But if the little stone from our sling shall pierce the armor of your skepticism, then shall you so publicly acknowledge.

We do not make this proposition in a desire for self glorification, nor even of vindication; but to remove whatever prejudice we can in you against Spiritualism. Very Truly,

THE BANGS SISTERS.

Ladies, there are no "triumphs" involved—no bets taken notice of—no dignity under consideration. It is simply a question of bringing home the truth to Mr. Mangasarian, to satisfy all of your well-wishers, to do justice to the editor of this goodly journal, and above all things to bring the truth of Spiritualism more authoritatively before the world. A refusal to reconsider your words can have but one interpretation.

JOSEPH SINGER.

Woman as a Political Factor.

The news papers are discussing with a good deal of earnestness the value of women in political campaigns. Many of the journals which are opposed to woman suffrage, do not hesitate to praise the women, and tell them how they contribute to the success of municipal reform by their addresses and other political labors. But these newspapers are simply putting weapons into the hands of the suffragists. It will not be long before the ladies will not be satisfied with doing much of the hard work, and at the same time be denied the privileges of citizens.

If women may raise the sinews of war, make speeches, drum up the derelict on election day, all the horrible talk of the "antis" about the women going into politics goes into thin air. If women may do everything in politics but vote without being unsexed, or upsetting the social order, having the suffrage would produce none of the prophesied calamities.

Surely all of the logic is with the suffragists, and they will not be slow to use it. All women who care to be in politics can easily get in, and nothing can stop the women folks from going the whole figure.—New York Defender.

SPIRIT RETURN.

Interesting Personal Experience.

Since reading Brother Chesney's article in No. 633 of The Progressive Thinker, I have decided to follow his example and tell what I actually know about spirit return.

Twelve years ago this winter we moved into a nice frame house, situated at about 29th and Vine streets, Kansas City, Mo. The house contained eight rooms, besides several closets; was nicely finished throughout and nearly new. It stood (and I presume still stands) on the east side of the street. The front door opened into a hall; from the hall one door opened at the left into the parlor, another at the end of the hall into the sitting room, the stairway being on the right.

I think it was about the 10th of December that my mother came to visit me. The men were out of town doing some contract work, and it was decided that she would remain with me and my little boy, nine years old, till they returned. She was a member of the Christian church. We knew nothing whatever, about Spiritualism.

We conversed on general topics till about 9 o'clock that evening, when we retired. I had made mother's bed on a folding lounge in the parlor which was separated from my room by curtains. The upper rooms were vacant, not an article of any kind being in any of them; but for some reason one of the closet doors had been removed from its hinges by a former occupant and leaned against the wall. No sooner had our conversation ceased than that door fell, making a sound on the bare floor loud enough to be heard across the street.

Of course we were thoroughly aroused and wondered what caused it to fall. We had no cat, but mother said a cat must have got in some way. Pretty soon a sound began like a large marble rolling on the floor just above us. That continued about five minutes and was followed by numerous bodies, seemingly of various weights, moving about in those empty rooms. We arose and went up stairs, seeing nothing but the door lying on the floor.

We went down to the pantry, got some flour and a sieve, dusted it over the floor and stairway behind us as we descended.

We again went to bed, but had hardly lain down when sounds began like at least two persons walking about upstairs in stocking feet. Their footsteps were so plain and real that we arose at once, dressed and went to the kitchen and made a fire in the stove. We shut the door and could not hear the noises then so plainly, so seated ourselves as comfortably as possible and began discussing the matter, mother trying hard to make a scientific explanation, an electric plant being near gave her a basis for her reasoning.

All at once a revel began in the room directly above us that would have turned my hair white on the instant, if such phenomena is possible, had mother been a woman of less courage. There seemed to be several persons in stocking feet, running about. They threw heavy bodies, wrestled and seemed to move furniture about the room. Finally one started hurriedly down stairs. The stairway creaked as though it were a large person of great agility. The doors were all locked. Mother actually looked triumphant as she exclaimed, "Now we've got him." She immediately started toward the sitting-room door. I took up a heavy lamp and followed. She unlocked and cautiously opened the door. No one—nothing to be seen. We returned to the kitchen where we sat till 3 a. m., now both thoroughly convinced that we were in a "haunted" house. The performance ended about 2:30 by a chair about two feet from where mother sat being taken up and thrown violently across the room, right before our astonished eyes.

There was not a print of any kind in the flour next morning. It lay as smoothly over the floor and stairs as though not the slightest disturbance had been made.

We had relatives in town to whom we went next day. Mother returned to her home in Quenemo, Kans., and now comes the strongest part of my story.

About a week after her return to her home, she retired early on a certain evening, being an invalid. My father was reading to her, as was his custom, when he was interrupted by a rap on the door. He arose and opened it. No one was there. He returned and resumed his reading with a remark about being mistaken, when a very distinct rap came again. Promptly opening the door again, he saw no one; the moon was shining. No one was in sight. He closed the door and stood for a moment with his hand on the knob; the raps came again with some violence. He went out, looked on the roof and all about the place, but saw no one.

He and mother were alone; he could not believe anyone would attempt a practical joke. He was a Christian gentleman, retired in manner, and did not believe in spirit return. Being a man of deep thought and broad general culture, of course he did not believe in a personal devil, so he was naturally very much bewildered.

The occurrences that evening were the beginning of a series of phenomena that was widely published at the time, and finally taken up by the Psychical Research Society, so I will not go into details about it here.

Numerous skeptical investigators went to the house, but were all alike unable to account for the occurrences they witnessed.

The most wonderful demonstrations imaginable, such as moving furniture in broad daylight, right in the presence of several people, and taking articles entirely away from the house, were kept up till just before mother's death, which happened about a year after the occurrences began.

My father died last winter a firm believer in Spiritualism. I have in my possession many of his letters telling me of mother's visits to him after her death.

REMARKS BY THE PRESIDENT.

The Godless and Devilless Club Moving Along Lines of Least Resistance.

A Methodist Minister Says Prof. Pearson Ought to Be Skinned Alive and His Hide Hung On a Barn Door and Salted.

As President of the Godless and Devilless Club I wish to state that on the 26th day of January, there was a congress of leading Freethinkers in Cincinnati, Ohio, to organize an antisectarian society for the promotion and promulgation of true governmental and social principles, with but one plank in its platform—the complete separation of church and state, the idea being to work for an absolute divorce of religion from the state, and to educate the people of America to be as liberal towards one another as their noble constitution allows. A great many people labor under the false idea that ours is "a Christian country," and that Christians should have the right to dictate the course which our government should pursue in regulating the conduct of its subjects. We want to emphasize the statement which George Washington made in his treaty with Tripoli, that "this is not a Christian government," and to say, emphatically, that Christians, as such, have no more right than any other sect to dictate the political or social affairs of our nation. The founders of our republic were not Christians and this irrefutable fact is corroborated by the liberal spirit and letter of our famous constitution. No such liberal and just document could have come from the Christian church because it could not, by reason of its self-exalted position in the world, as the only infallible teacher, of truth and morals, give either religious or social liberty to those whom she counts unbelievers. It is a remarkable fact, that since this government was founded by unbelievers, religious persecution has been rare. It is the desire of the founders of the new liberal organization to remove every cause of illiberality between sect and sect and to show by the principles of science and right reason that no sect has any authority to rule over the rest. It is the function of a just government to maintain order and to see that one class does not unduly impose upon another. The government of the United States should not allow the Christians to rob their fellow men by having their church property exempt from taxes. This is unjust from the governmental standpoint and unmanly from that of the Christian. "By their fruits" just men are known. The Christian church has for a long time exalted itself above all else, but, in the order of evolution, the indisputable evidence has come to view that it is merely one of the world's religions with a philosophy for ethical purposes, that its dogmas are based upon legends and fables, and that it cannot produce the "divine revelation" which it claims to possess, nor the "divine commission" which it claims it received from its alleged savior of the world. A paper was read at the Cincinnati congress showing the beginning of the end of the great eccleastical delusion and the inauguration of a new era of the reign of truth for authority in the place of the Christian authority for truth. Although our constitution allows the freedom of the press, yet the Christians ignore that noble characteristic, by which the masses can be liberally educated, by keeping the editors thereof in fear of losing their support. Why? Because Christianity fears the light of day; it dares not put its superstitions in touch with science and right reason.

Christians have had the presumptuous effrontery to brand Freethinkers "infidels," but we now have the undisputable evidence that they are necessary factors in the work of uprooting superstition. There is not an ecclesiastical dogma which they have disputed but what is false.

The last meeting of the Godless and Devilless Club was intensely interesting. The experience of Brother Hastings opened up an entirely new field of thought to many. The declaration of the wise sage that accompanied him, that a radical disbelief in the existence of a God was no bar whatever to entering the realms of bliss, and that a mere belief in such being without accompanying virtues, was no surety that a person would be happy on entering the spirit world, was received enthusiastically by the members. There is no doubt whatever but that the belief in the existence of a God has proved greatly detrimental to the advancement of mankind generally. Just for example, listen to the following as presented by one of the honored members of the Club, "demonstrating" from the Bible the peculiar features of the orthodox God:

Face: For I have seen God's face.—Genesis 22:30; Deut. 31:18; Jeremiah 31:10, 16: 17; Chron. 7: 15.

Mouth: For the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it.—Isaiah 58:14.

Eyes: I will set mine eyes on them for evil.—Amos 9:4; Zachariah 4:10.

Teeth: He hath broken my teeth with gravelstones.—Lamentations 3.16.

Ears: And my cry did enter his ears.—II. Samuel 22:7; II. Cor. 13:20.

Arms: Oh! arm of the Lord.—Jeremiah 32:21; Isaiah 5:19.

Hands: I took the cup at the Lord's hands, and made all the nations drunk.—Jeremiah, 25:11, 32:21; Ezek. 21:7; Isaiah 51:22, 5:1.

Wings: He shall fly and spread his wings.—Jeremiah 49:22; Psalms 91:4.

Feet: And his feet shall stand in that day.—Zachariah 14:4; Nahum 1:3.

Feathers: He shall cover thee with his feathers.—Psalms 91:4.

Hair: The hair of his feet.—Isaiah 7;20.

Talked: The Lord said the man has become as one of us.—Genesis 3:22.

The Lord had Sons: The sons of God saw that the daughters of men were fair.—Genesis 6:2.

God had grandchildren: The daughters of men had children by sons of God.—Genesis 6:4.

Got weary and rested: The Lord rested on the seventh day.—Genesis 2:2.

Was a planter: The Lord planted a garden.—Genesis 2:8.

Was a tailor: The Lord made coats of skin.—Genesis 3:21.

Was an engraver: I will engrave the engravings thereof saith the Lord.—Zachariah 3:2.

Was a barber: In the same day shall the Lord shave with a razor.—Isaiah 7: 20.

A warrior; Saith the Lord, I will appoint the sword to slay, the dogs to tear, the fowls of the air, and the beasts of the field to destroy. Jeremiah 15:3; Deut. 32:41; Ezek. 21:3.

Bow, quiver and arrows: He hath bent his bow; he has caused the arrows of his quiver.—Lamentations 3:13; Chron. 15: 13; Isaiah 34:6.

Plurality of Gods: Thou shalt not revile the Gods.—Exodus 22:28; Gen. 1:26, 6:2; Job 2:1.

Cry and roar: The like as the young lion roareth on his prey.—Isaiah 31:4, 42:16; Amos 1:2; Joel 3:16; Hosea 11:12.

Tread and trample: I will tread them in anger, and trample in my fury.—Isaiah 63:3.

A druggist: I took the Lord's cup at the Lord's hands and made all the nations drunk.—Jeremiah 25:11.

Fierce anger: The Lord slew seventy thousand men because David numbered the people.—II. Samuel 24:15: 11. Chron. 18:22; Prov. 15:11; Isaiah 13:9, 3:42; Lamentations 2:4.

God's vengeance: In the days of God's vengeance the streams shall be turned into pitch, the dust into brimstone, and the land shall become burning pitch.—Isaiah 34:3-9, 43:28, 53:10; Jeremiah 6:11, 13:13, 66:16, 19:9; I Kings 22:22; Samuel 18:10.

The Lord swears: I swear by myself.—Jeremiah 22:5.

Fierce anger: And the peaceful habitations are cut down because of the fierce anger of the Lord.—Jeremiah 25:31, 44:27, 51:27; Lamentations 12:4, 2:6, 5:11; Ezek. 9:6, 9:10.

Furious: I will gather you in my anger and in my fury melt you.—Ezek. 22:20, 25:15, 38:22; Hosea 13:7, 13:8; Jonah 2:2, 2:10; Zachariah 9:14, 14:3; Malachi 1:4, 2:3.

The Lord's furnace: The Lord whose fire is in Zion, and whose furnace is in Jerusalem.—Isaiah 31:9.

Images: You shall make of your emerods images, and images of your mice, and give glory to the God of Israel.—I. Samuel 6:5, 6:4, 6:11; Judges 15: 15.

Human sacrifices: And did according to the vow we—I. Samuel 6:5, 6:4, 6:11; Judges 15:15.

will offer it up for a burnt offering.—Judges 11:29, 30, 31.

This presentation of the Bible view of God is certainly worthy of careful consideration, as it reflects the hideous ignorance of past ages, and illustrates the nature of a God.

The world should at first advance along the lines of least resistance, in its efforts to reach a higher plane. That is what the electric current does when it emerges fom a dark, threatening storm cloud, and strikes a magnificent church—God's church, so called—passing from the steeple, and following the lines of least resistance, it demolishes the pulpit, and then passes into the earth, stopping its career of carnage, madness and death, no one knows exactly when.

The Godless and Devilless Club is constantly moving in its onward march to higher and better conditions along lines of least resistance. All the potent forces of the universe move in that way, and why should not the Godless and Devilless Club pattern thereafter? To move in accordance with the Bible God is moving along lines of greatest resistance, for the obstacles to be overcome there in the search for grand and beautiful truths, is so great that millions have crippled themselves in the course of their herculean efforts, resulting in the formation of hundreds of different sects, who in times past fought each other like fierce gladiators, who burned hundreds who antagonized them, confined some in dark, pestilential dungeons, applied hot irons to others, and slowly tortured many who are searching for truth in other directions and along different lines. It is not difficult to discern the bright lines along which the Godless and Devilless Club is moving—along lines of least resistance, having completely obliterated from its code of belief all the Gods on the earth plane that have ever been originated by mortal man, for all Gods are simply man-made, fashioned in a rudimentary way, built up step by step by ignorance, superstition, bigotry, and intolerance, and are so many obstacles in the way of the advancement of humanity, making the lines of least resistance to progress, entirely outside of them. Remove all the Gods, all the crucified saviors, all the Devils, all the Apostles and all sacred Bibles from your code of belief, then you can move along lines of least resistance to the higher realms. This is exactly what the Godless and Devilless Club is now doing. It has none of the rubbish of medieval times carefully blended into a God, to contend with.

It has no man-made saviors to revere or cherish.

It has no fossillized Bible with its absurdities and contradictions.

It has no method of baptism to insure a person against hell-fire.

It has no salaried minister to interpret the "holy" Scripture and render confusion more confused. Hence the Godless and Devilless Club can move along the lines of least resistance, and is far ahead of all the religious sects in its onward march towards the higher spheres.

The various religious sects at the present time seem to be in a disturbed condition. Not quite bold enough to unite with the Godless and Devilless Club, they make haste slowly by demolishing the Bible.

Biblical stories of miracles are branded as incredible fancies—tares among wheat—modern preaching is denounced as cowardly, and Sunday-schools are pronounced inadequate and almost farcical in an article published by Professor Charles W. Pearson, professor of English literature at Northwestern university. Professor Pearson maintains that the Bible errs in many points, and that belief in Biblical infallibility is a superstitious and harmful tradition. The subject of the article is "Open Inspiration Vs. a Closed Canon and Infallible Bible."

He sets forth that "modern preaching lacks truth and power because so many churches cling to an utterly untenable tradition that the Bible is an infallible book. This dogma is the preacher's besetting sin. It is the palpable lie that gives the ring of insincerity to all their moral exhortations. If theologians wish to retain their lost intellectual leadership, or even to possess an influence upon the thoughtful part of the community, co-ordinate with poets, philosophers, and men of science, they must throw aside the dogma of an infallible Bible as completely and as frankly as Protestants have thrown aside the dogma of an infallible Pope.

"The Bible is the most precious of all books. It is a noble collection of law, history, biography, precept and poetry, but the great spiritual treasure of the Bible is in an earthen vessel, and the water of life has been colored by the medium which has preserved it. The credulous and the ignorant disciple, the allegorist and the poet, the priest and the scribe, in their efforts to expound and popularize religious truth, have all more or less clogged and corrupted the spiritual message of the prophets, and our teachers must frankly recognize this fact.

"Let us look at a few examples of tares among the Bible wheat.

"There is a story in the book of Daniel that Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, for refusing to bow down to the image of a Babylonian king were cast into a burning fiery furnace, the flames of which slew those that threw them into it, and yet fire had no power upon the three. He must be a very bold or very ignorant man who will assert that he believes that this account is literally true. It is certainly a thousand times more probable that it is a legend or an allegory.

"We read in the book of Kings that Elijah was fed by the ravens. We read in that quaint medieval book, 'The Voyages and Travels of Sir John Mandeville,' a story similar to this. Both are poetic fancies, one as untrue and incredible as the other. We read that Elijah smote the water with his mantle and they divided hither and thither so that he and his companions went over on dry ground. He is said to have miraculously multiplied meal and oil, and even to have raised the dead.

"With his successor, Elisha, the mythmaking fancy has been even more active. He, too, was said to have power over the elements. He divided the waters with his mantle and went over Jordan dry-shod, he made iron to swim, he multiplied a widow's single pot of oil until it filled many vessels. He, too, raised the dead. Some of these stories are crude and childish, some are pathetic and sublime, but they are all alike legendary and not historic.

"It is impossible to draw any line between these alleged miracles in the Old Testament and similar accounts in the gospels or the Acts of the Apostles. When a gate opens of its own accord to let Peter through, we think of the story of Elisha and the ax that he made to swim.

"When Jesus is represented as multiplying loaves and fishes to feed a great multitude, we think of the widow's barrel of meal multiplied by Elijah and the cruse of oil increased by Elisha. When Jesus is represented as walking on the lake of Gennesaret we think of Moses dividing the Red sea, and of Elijah and Elisha cleaving the waters of Jordan. The story of the raising of the son of the widow of Nain by Jesus recalls the story of the raising of the son of the Shunamite woman by Elisha. The legendary element is as obvious and as indisputable in the New Testament as in the Old.

"Every message from heaven comes to us colored and shaped and limited by some man's personality, and must be discarded or altered or supplemented, according to the new knowledge and needs of men. The great spiritual teachings of the Bible rest upon absolute and eternal truth, but its history and science are always imperfect and often erroneous. Only the most ignorant still believe in witchcraft and demoniacal possession. Geology and biology have shown the story of the creation in Genesis is poetic and not scientific. The church cannot afford to uphold primitive conceptions which are opposed by every school book on the subjects in question, or the barbarous ethics which are condemned by every moralist and legislator.

"Religious teachers cannot safely oppose or ignore sciences. The evasion and suppression of truth, if persisted in, becomes mere priestcraft and imposture, and leads to the decay and death of any church that permits it. Miracles of the class mentioned, once a help, are now a hindrance.

"These churches which continue to teach that such legends, errors, and allegories are literal truth, taint all the rest of their message. It is the cowardly refusal of the churches to admit patent facts and to advance with the advance of knowledge that has brought about the low moral state of the nation that depends so largely upon them for spiritual guidance and strength. Wise men will accept the truth from any source. If Christians were ready to learn from infidels when the infidels are right there would be less infidelity in the world. Infidels would accept our truth if we would accept theirs, but when they see us mistaken and unreasonable in some very plain and simple matters they are less likely to trust our wisdom and sincerity in more important concerns.

"Jesus told the scribes and Pharisees that they had made 'the word of God of none effect through their tradition.' Very many of our religious teachers of to-day are doing the same thing. Modern preaching lacks truth and power because so many churches cling to the utterly untenable tradition that the Bible is an infallible book. This dogma is their besetting sin. It is the golden calf of their idolatrous worship. It is the palpable lie that gives the ring of insincerity to all their moral exhortations.

"If theologians wish to regain their lost intellectual leadership or even to possess an influence on the thoughtful part of the community co-ordinate with that of poets, philosophers, and men of science, they must throw aside the dogma of an infallible Bible as completely and frankly as Protestants have thrown aside the dogma of an infallible Pope."

Here we have a professor in a leading university—one of the best in the United States—extending a hand over the sectarian chasm, and in many resepects uniting with the Godless and Devilless Club, in its grand reformatory work.

But here comes the saddest part, making every member of our Club blush with shame. Elder Hardin makes a proposition to skin Prof. Pearson and hang his hide upon the barn door:

"No sane man will make the statements accredited to Professor Pearson. We, as ministers of the Methodist Episcopal church, should not stand idly by without uttering a protest against the sayings of this man. He has done more harm to Northwestern University and its future progress than we can estimate at the present time.

"SHALL WE LET HIM SLAP US IN THE FACE AND SAY NOTHING? NO. HE OUGHT TO BE SKINNED AND HIS HIDE HUNG UPON THE BARN DOOR AND SALTED."

This meeting of the club was particularly interesting and instructive, and the remarks of the president were listened to in rapt attention, and as he read Elder Hardin's statement that Prof. Pearson should be "skinned and his hide hung upon the barn door and salted," it created a profound sensation.

HIGH SCRIBE.

"A SERMON."

A Kindly Criticism of Rev. M. J. Savage's Discourse.

To the Editor:—It has never before been my good fortune to read a sermon from any divine, notwithstanding I have read many, that was nearly so strong in common sense as this. I desire to thank the noted gentleman for uttering it, and the editor of this paper for publishing the same. It is worthy of the most careful study; of being read and re-read.

Speaking of some thing, some principle, some power, some being, that is everywhere concealed in nature, he says, "This power has given us life and is therefore, whatever more it may be, our Father." Not in the sense of our ordinary use of this word, however. What could give us life but life itself? That my life, or soul, or whatever it may please one to call it, is a part of the universal ocean of life that pervades the limitless universe I have no doubt.

As I understand it, life is an elemental principle or, more properly, principles that are everywhere present wherever space and matter exist, and therefore limitless; and that our souls are but polarized atoms within that boundless ocean. By no means is it reasonable for me to believe that all life is the same life. From my careful study of this matter I am forced to the conviction that there is one elemental principle of life which being polarized under suitable conditions produces man; and another elemental principle that produces a horse; another an oak tree, etc.

Why should there not be as great a variety in the universe of life as in the universe of matter, and likely greater?

This fact, if a fact, does away with any farther search after missing links, and confines the law of evolution within what seems to me its proper limits. How the law of evolution can change one elemental into another elemental is strangely miraculous to me.

That the law of unfoldment and infoldment can change the form, eliminate imperfections and reject alloys, I can readily comprehend and fully understand; and to me this is the complete scope and function of this law.

He farther says: "This power has produced not only the beasts of the field, but only the lowest forms of animality, but brains like that of Shakspeare, and spiritual natures like that of Jesus." We know that the law of evolution in its effects vibrates, swings forward and backward as a pendulum as circumstance and environment, favorable or otherwise, may control. But it has never yet evolved a mouse into an elephant, nor retrograded an elephant into a mouse. Much less has it evolved from the radiata a man, or driven man back into the purely animal type.

I can understand how a dullard and an intellect like Shakspeare's can be evolved from the same elemental principle, where the type-form and characteristics differ only in degree. But to wholly change the type-form and general characteristics both mental and physical is an astounding proposition that I refuse to believe without positive proof.

Such considerations lead me to conclude that all life is not the same life. That this great universal ocean of life is made up of varied elementals and more than likely of many compounds, as in the material universe; each seeking an expression in material form when surrounded by such conditions as will polarize, or personalize, its varied atoms. This hypothesis rationally accounts for the variety of material forms as well as mental attributes.

Again he says, "In the next place we are compelled to think of this power as omnipotent." That is "this power" or life principle, or substance, is the directing agent of the universe. Further, "Not only is this Being (life, principle or substance) omnipotent, it is eternal. We cannot dream of a beginning or an end."

"In the next place," he says, "we have come to know that the power is one." I cannot understand by this last remark that the distinguished divine means that the "power" is one as we are one, but rather in its endless chain of cause and effect.

"Once more," he says, "we are compelled to think of this power as intelligent." Upon this proposition I entertain ideas widely divergent from my esteemed author. To me it has of late appeared that intelligence, love and the moral principle, as well as our other passions are attributes of personality and have no place in universal being or status. That the thing which approaches nearest and perhaps in some way allied to intelligence is law, nature's law. But that it is infinitely superior to intelligence, so superior that its action under the conditions are universally the same. Intelligence embraces comprehension and facts, while nature's law is above both comprehension and facts. Nature's law is the great commander of the universe acting from within outward, while intelligence acts from without inward. Nature's law is the governing function or attribute of this life principle and may bear the like relation to this universal principle as intelligence bears to a finite being, except that the mode of action is reversed.

Being an attribute of infinity, natural law acts without direction or consideration, or consciousness; as our circulatory and breathing systems act; overriding even our intelligence or conscious will power.

Under this hypothesis I see no use of intelligence in a universal substance or being, for it could in no wise change its higher attribute of law; neither could love or any other passion belonging to finite and intelligent beings belong to it, for they would be inoperative. To it all is good.

Man is in the habit of endowing universal principles and all pervading spirit with the same attributes that he possesses, not considering that it is the difference in attributes or qualities that distinguishes one from the other as well in the spirit world as in the material world. To me this seems strangely illogical and unsatisfactory.

A personal God would naturally be endowed with like attributes as other personal beings of a high order and with reason. And as man's highest attributes are intelligence, love, etc., man has always endowed his self-created personal gods with all of his qualities.

It is before the shrine of such a mythical personal god that the worshipers bow, cringe, praise, flatter and call upon for help, in our churches of today, however much they may declare to the contrary.

Their conception and comprehension of a universal ocean of life or spirit, that is wanting in the attributes of intelligence, love, hate and other qualities that pertain to finite beings; that knows no moral code, because morality cannot apply to it and only applies to man or such beings as men, is so indefinite that they dismiss the study of the subject, content to continue their worship of the god of the hateful and cruel ancients whose supposed attributes are much like their own.

But I am happy to observe, that even in our churches, this abomination of a the reason of the dawning twentieth century; and that such minds as are possessed by such men as the Rev. Minot J. Savage, are departing from the old, worn-out ways, happy if they to conclude therefrom that all of its attributes that power that governs all.

All attributes, sensations and aspirations that pertain to man would be wholly useless to the spirit of life that pervades the universe for the most obvious reason that it could not exercise them; and nature perpetuates no useless and unnecessary attributes or forms.

The attribute of inherent law, whatever it may be, supercedes and does away with all these lesser and imperfect attributes in this universal life ether. This natural law is inherent in and co-equal with this life substance that pervades all space, while intelligence is something that is acquired. And while we are a polarized part of this life substance it is not necessary to conclude therefrom that all of it attributes are the same as ours.

To illustrate; water may be changed into steam, when we find its attributes wholly changed; and again into ice, and the attributes of ice and steam are no more alike than the attributes of man and this universal life substance.

Further on he says, "We know, beyond all question, that the universe is on the side of goodness." I should say that the universe, as a whole knows or is nothing but good. That evil, as we understand it, appertains exclusively to sentient, conscientious, finite beings, such as man, whose condition is being evolved toward a perfect state of society; as of living together so that no one may enjoy any greater or better privileges than any other and that each one may enjoy every privilege that may not in some way abridge the rights of others.

To me it seems self-evident that a finite being could not offend an infinite being; much less do anything contrary to its laws. We may violate the laws of man, no matter how intelligently formed, as by stealing our neighbor's horse, or assaulting his person. But we cannot violate a law of nature. If we jump off a precipice it is the law of nature that we will be hurled into the chasm below; so that the law is not violated but verified.

A finite being can no more offend an infinite being and violate its laws than he could cut out a chunk of space or them and convert them to his own use and benefit.

Wrong and evil are referable entirely to finite beings. To the boundless universals all is good. Again wrong and evil are referable to the laws and conduct of finite beings as exercised and entered into between themselves; and here intelligence and conscience play a very conspicuous and important part.

Man was not brought into existence through the operation of thought exercised by a universal life substance or principle, but by the operation of some law inherent in and attribute to that universal life principle.

Thought is correlated to intelligence. In other words, thought cannot exist without intelligence, nor can intelligence exist without thought. Neither are necessary to natural law; while both are necessary to finite law. For this reason I conclude that both intelligence and thought are unnecessary to a universal life principle, as I and my worthy author assume this unknowable substance or spirit to be.

Some may think that the consensus of all intelligence amounts to natural law. But this law would be supre-propositions I have reasoned out, and I therefore reject it, and hold to the belief that law is as much superior to, and as radically differing from intelligence as an infinitude is radically different from a finite being. My god is therefore all good, because it cannot conceive of evil—has never thought of punishments and rewards, because it is not necessary for it to think—acts not by thought and intelligence but by law, certain and perfect.

Natural law is coeval with and inherent in all of the infinitudes of space and time, and therefore not subject to the finite axiom that you may not have a law without a law-maker, which only applies to the laws of man or some other finite being.

Such sermons are of incalculable worth in the unfoldment of man's intellectual and moral nature, and I trust that the reverend gentleman will give us many such.

OCCULT MYSTERIES.

OCCULT PHENOMENA.

Startling Spirit Manifestations That Occurred Many Years Ago.

THE BELL WITCH MYSTERY—ONE OF THE TRADITIONS OF ROBERTSON COUNTY CONCERNING WHICH THE PEOPLE SPECULATE TO THIS DAY—AN ENTIRELY ORIGINAL GHOST WAS THIS, FOR IT HELD CONVERSATIONS WITH FAMILY.

In the year 1817, with the beautiful scenery of Robertson county, near the Red river, began to appear certain occult phenomena which to this day remain a tradition in the county, and even through a great part of the state, known as the Bell witch mystery, says a Chattanooga letter in the Philadelphia Times.

In 1804, John Bell, his wife, several children and some slaves removed to Red river from South Carolina, purchasing there 1,000 acres of rich land. Bell's daughter, Bessie, a winsome and beautiful girl, was sent to the best schools of the neighborhood, received a splendid education and was one of the belles of the county.

For thirteen years the family lived in peace. Then came two strange premonitions of evil, which were followed by the manifestations, the very telling of which to-day raises the hair of Robertson county children in terror.

Mr. Bell was one day walking through a cornfield with his gun, looking for rabbits. In front of him he saw a curious animal, which looked like a cross between a dog and a fox. Bell fired, the range was point-blank and he could have sworn he hit him, for he was a good shot. The strange animal, however, never moved, but after the smoke cleared away looked at Bell with a malicious aspect, gave what seemed to be a bark, but in which lurked a sound like human laughter, and then turned and hopped away. Several days later Bell's son, Drew, saw a large turkey near the house. He ran in for his gun. When he returned the supposed turkey had assumed a large, strange and terrifying shape, black as a crow and of tremendous proportions and then flew away with a loud whirr of wings.

The spirit manifestations which followed consisted at first of rappings on the door and walls of the house. Later the rappings were heard in all parts of the house and sounds like rats gnawing at the bed posts, changing in a few months to sounds like the noise of trace chains being dragged over the floor, disturbed the family at night. As soon as a candle was lighted, the sounds ceased. Mr. Bell, too, began to suffer at night a strange malady. His tongue stiffened and his cheeks protruded. He felt as if a small stick had been placed with great force against his mouth.

For a long time the distracted family were too proud to tell of their affliction. At last the state of affairs became unendurable and accordingly James Johnson and his wife were invited to pass a night in the house. After the story of their affliction had been told Mr. Johnson led the Bells in prayer, asking that the manifestations should cease, or at least that there should be an explanation of the mystery. After Mr. Johnson and his wife had gone to bed the familiar noises were heard in their room and the bed clothing was snatched from them. The next morning Mr. Johnson advised the Bells to make their trouble public. This was done.

It was not long afterwards that the most characteristic mark of the strange spirit made its appearance. It began to speak. The voice was low, almost a whisper, like a weak, childish treble. The Rev. James Gunn, an itinerant preacher, soon afterward investigated the now well-known spirit, and it was to him that the spirit revealed itself as "old Kate Butts' witch." Kate Butts was an eccentric, voluble woman, the wife of a respected neighbor of the Bells, who had had in life a sarcastic tongue. To Mr. Gunn the spirit said that she had determined to torment "old Jock Bell out of his life" because of a fancied slight to Mrs. Butts while she was living. From that time the invisible spirit or witch was known as Kate.

With time Kate's voice grew stronger, and her favorite utterance was a repetition of Mr. Johnson's prayer the night he visited the Bells home and the singing of a hymn which the family had then used. Mr. Johnson, Kate called "old Sugarmouth," and she was fond of saying, "How sweet old Sugarmouth prays. How I love to hear him." The voice seemed to come from near the ceiling and at first generally at dusk.

Some time later Kate began to play a new part. The voice would tell of events which had happened in that part of North Carolina where the Bells had lived. The news was invariably accurate and always a month or two in advance of what reached the Bells by letter or human word of mouth later.

At this same time an estimable young man, the school teacher, Joshua Gardner by name, was courting Bessie Bell. He seemed likely to succeed when suddenly the unknown spirit took a hand in his affairs. When the two young lovers were together the soft low voice could be distinctly heard saying, "Please Betsy Bell, don't marry Joshua Gardner; please, Betsy Bell, don't marry Joshua Gardner."

It was Kate's dislike of negroes which led to the last and most striking proof of her existence. A negro house boy, named Harry, who was one of Bell's slaves, was often late in building fires. One day, when Mr. Bell was scolding him, the voice said, "Never mind, old Jack; I'll attend to that rascal next time."

A few days later Harry was late again. Mr. Bell began scolding, when the voice whispered, "Hold on! I'll fix this nigger."

The boy was kneeling in front of the hearth. Suddenly he yelled with fear and pain, "Oh, Marse Jack, something's got me by the neck." He writhed and danced around and the next minute sounds like those a board would make in striking flesh were heard. Harry yelled that he was being beaten to death. Then he fell headlong into a corner as if tossed there with great force.

The spirit seemed to dislike negroes, and Mrs. Bell one evening when she had visitors, thought by strategy to keep the witch out of the room. She secreted a black girl named Anky in a trundle bed in the room. In the midst of a general conversation among Mrs. Bell and her guests, the voice of Kate was heard to say distinctly, "There's a nigger in the house. It's Ank. I smell her under the bed." Then underneath the sheet where the young negress lay, nearly scared to death was heard a noise like that of a person spitting. The black girl jumped from under the sheet. On her face was a white froth, and she said, "Oh, Miss Luce (that being Mrs. Bell's pet name), the witch tried to spit me to death."

On another occasion Calvin Johnson, a man well known as honest and truthful, asked Kate to shake hands with him. She agreed upon condition that he would promise to grasp her hand. He promised and said that he felt a touch like that of a lady's hand in his. His brother tried to induce her to shake hands, but she refused, saying: 'I know you, Jake Johnson; you are a grand rascal; I won't trust you."

In those days Shakers traveled through the country, trading with the people. Two of them often stopped at the Bell home and were always made welcome. One day when they were seen approaching, the witch voice was heard to say, "Those Shakers shan't stop this time."

Then it assumed the tone of the negro boy Harry, who was accustomed to sic the dogs on in pursuit of hogs and breachy stock. The voice "set the dogs on" the Shakers and drove them off.

Mrs. Bell in 1820 had a prolonged sickness and became very weak. One day Kate said to her: "Luce, poor Luce, how do you feel now? Hold out your hands, Luce, and I will give you something."

The lady held out her hands and hazelnuts were dropped into them. They were laid aside and the voice said: "Luce, why don't you eat the hazelnuts?" Mrs. Bell replied that she could not crack them. "Well, I will crack them for you," said the voice. A sound like that made in cracking nuts immediately followed and cracked nuts dropped upon the bed within Mrs. Bell's reach. Persons were present upon this occasion and the ceiling was examined. There was no hole in it and this manifestation, like others, remained a mystery.

One morning when Mr. Bell and his son were on their way to the hog pen the elder man's shoe was suddenly jerked off. The son replaced it, tying the strings into a double hard knot. After they had gone on a few steps the other shoe flew off. It was replaced by the son and securely fastened. While they were returning to the house both of the shoes were jerked off and Mr. Bell was violently slapped in the face by an unseen hand. His face was violently contorted. Then his whole body was affected in the same way. It was upon this occasion that Mr. Bell's health broke. He predicted that his days upon this earth would be few and firmly prayed that the affliction might pass from him. He sickened upon reaching the house and never left it again.

One morning, when he failed to awake at the usual time, his wife went to his bed and found him in a heavey stupor. The family was summoned, And when the son, who had been administering medicine, went to get a dose he found that the bottle had been removed and a smoky looking phial, half full of a dark, minister looking fluid had been left in the place.

Dr. George Hopson, of Port Royal, a nearby hamlet, was sent for. Neighbors were called in—John Johnson, Alexander Gunn, Frank R. Miles and others. When all were there Kate said: "It's useless for you to try to relieve old Jack. I have got him this time. He will never get up from that bed again."

The physician could not tell what was in the phial. Some of it was forced into a cat's mouth, and the animal died in convulsions soon afterwards. Mr. Bell died in the morning of December 20, 1820. The burial services were conducted by three clergymen of wide local distinction, one of them, the Rev. Sugg Fort, a member of a family which has long been one of the most distinguished in the South, and it is yet represented by some of the country's best known and wealthiest families. The other clerkmen were the Rev. James and Thomas Gunn. After the grave had been filled and the family had turned to leave, Kate commenced to sing a flippant air, of which the refrain was "Row me up some brandy, O!"

From Mr. Bell's death until February, 1828, the spirit disappeared, but in that year returned again to the Bell home. It quickly resumed its manifestations and became more famous than ever. Visitors from afar were attracted to the place. The most distinguished was General Andrew Jackson, who came with a party equipped for camping out. When near the Bell homestead the team carrying the tents and provisions suddenly stopped. The horses tried to pull; the road was level, the driver plied his whip, but the wagon would not budge. Several men put their shoulders to the wheels, but still the wagon did not move. "By the eternal, boys," yelled General Jackson, "it's the witch."

"All right general," came a voice from the roadside, "let the wagon move on, I'll see you to-night." The wagon then proceeded.

The party stopped at the Bell home. A "witch layer" was present, who boasted of his wonderful powers. He had a horse pistol which was loaded with a silver bullet. He had also the tip of a black cat's tail. He stated that he had shot the cat from which it was taken with a silver bullet, while sitting on a woman's coffin. By stroking the bit of tail on his nose he could produce a light and flash it upon a witch, in the darkest night, but the witch could be seen only by himself. Late in the night General Jackson whispered to a friend that the fellow was a great coward, and said he wished "the thing" would appear, so that they could see him run. Soon light footfalls were heard, and a voice said: "All right, general, I am on hand, ready for business." Then it addressed the witch layer, saying: "Now, Mr. Smarty, here I am. Shoot!"

The witch layer stroked his nose with the tip of the black cat's tail, took aim, pulled the trigger of his pistol, but it failed to go off. He was told by the witch to try again. He did so, with the same result.

"Now it is my time," said the witch. "Look out, you old coward and fraud!"

Sounds were then heard as if some person were slapping another with the open hand.

The witch layer commenced to cavort about the room, screaming as if in much agony: "Oh, my nose! The devil has got me! Oh, Lordy! He has got me by the nose!" Then he bolted out of the door.

A woman named Ayres is yet living, who as a baby, received a spanking from Kate. The baby was very fretful and the mother had to get up frequently to rock the cradle. Finally Kate said: "Patsey, why don't you slap that child, and make it behave itself? If you don't, I will."

The parents distinctly heard a noise like some one spanking a child. The father and mother rushed to the rescue, and the blows ceased. Careful search failed to reveal anything or anybody in the house. Mrs. Ayres says her mother told her about it often, and said that she behaved "like a little lady" the remainder of the night.

After 1830 the demonstrations became fewer, but residents of Robertson county tell of occult phenomena as late as 1861. To this day a portion of the old Bell kitchen is standing. It is neglected, overgrown with bushes, and is uncanny-looking even in daytime. It is still the object of awe, and negroes will not go near it, although the noise has not been heard for years.—Rochester (N. Y.) Herald.

THE OCCULT IN DREAMS.

Dreams and the Idea of Immortality.

When man first came to such power of mind as to be able to look on at his own mental operations and take intelligent cognizance of them, his first dream must have been a very funny experience. This primitive man, waking up one morning from the first dream, the first experience of the kind of which he had an intelligent consciousness, says to his wife: "I have seen my father, whom we saw killed a year ago. He came and talked to me last night."

So this makes a new departure in the ideas of the man and his wife about the nature of man. No doubt he had not formulated his ideas very clearly, but such as they were, here was a distinct and definite addition.

His father, whom he had seen killed, had come and talked to him. His father, therefore, was not dead. And yet he had seen the father's body, or one of his bodies, die and perish. It was evident, therefore, that his father was composed of two beings, one of which was dead and the other still alive and capable of reappearance.

Thence the primitive dreamer would quickly come to the idea of the survival of a part of the man, of one side of his being, so to speak of it, after the death of the other.

In the next dream he saw things at a great distance away from the place in which he was sleeping. When he awoke we may suppose him telling his wife that he had been on a journey into a far country and never had traveled so quickly before.

On which his wife would contradict him and say that he had been here, in this place, asleep, all the time. At first, probably, the man denied this, and the wife would not insist, for the woman's rights, and especially her divine right to contradict her husband, had not yet been invented.

The instrument of conviction in those days was not the syllogism but a stout stick, so the wife would acquire the art that modern women have lost, of silence. But after a while the husband would learn from others besides his wife, others as well equipped as himself with the weapon of primitive conviction, that he had not stirred from beside his fire, even though he appeared to himself to have gone to a far country.

So then he would acquire another idea, supplementary to his notion about the life of his father's soul after death. He would argue that while he himself to all appearance was altogether here, asleep by his fire, it was in reality only half of himself that remained here, the other half journeying off to a far country and seeing strange things.

The conclusion of that, again, was that man was composed of two parts, of which one would stay asleep by the fire and the other go wandering, and it was likely that this same other part that went wandering when the first part was asleep, also went wandering when the first part was dead and thus, simply and naturally, the apparition of dead people is accounted for. It is all nice and easy.

And in this we see the beginnings of the idea of the prophetic trances that have pleased the notions of man in all countries at a certain stage of intellectual progress.

Primitive man, being observant, as he had to be if he was to live, did not fail to notice that in those conditions, sleep, trance, death, when the soul (so to speak of his notion, for convenience sake) went wandering, there was a difference in the manner of breathing, from the manner in which the man breathed when awake and when his soul did not wander.

The breath was the outward and palpable sign of life, that ceased with death as the soul left its tenement.

And yet the soul seldom appeared naked. It usually appeared clad with some kind of covering, always of the kind that it had worn during life—or would again wear in life, if it were but the soul of some sleeping, not of some dead person appearing.

This is a consideration that leads to another line of the primitive man's thought. The late Professor Chandler, Professor of Moral Philosophy, as it is called (there used not to be much ethics of morality about it), at Oxford, used to say, of those that tried to found any argument on a life after death from the appearance of dead persons' ghosts, that if ghosts proved anything they proved too much; for they not only proved that man was immortal, but that his hat and coat were immortal, too, for whenever you met a ghost you always found it decently dressed.

Therefore, he said, ghosts proved if anything too much. It seems a little too much, it is true, for our mental swallow, but it was not at all too much for the savage. If ever there was a proverb that expresses wisdom garnered by hard experience it is that which tells us that "appearances are deceptive."

We must go back to have another look at that dreaming man with his wife by his side taking notes, to be used with much caution subsequently, by reason of the instrument of conviction.

A week ago this primitive man lost his ax of stone, fathoms deep in the river, as he swam across. He could not find it by diving; it was completely dead to him, lost forever. Yet he went to sleep, and in his dream it appeared to him. He did not see it down in the depths of the river, or else there would have been nothing strange.

It would merely have meant that his soul, his second self, went wandering and saw it there, being a better diver than his body. But he saw the ax hanging up on the tree bough where he always used to hang it. It was there.

So this proved that, like his father, and his dog, his ax too, had a soul, a second self, that could move about—it seemed a constant attribute of these souls to have much greater freedom of movement than the bodies to which they belonged—it was proved by the simple fact that he had seen it; for if primitive man had not assimilated the proverb that appearances were deceptive he had a most perfect faith in that rather contradictory one of our coining, that says "Seeing's believing."

He believed because he saw. That was all. And from this belief several rather singular results followed. He saw that his father had a life after death.

On the whole, then, and taking into the account all these various considerations, it is not at all too much to say that dreams were certainly the largest factor in natural religion, toward inducing in primitive man a belief, not indeed in immortality—there is no evidence that he conceived the life after death as likely to endure forever—but in existence for a while at least after the body that he was best acquainted with had died.

It is singular, in comparatively how few religions there is any belief in the existence of the soul before its birth in the terrestrial body; and this is possible to be accounted for on the grounds that dreams would naturally show the sleeper nothing of which his waking sense had not had cognizance; nothing, that is to say, that he had not seen, heard, or so on, or combinations that the imagination could weave out of things of sense.

It is an interesting speculation, though one that does not lead to much solidity of conclusion, what the course of human psychology would have been had it never happened to man to perform "mental operations during sleep of which he retains consciousness on awaking."

Had the world been peopled by men and women who never dreamed, it would have been not a little different. As history makers, dreams have played a big part. We are such stuff as dreams are made on" is scarcely as true as if it were a little inverted to "We are such stuff as dreams have made us."

"Dreams and Their Meaning." By Horace G. Hutchinson, with many accounts of experiences sent by correspondents. Longmans, Green & Co.

HAVE ANIMALS SOULS?

An Interesting Case in Point.

Mrs. Gerald Bancker's home at 405 West Twenty-second street, New York, is haunted. Not by the traditional ghost, trailing through the silence with sweeping white garments and a blast of chilly air. No clanking of chains or wringing of hands had characterized this strange little specter that, in defiance of all precedents, returns again and again to revisit the scenes it loved in life.

Only a soft pattering of light footsteps about the house, and inarticulate sounds as it pauses beside one or another, or a swift, cold touch on the hand announces its presence. For this little wanderer from the misty beyond is none other than the ghost of Mrs. Bancker's fox terrier, Tatters.

Three people have seen it—three people in the fullest possession of their senses—and all are willing to swear that no delusion of fond affection for a dead pet, no momentary disorder of the nerves can account for it. It is a fact that they offer to explain by no hypothesis. Tatters has appeared and does appear. The only theory advanced is that love of home and friends has proved stronger than death. If such love means spirit, the little dog has surely evidenced it.

It is a year and a half since Tatters died. It was a hot night in August that he stretched himself out on the pillow he was wont to affect and looked up to attract the attention of Mrs. Bancker, who was passing by.

"Lazy boy," she said, caressing his head.

That caress was his last. Tatters' head sank back and his eyes closed. They thought he was asleep. When they noticed him an hour later he was dead. Heart disease had killed him. The dog had been in the family for eight years, and was endeared to Mr. and Mrs. Bancker by a thousand proofs of intelligence and affection. From the moment, when, a 3-week-old puppy, he was brought into the house, he established himself in the hearts of his owners.

His acumen was his by heredity. He came of aristocratic lineage. His mother, Gyp, was known as "the elephant dog" at Central park. The keepers still tell of the warm friendship between the small fox terrier and the big elephant, whose whims were often the despair of the attendants. In the elephant's ugliest moods, when all else failed to conciliate him, if Gyp were placed in his pen the great quadruped ceased his trumpetings and became quiet. He yielded to Gyp's influence as if under a spell.

This magnetic power undoubtedly descended to her son. Tatters' father was Tatters I., who was one of the greatest ratters in the world. From this side of the house Tatters got his ability as a hunter when occasion offered. During summers in the country he was distinguished for his prowess when a woodchuck was in view.

Healthy, happy, and active, he had literally never known a sorrow. At all times obedient to a word, he was singularly docile and comprehending, and his loss to the Banckers was irreparable.

It was not immediately after his death that the little ghost appeared. Three months later, when fires were lighted and windows closed against the cold, Mrs. Bancker returned late one afternoon from a shopping expedition. As she opened the door a small form dashed through the hall and threw itself against her with the joyous bounds with which Tatters had welcomed her in life. She was startled, but never doubted the reality of the experience.

"From that time on," says Mrs. Bancker, "I began to see him, mostly when I was alone. I can see him poke his head out from under the sofa. Sometimes when I am reading he will suddenly appear beside me and look up at me with that little coaxing sound he always made when he wanted to get on my lap. Or, again, he will lay his cold nose against my hand. There is no question of hallucination about it. I see him perfectly distinctly."

Mrs. S. Whittaker, Mrs. Bancker's sister-in-law, was the second who saw the little ghost. Tatters had been strongly attached to her, the sound of her voice being sufficient to cause wild demonstrations of affection. Calling at the house one day after his death, when all were absent, she was amazed to hear a gentle scratching at the door inside and a familiar whine of disappointment. She tried to put the idea aside, but the next time she came, as she stepped into the hall, she started back with a cry.

"There goes Tatters," she said. He ran across the hall just before me."

The third witness is Miss Page, Mrs. Bancker's sister. Miss Page is not a dog lover, and she always disapproved of the great care lavished on Tatters. One winter day, calling on a visit, she suddenly exclaimed:

"There is Tatters! He ran upstairs before me, and now he is here!"

Nothing could convince her that she had not seen him.

Whether the explanation is telepathic or more intimately concerned with the question of whether animals have souls, Mrs. Bancker does not attempt to say. She does assert that the little ghost is a persistent and familiar visitor.—Chicago Inter Ocean.

WHAT IS THE USE OF YOUR SLAVING LONGER FOR SOME ONE ELSE.

Why not start a business for yourself, reap all the profits and get a standing in your locality.

If you are in some one's employ, remember he will not continue to pay you a salary only so long as he can make profit out of your labor.

In this era every bright man and woman is looking to own a business, to employ help, and to make money.

It is just as easy to make money for yourself as it is to coin money for some grasping employer, who pays you a small salary each week.

If you are making less than $30 weekly it will pay you to read this announcement, for it will not appear again in this paper.

If you read it and take advantage of the opportunity offered, you will never regret it. To own a business yourself is certainly your ambition.

We start you in a profitable business. Teach you absolutely free how to conduct it.

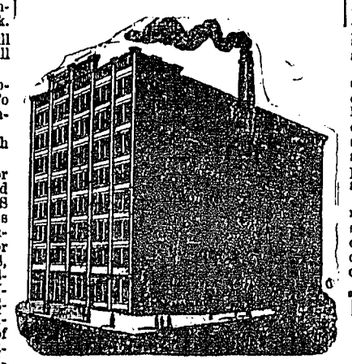
$20 to $35 weekly can be made at home or traveling, taking orders, using, selling and appointing agents for PROFESSOR GRAY'S Latest improved, Guaranteed Plating Machines and Outfits. NO FAKE OR TOYS, but genuine, practical, complete, scientific outfits for doing the finest of plating on WATCHES, JEWELRY, KNIVES, FORKS, SPOONS, CASTORS, TABLEWARE OF ALL KINDS, BICYCLES, SEWING MACHINES, SWORDS, REVOLVERS, HARNESS AND BUGGY TRIMMINGS, metal specialities; in fact all kinds of metal goods. HEAVY THICK PLATE, GUARANTEED TO WEAR FOR YEARS. No experience necessary.

There is really a wonderful demand for replating. You can do business at nearly every house, store, office or factory. Almost every family has from $2 to $10 worth of tableware to be plated, besides watches, jewelry, bicycles, etc.

Every boarding house, hotel, restaurant, college or public institution has from $5 to $75 worth of work to be plated. Every jewelry, repair or bicycle shop, every dentist, doctor and surgeon, every man, woman and child you meet has either a watch, some jewelry, bicycles, instruments, or some articles needing plating.

Besides the above there are hundreds of patentees and manufacturers of metal goods, bicycles, sewing machines and typewriter repair shops who want their goods plated, or to whom you can sell a plating outfit, furnishing them supplies for doing their own plating.

Retail Stores which handle hardware, harness, tableware and plated or metal goods all need a plating and polishing outfit for refinishing goods that become worn, soiled, rusty or tarnished.



Every Undertaker requires a plating outfit for repairing and finishing coffin and hearse trimmings which are soiled, tarnished or worn.

Manufacturers are making and selling tons of new tableware, jewelry, bicycles and various kinds of metal goods every month which has only a very thin plate, which, in a few weeks, wears off, making the goods unsightly, unfit for future use unless plated.

Manufacturers of new goods do no re-plating on old goods whatever, but try to force the public to throw away the old and buy new at high prices, but this only makes the plating business better.

The more new thinly plated goods sold the greater will be the demand for plating. Plate some articles for your friends and neighbors by Professor Gray's Process, and it quickly proves to them its genuineness and merit and that your plating is much thicker, will wear better and longer than a large percentage of the new goods. Your trade is then established, and within a short time you will have all the goods you can plate.

Plate a few articles for your friends, call a few weeks, a few months, or five years later, and you will find the plate satisfactory, and they will give you every article they have needing to be plated.

Factory and Warehouse of Gray & Co., Cincinnati, Ohio. Capital $100,000. Employ 200 to 300 people daily.

When you deliver the goods plated to customers they will be well pleased, in fact, delighted with the work, will pay for it promptly, and you will be given on an average twice as much work to be plated as they gave you the first time you called.

YOU CAN DO PLATING SO CHEAP

that every person can afford to have their goods plated

No tidy housekeeper will allow worn and rusty tableware to go before a guest when it can be restored and made equal to new.

No person will wear jewelry or a watch, or ride a bicycle, or use a typewriter, sewing machine, or any machine made of metal from which the plate is worn off when they see samples of your work and hear your prices. People in this day and generation are too sensible and economical to throw away their old goods and buy new when they can have their old goods replated for so small a cost, making them, in many cases, better than when new.

The best part of the plating business is that it increases fast and is permanent.

Put out your sign, secure your outfit, do a little work, and quickly you will be favored with orders. If you do not wish to do the plating yourself you can hire boys for $3 to $4 a week to do the work the same as we do, and solicitors to gather up goods to be plated on commission.

It is not hard work, but is pleasant, and especially so when your business is netting you $20 to $35 a week for 5 or 6 hours' work a day.

TREMENDOUS PROFITS.

The profits realized from plating are tremendous.

To plate a set of teaspoons requires only about 3c. worth of metal and chemicals; a set of knives, forks or tablespoons about 5c. worth. The balance of the price received for the work is for the agent's time and profit.

Agents usually charge from 25c. to 50c. per set for plating teaspoons, from 50c. to 75c. for tablespoons and forks, and from 60c. to $1.00 for knives.

We allow you to set your own price for plating. Get as much as you can. You will have no competition. You know what it costs to plate the goods, and all you get over cost is profit. Some agents charge much more than the above prices, while others do the work for half and still make money.

Let us start you in business for yourself at once, don't delay a single day. Be your own boss. Be a money maker. We do all kinds of plating ourselves, have had years of experience, and are headquarters for plating supplies. We manufacture our own dynamos and outfits, all sizes, and send them out complete, with all tools, lathes, wheels and materials; everything ready for use.

We teach you everything, furnish all receipts, formulas and trade secrets free, so that failure should be impossible, and any one who follows our directions and teachings can do fine plating with a little practice, and become a money maker.

MISSIONARY WORK.

Report of Mr. and Mrs. Sprague.

Our work for the month of December was principally in the state of Ohio. We held 28 meetings and organized three societies. We began the month's work at Findlay, O., where we remained five days, holding meetings and seances, closing the work there by organizing a fine society composed of 34 members. This society we chartered with the Ohio State Association.

We next visited McClure, Ohio, where we held a parlor meeting and a seance. Our friends in this place were refused a hall in which to hold our meetings. The good Christians(?) would not allow us to teach our "heretical doctrines" in their "sacred" halls, and there being no hall that belonged to a liberal thinker who was free to exercise his own will over his own property, we were driven to accept the private parlors of our sister, Mrs. Kate Henry. The house was filled, and many could not get in, and at last the doors had to be locked to keep the rowdies from disturbing the meeting. They then made considerable noise, but it was a very cold night and they finally went away. A few of those who were admitted into the house seemed disposed to sneer and ridicule at first, but Mrs. Sprague gave them some messages and tests that quieted them, and though "they came to scoff, they remained to pray," and we left the people inside the house both Spiritualists and investigators, feeling happy over the results of these two meetings.

Who was it that opposed our coming to McClure? The Christians. Who was it that refused to let our people use the halls in McClure? The Christians. Who was it made the disturbance outside the house and tried to disturb our meetings? Who was it? It certainly was not the Spiritualists, nor the Liberalists; then who could it have been?

We left our good friends of McClure with the assurance that we should be called there again at some future time when we would be granted a public hearing.

Spiritualists, doesn't this make you feel like helping along the missionary work and standing more firmly for our beloved Spiritualism? These experiences give us inspiration of that kind that impels us on to greater effort, and I think ought to help awaken those self-satisfied and inactive Spiritualists to a realization of the fact that it is the duty of every true Spiritualist to do his or her part in helping the good cause along.

We next visited Lima, Ohio, where we found many of our old friends of former years still working in the vineyard of Spiritualism. We were glad to meet these dear friends once more. Lima has a very good working society. It is chartered with the N. S. A.

The new president of the society, whose name has gone out of my mind, never having met him before, is an earnest worker and faithful supporter of the N. S. A., together with Brothers Hale, Chown and Hawkins, Sisters Lester and a score of other true hearts and willing hands are faithfully upholding the cause in this pretty little city.

We created considerable interest in the cause here, converted a few—who were not favorable to the N. S. A.—to a belief in its work and importance, and added nine new members to the society.

From Lima we went to Chardon, O., where we met with terrible weather, held three public meetings, one seance, and one business meeting at which we organized a society with 10 members. We would undoubtedly have doubled that number if the weather and roads had been good. Our special visiting missionaries when sent into Ohio, can finish the work. They should be sent out at once; but the Spiritualists of the country are not yet furnishing sufficient means to warrant the N. S. A. in doing so.

We visited Middlefield, Ohio, organized a society of 23 members and chartered it with the Ohio State Association. We were told that if the weather and roads had been good we could easily have raised the number to 50.

Both of these societies are composed of excellent people, and will increase in numbers and usefulness as time goes on.

We visited Alliance, Ohio, where we found good Brother Lockwood demonstrating the truths of Spiritualism scientifically. We had the pleasure of attending one of his classes and one of his lectures, which, to us was a great treat, as it was the first opportunity for us, though we have known the good brother for years.

We did some good work in Alliance, which we feel confident will bring good results in the future. We next visited Pittsburg, Pa., where we assisted Bro. and Sister Kates in a meeting at the Sixth street church. Your readers have been informed of this meeting through the report of Brother Kates, so I will pass it by.

We are serving the Philadelphia (Pa.) Spiritualists Society for the Sundays and Fridays of January. We will leave here for the west, Jan. 26, going to Eagle's Mere, Pa., for two or three days, then to Pittsburg, for January 30 to Feb. 3.

We have an engagement at Battle Creek, Mich., with the Michigan State Spiritualists Association, at their mid-winter convention, for Feb 7, 8, and 9, and at Owosso, Mich., Feb. 14 and 16.

Parties wishing our services may address us at Rochester, Ind., and mail will be forwarded to us.

Our faith in organization increases with every new experience. The N. S. A. should be upheld and encouraged by every thoughtful and earnest Spiritualist. "United we stand, divided we fall." Let us all unite under its glorious banner and help to make it the great power for good it is destined to be.

E. W. AND C. A. SPRAGUE,
Missionaries for the N. S. A.

Dr. Bland's New Book.

"In the World Celestial" is not only an excellent spiritual book, but such a fascinating story of a love which budded on earth and blossomed in heaven, that all lovers of high grade novels are charmed with it, and its teachings are so elevating, that religionists of all classes are delighted with it.

Rev. Dr. Thomas endorses it in a beautiful introduction. Dr. Bowles, president of the National Liberal League, says: "Every page is a rich mine of intellectual gold, and each sentence a gem of moral beauty." The Light of Truth says: "Spiritualists will be charmed with it, and skeptics converted by it." The Banner of Light says: "It is a valuable contribution to the literature of Spiritualism." The Gatling Gun says: "To Spiritualists it will be inexpressibly delightful; while doubters will find it highly entertaining." The Medical Gleaner says: "It presents a bright picture of the eternal dream that holds the world together. It will lift the reader into enchanting realms, and leave a sweet taste in his consciousness." Cora L. V. Richmond says: "I have read it with deep interest." Bound in cloth. Price one dollar. For sale at the office of The Progressive Thinker, or sent postpaid on receipt of price.

"Elsie's Little Brother Tam." By Alwyn M. Thurber, is one of the best of books in the realm of stories for boys and girls, and not excepting older people. It is a fine birthday or holiday gift. Very interesting as well as instructive, and of good, refining influence. Price 75 cents. For sale at this office.

"Why I Am a Vegetarian." By J. Howard Moore. An address before the Chicago Vegetarian Society. Price 25 cents.

Another Page in the History of Spiritualism.

NEXT WEEK The Progressive Thinker will publish the promised Revelation, a new page in the History of Spiritualism. It will be a great surprise to many who have supposed that certain profound statements led to a certain individual as their author, whereas quite the reverse is true. There is nothing grander, more beautiful, or more soul-uplifting than the truth, wherever it may originate. While this disclosure does not in the least discredit any one, it does make known a master mind that heretofore has not received proper credit, and who is entitled to recognition. The Progressive Thinker leads in trying to solve the great problems of the age, presenting each week a vast amount of Spiritual and Occult matters, which every Spiritualist and advanced thinker should be familiar with. Now is the time to introduce the paper to the attention of your friends generally, inducing them, if possible, to subscribe, and thus keep in the front ranks of the advancing procession.

The Progressive Thinker.

Published every Saturday at 40 Loomis St.

J. R. FRANCIS, Editor and Publisher.

Entered at Chicago Postoffice as second-class matter.

TERMS OF SUBSCRIPTION.

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER will be furnished until further notice, at the following terms, invariably in advance:

REMITTANCES.

Remit by Postoffice Money Order, Registered Letter or draft on Chicago or New York. It costs from 10 to 15 cents to get checks cashed on local banks, so don't send them unless you wish that amount deducted from the amount sent. Address all letters to J. R. FRANCIS, No. 40 Loomis Street, Chicago, Ill.

TAKE NOTICE.

☞ At expiration of subscription, if not renewed, the paper is discontinued. No bills will be sent for extra numbers.

☞ If you do not receive your paper promptly write to us, and any errors in address will be promptly corrected, and missing numbers supplied gratis.

☞ Whenever you desire the address of your paper changed, always give the address of the place to which it is then sent or the change cannot be made.

FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER is furnished in the United States at $1.00 per year, the postage thereon being but nominal, but when it is sent to foreign countries we are compelled to charge 50 cents extra, making the yearly subscription $1.50. Please bear that in mind.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1902.

The Veil of Isis.

The scientists and thinkers of the world, in all ages, have sought to solve the problem of life, the mysteries of existence. From age to age the search of the world's philosophers has continued; but, whatever apparent advance has been made, mystery still remained to confront and challenge the deepest thought and investigation, and the most advanced thinker has still been in the mental state of Dante's character, who cried,

"One doubt remains, which wrings me sorely if I solve it not."

Recently, as stated in the Inter Ocean, Professor Jacques Loeb, of the University of Chicago, has announced or re-affirmed two discoveries which many of his fellow men regard as epoch making. One is that several processes of life are due not to the heat furnished by food eaten, but to the electric force generated by the contact of electrically positive and negative food atoms. The other is the possibility, by the use of certain chemicals, of prolonging life in certain living things—in this case sea urchin's eggs—beyond what scientific observation had declared to be its natural term.

From the viewpoint of pure science, these are interesting discoveries. If true, they are extremely important to science, and the University of Chicago is to be congratulated on having Professor Loeb in its faculty. It is also an honor to Chicago and to the whole nation to have in its citizenship an investigator whose work attracts world-wide attention. Yet it is to be feared that the chief present effect of Professor Loeb's natural elation upon the laymen will be to raise false hopes and strengthen the influences of medical quackery.

Electricity is a therapeutic agent of recognized value, but those who vend it as a nostrum, it is to be feared, will be aided in deceiving the public by the cunning use of Professor Loeb's name. If one chemical preserves life in sea urchin's eggs it is possible that another may be found that will arrest disintegration of human tissues. We shall doubtless soon be afflicted with quacks pretending to have found that chemical, and thousands of men who cling to life and fear to face their final audit will believe them, to their loss and sorrow.

For in the end such attempts as Professor Loeb's to unravel the secret of existence, while they may gratify scientific curiosity, can lead nowhither. They are like the efforts of other experimenters to square the circle, to discover a self-reproducing force or "perpetual motion," to find the fountain of youth, or to compound an elixir of life. One of Professor Loeb's enthusiastic assistants has publicly declared that his success in delaying the death of living organisms means a solution of the problem of endless life. That is the interpretation the lay public is but too apt to place upon Professor Loeb's work, and thence to derive mischievous hopes.

For ages men have striven after eternal life on earth, but their search has been ever vain, and their demand for immortality has had to seek satisfaction in belief in another life after what we call death. There is always the recurring decimal of the man who would square the circle, always the missing cog or lever of the seeker after perpetual motion, always the overlooked error of the chemist or the biologist to disappoint the hope and destroy the illusion. Hence it were wiser for scientific men, however they may amuse themselves by juggling with life, frankly to confess in advance and always insist that they cannot create it, cannot prolong it beyond its appointed time, and that here is the veil of Isis that none hath lifted and none ever will—the secret that man can never learn, because it is known to the Creator alone.

"Thou hast appointed his bounds that he cannot pass," said the Hebrew philosopher, ages since, of God and man. Whosoever, wittingly or unwittingly, induces his fellow men to deny or evade that eternal truth is no benefactor of humanity, but a blind leader of the blind into the ditch of despair.

"Thou hast appointed his bounds that he cannot pass," is the Everlasting Nay of truth against which all the years of human science and wisdom dash themselves to pieces. The fountain of life is ever hidden from human eyes, and science must bow to the eternal fact.

Bible Interpretation.

While the good Methodist brethren are perturbed in mind, and considering what they shall do with Prof. Pearson because of his unorthodox and upliteral interpretations of bible statements, it might afford them healthful thought to take due notice of the following fact given in a special telegram to the Chicago Chronicle, from Nashville, Tenn.:

"Mrs. Bula Abbey, wife of a young merchant near Sparta, Tenn., died last night as the result of pulling out one of her eyes in a fanatical and literal interpretation of the scriptural injunction, "If thine eye offend, pluck it out and cast it from thee, for it is better to go into heaven having only one eye than to suffer the torments of hell fire." Her mind became unbalanced over religion early last autumn and since that time she has been noted for strange vagaries in religious work. She insisted on being immersed last month on one of the coldest days in the year, and for a time wished her husband to sell his business and give all to the poor."

This poor woman is regarded as unbalanced in mind because she wants to obey the plain, literal instructions of bible texts. Prof. Pearson is thought "unbalanced" because he does not construe certain very improbable bible accounts as literal truths.

Beautiful Ideals.

There can be no doubt that beautiful ideals exercise an uplifting, purifying and spiritualizing influence, tending to transform the soul into the image of the ideal beauty. It is a tendency molding one's character, in degree, in harmony with the ideal that presents itself to the mind as pure and good, lovely and desirable.

Hence we can assent to the claim of Mr. Mangasarian, of the Independent Religious Society of Chicago, that art is a saving power, and may regenerate the city, morally and physically. As reported by the daily press, in an address in the Grand Opera House, Mr. Mangasarian asserted that love of the beautiful will transform Chicago. Art, he said, is the saving power that is to overcome soot and smoke and dirt and which will convert the city into a metropolis of stately buildings and spreading parks, and its people into better citizens.

The Art institute by the lake is a credit to Chicago, he said. Though we are, comparatively speaking a young community and much dominated by material pursuits, nevertheless we have a palace of art in our midst which lifts its head above the smoke hanging over our industral metropolis.

We love wealth and enterprise; we are devotees of comfort and commerce; yet these modern gods have not altogether crowded out of our minds the love of the beautiful. It may be objected that our allegiance to art is not very decided, but art will in the end conquer even us.

Chicago has been so little favored by nature—for with the exception of the beautiful lake nature has been very chary with her gifts—that art must be summoned to fill up the gap. Chicago cannot be called a beautiful city and it is difficult in a muddy and sooty city to be esthetically happy—it is hard even to be good in such provoking environments.

If our good clergymen would, instead of preaching the bad news of damnation, join in an earnest effort to cultivate in the masses the love of the beautiful they would help to make this present world an Elysium. Art will save us in this age of iron and cotton from becoming ourselves iron and cotton things.

By art we mean the seeing under all things the ideal—it is the hunger and thirst for the life of the mind beautifully embroidered, so to speak, by the delicate hand of imagination. To make the average man more artistic we must appeal to his mind through the avenues of a rational religion, an elevated drama, a clean newspaper, a great literature, and, above all, artistic environments.

A people without art would be a people without intellectual life. We must see beauty as well as utility, must play as well as work. If I could revise the meaning of words I should apply the word "infidel" to those who see the world always in prose, never also as a poem—who hear its noises but have no ear for the silences of nature; who never dream a dream or paint a mental picture or behold a rainbow in the sky.

The most pressing problem of the age is the regeneration of society through art. Religion and the churches have for centuries faithfully and with commendable zeal tried to save the world, but it is a matter of regret that the results have not been commensurate with the enormous expenditure of means. But humanity will take more kindly to art as a redeemer. It will be more susceptible to the message of beauty.

Art differs from religion in this, that while the latter seeks to suppress the passions the former aspires to direct them to nobler uses. Religion eradicates, art transforms; religion would cut off the right arm and pluck out the right eye; to art the body is as sacred as the soul. Religion would lead us to heaven maimed; art is not satisfied until the whole man is saved.

Again, art brings peace to the troubled mind, not by sapping its energies, but by creating counter activities to overcome the discord by harmony. It is by art more than by sermonizing, by great pictures more than by prayers, that the evil tendencies in us shall become regenerated.

It is a question whether an artist should ever paint battle pictures. The real mischief of war can never be told by the brush, for it is not the carnage, the blood-soaked fields or the heart-breaking scenes which condemn war most. Such evils come also by the flood and the earthquake, the summer's sun and the winter's snow.

The shame of war lies in the violation of a moral principle to which the poet and the orator can give expression, but which the painter cannot catch on his canvas.

A painter should, if not exclusively, generally, at least, give us pictures of peaceful landscapes, the grandeur and loveliness of nature, of sky and sea; he must reveal the "human form divine" and people his quivering canvas with beautiful women and children; he must give us scenes of quiet and sweet home life; such scenes as the great Dutch masters loved to paint.

An art institute should not be used as a place for the marketing of pictures. Only such works should be hung on its walls as deserve to remain there always as the treasures of the people. The committee should have no thought of the commercial possibilities of an exhibit. To do good is not to be an artist, but to do good for the pure pleasure of doing it is to be an artist.

Hostilities to Be Resumed!

There was a little misunderstanding as to the order of the debate between Mr. Hull and myself.

Mr. Hull desires to affirm all his eight affirmative speeches, with my eight replies; and then my eight affirmative speeches and his eight replies to follow.

I agree to it fully. The debate will now proceed soon.

May I here say that if I have misquoted Mr. Dawbarn, or any other man, I will take it back in the book to be published.

If I have done injustice to Mrs. Nettie Pease Fox, or any other lecturer, I will also correct it, if Mr. Hull and the publisher will grant me that privilege, as, doubtless, they will.

But hark ye! There is not a more careful man in quoting that I am, although I admit my quotations are not always infallible.

PATRIARCHS AS ASTRAL MYTHS.

A Biblical Scholar's Statement of Important Facts, for Spiritualists to Consider.

A Chapter That Should Be Preserved for Future Reference.

AN ANGLICAN CHURCHMAN ON THE MOST RADICAL EXPLANATION OF THE OLD TESTAMENT—PROF. T. K. CHEYNE'S HIGH PRAISE OF WINCKLER'S "GESCHICHTE ISRAELS"—COMMENTATORS ADVISED TO ACCEPT HISTORICAL TREATMENT OF OLD TESTAMENT—BIBLE CHARACTERS FROM ABRAHAM TO SOLOMON MAY BE EXPLAINED AWAY.

Prof. Thomas Kelly Cheyne, D. D., fellow of Balliol, Canon of Rochester and Oriel professor of the interpretation of the Holy Scriptures at Oxford University, is a leader among English Bible scholars who favor the methods of the newer criticism. Thirty years ago he was the first lecturer at Oxford to hold and expound the main results of modern Old Testament criticism. He was one of the Revision Committee for the Old Testament and an editor of the "Variorum Bible." He has many works on the Old Testament, chief among them his books on Isaiah. His Bampton lectures of 1889 were the object of a good deal of controversy in the Church of England. The following article by Prof. Cheyne is from the Nineteenth Century and After.

The most important point for those of us who study the Old Testament is not how to avoid committing ourselves to the peculiarities of this or that critic or Assyriologist, and how to suggest to our pupils and to the public a middle road between extremes which accords with the average opinion of scholars, but how by a combination of old methods with new, and by the attainment of a new point of view, to reconstruct our study, and how by the gentlest possible transition to introduce our pupils and the public to this new treatment of the Old Testament. And since there is no scholar who has so fully realized the problems before us and contributed on such a large scale to their solution as Hugo Winckler, Assyriologist and historian, I will endeavor to give the reader some idea of his treatment of the prehistoric period of Israelitic antiquity in the second volume of his Geschichte Israels. The great danger of many Biblical scholars is narrowness of view, and no recent book perhaps can do more to correct this than Winckler's Geschichte.

Even among practical churchmen it is at least a tolerated opinion that Abraham was not a historical personage, either in the sense supposed by the older orthodoxy, or in the sense which is winning much favor among more recent theologians, viz., as the "great leader of a racial movement, and one who has left his mark upon his fellow tribesmen, not only by the eminence of his superior gifts, but by the distinctive features of his religious life." Winckler thinks it right to treat Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and even Moses, Joshua, the Judges, Saul, David and Solomon in a perfectly disinterested spirit, from the point of view of a criticism founded upon the facts of a comparative study of the historic legends of the East. The results are very different from those reached by a criticism which is mainly literary in its character. They may often be insufficiently grounded, but this is a first attempt, and Winckler deserves credit for not being too fastidious, and venturing to publish many things which may perhaps only be serviceable as working hypotheses.

The result which Winckler thinks of most significance is this—that the material which legend in the East has worked into the semblance of history is derived from mythology. The Semitic peoples, however, whose gods were local gods—originally the stone or the tree—could not develop a mythology; the myths which the lesser Semitic peoples had were borrowed directly or indirectly from Babylonia; Egyptian influence, too, is not excluded. This was naturally the case with the Hebrews. The basis of their legends is in the main a borrowed mythology. If now we turn our attention to these legends we find that they fall into two classes: (1) those which grew up round the heroes (such as Abraham, Isaac and Jacob), who were, according to Winckler, reflections of local divinities, and (2) those which attached themselves to historical personages, such as the Judges, regarded as representatives of the several tribes, and the first Kings, as representatives of the people. That there were literati capable of writing these myths down may be assumed; the influence of the great civilizations of the valleys of the Euphrates and the Nile was fully great enough for this, and every King or Kinglet would look out for a poet or scribe who could transmit the royal achievements to posterity. This scribe would naturally relate these achievements in such a way as to remind the reader of the exploits of the supernatural heroes of mythology. One scribe would teach another, and so by degrees fixed forms of expression of mythic origin would arise, providing a setting for the great deeds of the ruler. Once made, the legends grew, like every other natural thing. Trained literati were always ready to adapt them to the changing wants of the time, as when the post-exilic Hebrew writers created David anew simply by putting a fresh interpretation on the historical and geographical data of the old legend.

It is not surprising, therefore, that we should find in the Hebrew legends striking parallels to stories told in other countries. The economy of legend is marvellous. The same thing is told with the greatest variety of detail and of the most different persons in widely separated parts of the earth. Everywhere the local god is the centre of the world, and so everywhere the forms of the primitive legend reappear. Age followed age, and all consciousness of the origin and true character of the legends by degrees disappeared. Hence the unity of the original legends was destroyed; omissions and additions were made according to the ideas of the later writers. Sometimes a more complete parallel in quite another part of the world enables us to repair the omission. Even now our knowledge of the Babylonian mythology and legends is fragmentary, but so far as it goes it is sound, and the only questions are, (1) whether with our still more fragmentary knowledge of Hebrew legends it is possible to systematize the mythic elements in those legends to the extent that Winckler desires, and (2) whether the revised or amended Hebrew text, on which Winckler often depends, is preference to the Massoretic, is trustworthy.

Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, then, are lunar heroes. In the case of Abraham this is, according to Winckler, doubly certain. His father Terah comes from Ur, in Chaldea, the city of the South Babylonian moon worship (Nannar), but, in order to reach Canaan, he must halt at Harran, which is the second great centre of lunar worship in the region of the Euphratean civilization.

And now comes Sarah to be at once Abraham's sister and his wife? Because Sarah, being the counterpart of Istar, has a double role. She is the daughter of the Moon-god, and therefore Abraham's sister; she is the wife of Tammuz, and therefore Abraham's wife. For Abraham, too, according to Winskler, has a double role; he is the son of the Moon-god, but he is also the heroic reflection of Tammuz. Of Isaac little is recorded; he dwells at Beersheba, "the well of the Seven-god," that is, the Moon-god. Jacob, however, is much more definitely described. His father-in-law, Laban, reminds us by his very name of Lebena, the moon, and Laban's two daughters, Leah and Rachel, represent respectively the new moon and the full moon. Dinah, Leah's daughter, represents Istar, the daughter of the Moon-god, and with her six brothers makes up the number of the days of the week, one of which in fact (Dies Vencris, Friday) has a female deity. The respective numbers of the descendants of the two wives (excluding Joseph as a solar hero) are also significant for the calendar.

Joseph is a hero second in importance to none; his name is not properly that of a tribe; Ephraim and Manasseh are the tribes which he impersonates. In a larger sense, however, he impersonates all the tribes which subsequently formed the kingdom of Northern Israel, and of whom he may also be regarded as the patron deity. The key to his divine character lies in Genesis 37:10, where Joseph dreams that the sun, moon, and the eleven stars did homage to him. The interpretation given in verse 10 is, "I [Jacob], thy mother and thy brethren." But the mother has no place in an act of homage, and it is in the South Arabian mythology, not in the Babylonian, that the sun is feminine. In the original story, then, it was the Moon-god (Jacob) with his children, who bowed down before the Sun-god (Joseph), his son. The rest of the story of Joseph now becomes clear. The lunar heroes, Abraham and Jacob, fetched their spouses from the land of moon worship; the solar hero Joseph goes to Egypt, the land of sun worship, to obtain for his wife the daughter of a priest of Heliopolis. But like Abraham, Joseph also represents Tammuz, the sun of spring tide, who dies and passes into the under world, whither Istar descends to bring him back to earth. This is why he is cast into the pit, and again raised out of it. Hence another reason for Joseph's going to Egypt, for Egypt represents the southern region of the sky, in which the sun stands in the winter when Tammuz is dead. That the tribes of Israel (necessarily twelve, because of the signs of the Zodiac), together with their ancestors, are connected with an astral myth is not a new idea, but it has been worked out by Stucken and Winckler with greater fulness of knowledge than by any previous writer. It is, of course, not stated that the early legends are historically worthless; wisely used, even the early legends can be made to furnish historical material, both directly and indirectly. Still more is this the case with the later legends attached not to humanized deities, but to historical persons, such, for instance, as Saul and David.

By a criticism keen as a sword, Winckler derives many new and some also plausible facts from the accounts of these Kings, and if he can show us which are the purely mythic features in the stories, so that we may provisionally set them aside, he furthers the interest of historical inquiry. Saul is necessarily a lunar hero, because he opens the succession of Kings, as Sin, the Moon-god, stands at the head of the gods and the stars. So David has to be a solar hero. The very names of the Kings probably indicate this, Sayce's theory being independently confirmed by Winckler, viz., that Saul and David were not the birth names of these Kings. Among the evidences of the lunar character of Saul, Winckler reckons his visit to the witch of Endor, which corresponds to the journey of Istar, the daughter of Sin, to the under world; and several features in the story of his end, notably the mention of his diadem and his spear, the former of which corresponds to the tiara of Sin, the Moon-god, and the latter to the weapon which the Moon-god is represented in coins as holding in his hand. Mystic elements are also to be found in Saul's son, Jonathan. As the son of Saul, Jonathan is a solar hero, the sun being to the Babylonians the child of the moon; and Jonathan, being a reflection of the Sun-god, virtually dies and rises again (I. Samuel 14:44-45), as was the case with another solar hero of the Hebrews, Joseph. But Saul and Jonathan also represent the constellation Gemini (so fond were the ancients of blending myths). And as such, in the famous elegy of David, Saul and Jonathan are represented, according to Winckler, not as father and son, but as brothers—as divine brothers—the one distinguished by his spear or lance, the other by his bow. In fact, the Hebrews, not less than the Babylonians, knew of a lance star and a bow star.

As for David, he too wears a borrowed name, yet no undistinguished one, for Dod, as it should be read, i. e., "beloved," belongs to the divinity Tammuz. He is therefore a solar hero; his red hair is the image of the rays of the sun; and if Saul and Jonathan correspond to the constellation Gemini, David is the legendary reflex of Leo. It cannot therefore be a surprise to be told that the giant Goliath corresponds to the wild hunter and tyrant Orion, the rising and setting of which coincides with the winter and summer solstices. David's friendship with Jonathan is also explained mythologically; it corresponds to the friendship of the mythic hero Gilgamis with the equally mythic hero Eabani. The same rhythmic tradition has attached itself to the stories of Achilles and of Alexander the Great.

I now proceed at once to ask conservative or moderate critics (for I take the two words to be almost synonymous in these opening years of the twentieth century) what is to be their attitude toward problems and solutions like these? What their present attitude is I know perfectly well. They regard Winckler as an extremely clever but wild critic, who lacks the claim to consideration derived from having been trained in the methods of the schools. They are willing here and there to take suggestions from him on points of detail, but on big questions they doubt his competence, and they would regard with some suspicion anything to which he himself attached much importance. But if they persist in this attitude, I greatly fear that they will condemn their own labor to comparative sterility. Almost all that can be attained by the old methods of criticism—both as regards the form and as regards the contents of the Old Testament—has been accomplished, and how imperfect that is no candid critic perhaps will deny. Would it not be better to put aside prejudice, and suppose that we have indeed arrived at a turning point, and that the Old Testament study is indeed in course of being transformed to a great extent (the qualification is deliberate) into a branch of the study of Semitic antiquity? There will still be subjects apart from this wide study which require special consideration. But at present all the subjects which have till lately been supposed to be fairly settled—in text, lexicon, grammar, exegesis, history—need to be investigated from a virtually new point of view. It will continue to be an advantage to know the old as well as the new methods, by special training, at least provided that this training is no longer permitted to issue in the self-confidence and unintelligent disparagement of the most progressive critics, which is beginning to be too characteristic of some of the so-called moderate critics.

A Shaky Pulpit.

The following from the London "Literary Guide," shows some of the clergy of England are shaky, to say the least, on the Divine authority of the Bible. We quote from its November issue:

"Disbelief among Christian ministers in the divine authority of the Bible is not limited to the Old Testament. The Rev. Marcus Dods, in a review which appears in the 'British Weekly,' claims for the writers of the Gospels, not divine inspiration, but simply that they strove by purely human methods, to attain to such accuracy as we may expect to find in any faithful and competent historian. Thus, according to the Rev. Marcus Dods, even the four Gospels, which form the kernel of the Christian faith, can no longer be regarded as the work of God, but are the productions of unknown men, who were not eye witnesses of the "events" which they related, who, despite all their pains, were possibly misinformed on many points, and who were certainly not inspired. What a descent from the old-fashioned Christian doctrine that all Scripture was given by inspiration of the Holy Ghost! We are strongly opposed to interference with liberty of speech, but it would probably clear the intellectual atmosphere, and might help forward the abolition of obnoxious statutes against blasphemy, if some religious zealot would set the machinery of the law in motion against these unbelieving Christian divines who openly impugn the authority of the 'Holy Scriptures.'"

Prof. Pearson on Bible Exposition.

Spiritualists and liberal thinkers can view with perfect complacency the cyclone's path through the dense and dank wilderness of orthodoxy, made by the bold criticism of Prof. Pearson, of the Methodist Northwestern University, on the obsolete yet orthodox methods of bible interpretation.

Really the Professor has advanced nothing new, he is simply restating the conclusions arrived at by scholarly investigators all over the world and published by them for fifty years past.

A sensation, however, is caused by the fact that these utterances are now made by a Professor in a distinctly denominational orthodox college, and by a man of admitted scholarship, who has been considered strictly orthodox himself.

The incident is only one of many that show the trend of scholarly thinkers, in colleges and in pulpits, to assert liberty to think, to investigate, and to give free utterance to the honest convictions at which they arrive. Free thought and scholarship tend to emancipate thinkers from the thraldom of mediæval systems of theology and bible interpretations.

Unnatural miraculism and myth are labeled and stowed away in the respective niches and pigeon-holes to which honest scholarship assigns them; and as a consequence, lay minds are liberated from superstitious worship of long-supposed inspired historical facts. Thus one foundation stone or prop after another is removed, and eventually the whole "infallible" book becomes subject to critical examination and doubt, to stand or fall, according as its agreement with science, with known facts, and with common sense, shall determine.

The Rev. Hardin, who made a fierce onslaught on Prof. Pearson, showed that a degree of the "Old Adam" still lingers in his nature, when he declared that the Professor "ought to be skinned and his hide hung on a barn-door and salted."

Whether Prof. Pearson shall be cast out as a heretic, or not, he will undoubtedly—though not literally skinned, etc., as the Old Adam in Rev. Hardin suggested—be subjected to the finer processes of modern persecution that obtain in the churches when a leader in thought veers away from the orthodox standards. But he will have the consciousness of honest adherence to what he is convinced is truth.

A better and far more desirable plan, ethically considered, were to forego the vivisectionist pleasure of "skinning" Mr. Pearson, or inflicting other and more refined meahods of churchly persecution, and proceed in an honest, scholarly way, to refute his propositions—if possible.

VALUABLE PREMIUMS.

AN INCOMPARABLE SPECIAL OFFER TO NEW SUBSCRIBERS, OR THOSE WHO WISH TO SECURE THESE TWO OF OUR PREMIUM BOOKS.

Two exceptionally valuable books will be sent out for twenty-five cents each, to every one who sends in a yearly subscription for The Progressive Thinker. The paper one year $1.00 and the two books 50 cents. Total for paper and the two books, $1.50. The paper one year and one of these books, $1.25. Or if you wish to secure an exceedingly valuable library, you can secure our eight premium books for $2.50. The paper one year and these eight books, $3.50. See second page, "Premiums."

One of the above books offered for 25 cents is entitled "A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands," and the other is Vol. 3 of "The Encyclopedia of Death, and Life in the Spirit World." Both of these books are nicely and substantially bound in cloth. They are printed in bold, clear type, and will prove invaluable to every reflective mind. These are the only two books we offer at the price. If you desire any more of the premium books than the two offered, then you can only secure these two on the terms offered on our second page. Such a liberal offer has never been made before by any other publisher on this earth. We send out a sample copy to about 3,500 this week, and we should receive during the next ten days that number of orders. Our eight premium books cannot be excelled in intrinsic merit by any other eight books you may select in the whole range of Occult and Spiritualistic literature. And as to their price, it is only about one-sixth of the price of other works on like subjects. You miss the chance of your life in not securing these valuable books.

A CALL TO WORK.

To the Spiritualists of Kansas.

At the beginning of the new year 1902, we find ourselves in a condition spiritually that requires a general awakening, and as a matter of fact we must each launch out in the spiritual sea and put forth every possible energy to reach the goal, and while so doing we should lift up the low in spirit, and elevate them to that plane of Spirituality where they will ever lurch forward with glad hearts, ever willing to rescue others. In so doing much good will and must be accomplished which in return will add great comfort and happiness to ourselves while in our physical bodies.

We are spirits now as much as we will ever be. We must push onward and upward. We cannot stand still, we will either have to progress or retrograde. So let us ever be moving onward, on to victory; just one kind word, a kind act, or a little spiritual test may lead some soul on to the true light. If we as Spiritualists would each one make a bold start to the front, not one waiting for another, but each one with their phase of mediumship demonstrate to a friend the spiritual power within themselves, instead of being afraid some of their friends will find out that they are Spiritualists and would then ridicule them. This, my friends, is much that is holding many of our mediums from the rostrums; they are afraid of what people will say. Let me say right here, the people have nothing to do (spiritually) with you and I. We each have a spiritual being within our physical bodies, and we must each one develop the spirit within; no one can help us without our willingness.

There are many different phases of mediumship which must be developed either while we are living in the physical body or after we have taken a spiritual body. Our spirits must and will be developed and the sooner we begin this development the better we will be prepared for the spiritual birth which is the so-called death. Let us ever push onward and upward, each one of us doing the best we can to help others, for while we are helping others we are also advancing our own spirituality.

Now to the Spiritualists of Kansas I would say that, during the last week of May, 1901, we organized the State Spiritualists Association of Kansas, for the purpose of getting our Spiritualists banded stronger together than we have ever been. We have been advancing slowly, but I believe surely, and in order of thorough success we must all work together—every phase of mediumship should be pushed forward. People in order to become Spiritualists must do so only by obtaining a thorough knowledge of spirit return. All phases of mediumship must be shown in its true light. The phenomena as well as the philosophy in all their branches must jointly work hand in hand, and by so doing unbelievers in the cause of Spiritualism will rally to the standard and we will ever march on to victory.

Our good brother and sister, G. W. Kates and wife, will be in Kansas as N. S. A. missionaries and will help build up the Kansas State Association. Parties throughout the state wanting assistance spiritually to organize societies or for lectures, tests, etc., will please let me hear from you. We may expect a spiritual feast in the near future. Brother and Sister Kates will be in Kansas during the latter part of May and possibly all of June, and will be open for engagements during that time. Our first annual convention of the State Spiritualists Association will begin on the first Friday in June (which is the 6th) and last until the 16, thus giving us ten days, and will carry us over two Sundays.

Spiritualists, let us rally to the standard and show the N. S. A. and other state associations that Kansas can and will come boldly to the front. We earnestly ask all Spiritualists of Kansas to lend a helping hand. We need money to push this work, and ask your subscriptions or donations in such amounts as you feel able to give. We want to hear from all the various societies in the state. Address all communications to How May a Knowledge of Spiritualism Be Obtained?

A Discourse

By Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond, at Corry, Pa., August 4, 1901.

The New Light, the New Revealment of Spiritual Truth comes to humanity in two ways: It comes by outward signs and tokens that proceed from the spirit side of life towards mortals—such as have accompanied every great spiritual outpouring since the world began, and it comes from within.

Those that are spiritually endowed; we mean by this, those who have spiritual perception and discernment, and intuition, require no external testimony concerning a future life and immortality. Those who are not spiritually endowed must receive the knowledge through other sources.

In this world of utility, this age of great "practical utility," as it is called, this age that is looking mostly to material science for unfoldment, the manifestations of Spiritualism have come as an answer to the great human need for testimony that will satisfy the mind through the senses. This, of course, is the most fallacious kind of testimony; yet it is the kind of testimony that most people believe the most in. You trust your eyes, your hearing, your external senses, and yet we know that the vision is fallacious; we know the human hearing is liable to err; we know the human senses are very limited in their discernment of even ordinary daily things. It is the mind alone that aids the senses. Mathematics assist in accomplishing what material science desires to illustrate; and with the crucible of the chemist and various experiments in science you can prove a proposition after the proposition has been perceived mentally. But you cannot prove a proposition to another human being who is not capable of receiving it mentally or spiritually.

Spiritualism came from the spirit side of life, and through manifestations of the senses challenged the inquiry of man. For in endeavoring to discover the cause of the "Rochester Knockings," to discover how the writing upon locked slates was produced, and the various forms of materialization, the whole world of scientific thought has been challenged to explain those manifestations. In doing so it has admitted human thought into the realm of spirit life. For, inevitably, these manifestations, when you enter into communication with them, claim to be presented by spiritual beings.

Now it is within the province of every human being to know whether these manifestations are true or not. If you have no mediums here, you can go to Cassadaga, or wherever there are mediums through whose instrumentality you may investigate.

It is useless for people to say in this day and age of the world, "I have had no evidence, but I would like to have." The same endeavor applied in this direction, that is applied in other directions, will give you knowledge on this subject. You can receive the evidence if you will receive it. If you wish to send a telegraph message you do not wait in your house for some telegraph operator to bring his instrument there—or if you wish to receive a message by electricity you seek the methods. The same is true with reference to these spiritual manifestations: You must seek those who possess the gifts of the spirit, or through whom the manifestations come. Or, if you prefer, arrange a "circle" in your own household—there is a "psychic" or medium in most every family—and you can receive the evidence there. Just as thousands and tens of thousands of people have.

This knowledge is not secluded. Within a week your present speaker has been at Cassadaga Camp, where there were many people, statesmen, scholars, orators, many who had never investigated the subject before. They received messages from their departed friends through various mediums there. Writings from their spirit friends were received with no human hand to intervene; and forms were seen that were not produced by any external methods; and inspired thoughts that came from those outside of mortal life. It rests entirely with yourself whether you will know about this subject, whether you will grasp this proposition, or whether you will still wander in the shadow of doubt concerning spirit life.

There are also inner ways of knowledge. Of course it is of no particular interest to any one excepting yourself. The average human being cannot bestow or receive anything by your knowledge of spiritual truth. The average human being needs spiritual truth as a present possession.

"But," you say, "we have our faith, we have our religion, we have our hope of immortality." But that does not take the place of knowledge. Faith is beautiful; it is the flowering out of one's spiritual nature; it is that upon which humanity feeds. Hope is beautiful; it leads one to desire knowledge, or aspiration for a knowledge of that which lies beyond, and encourages one. But knowledge is better.

In all human affairs if you can have knowledge you consider that it is better than faith, or hope, or belief. A knowledge of mathematics serves you better than the belief that there is mathematics. A knowledge of chemistry serves your human life better than simply to believe that some one else understands chemistry. So the knowledge of the laws of life and being pervaded by this spiritual power will exercise a most beneficent influence upon human life every day.

It is most important to know that man is spirit here and now; that the spiritual faculties require unfolding, developing and feeding. You train the body; the athlete spares no labor or experience to make himself perfect in physical unfoldment. "Physical Culture" is one of the departments of all well-regulated schools. There are professors and teachers of both sexes in the poetry of motion and in the beauty of perfect physical expression. You consider that the intellect must be unfolded to its fullest capacity. We regret to say, that we think your schools are systems of "cramming" instead of systems of perfect unfoldment in education. By and by, as these plants, these lovely blossoms have been carefully trained to unfold what is from within, your human education will be a process of unfoldment; and the individual life will be as perfect as the most perfect of these flowers. But as long as education is something induced from without instead of unfolding that which is within, it will simply be mechanical. Frequently whatever intelligence there is, is crowded out of the young child because of this process. When, however, the new system was introduced, Froebel saw in the child the germ of the future man or woman, and the "kindergarten" took the place of the cramming and crowding process. Whenever you introduce in education the principle of the religious or spiritual proposition of the unfoldment of that which is within, whenever this becomes the principle of your schools, then your educational system will be perfect.

If it is necessary that the intellect and the body shall be so unfolded, it is also necessary that the spiritual powers shall be unfolded; that every human life shall know all that is possible to be known concerning his or her spiritual nature. Because you will find after a while that the spirit is life; that the body is simply the instrument, the mechanical structure through which the spirit is to express itself.

Spiritualism has taught, in the fifty years or more of its present existence in the world, that in proportion as this spirit power is unfolded, so is life more perfect. We do not mean merely theological propositions or dogmas, but we mean the spiritual life, that which pervades the human existence, that which exalts and purifies the affections, that which makes the intellect more clear, that which dominates the moral purpose of the individual and no one can have an exalted life who is not dominated by the spirit that is within and the spirit above; even though he or she does not know it. It is this knowledge that gives the real value to life.

The whole realm of existence in which your spiritual natudes are found has been measurably hidden and stultified. You have been able, through religious exercises and the presentation of religious thought and truth, in some measure to perceive these things, but they have been separated from the ordinary conditions of life, and spirituality pervading the human existence has never been thought to be possible.

These spirit friends that have passed from human sight are realities. You do not have to go back to the poets and ancient philosophers to learn that "millions of spiritual beings walk the earth both when you wake and when you sleep," as declared by the Christian poet Milton, and earlier by the Greek poet Hesiod. Then this realm, in which those spirits move, having come in contact with human life, having made itself manifest, having declared its existence, is a valuable realm to understand. Not only because you are all journeying thither, and will one day, sooner or later, cast aside the physical body, but because you are spirits now. That which sees is not the eye, it is the intelligence animating the eye. That which hears, and speaks, and performs the tasks of daily life is the spirit that is within you. If there are more attributes of the spirits than have been perceived or recognized; if you have powers that have been hidden and only partially unfolded or altogether set aside, it is quite important that you should know it.

The race is entering into a higher spiritual existence. In the French Academy of Sciences, not many years ago, it was proposed to include a "sixth sense," which was to be called "Intuition." That proposition did not prevail among the scientists; but a great many scientific minds of Europe and America have come to the conclusion that this realm which you perceive through intuition is the larger realm of life, and the world is growing more and more into that inheritance. As the brain to-day presents a more perfect structure, than the sloping forehead and high egotism of the earlier races, as the human intellect in the facial expression reveals more nobility and more intelligence, so the spiritual powers, when unfolded reveal themselves in the expression of the countenance, in the light of eye, in the serenity of spirit, in a philosophical mind. As this spiritual power is more and more unfolded, the meaning of everyday life will be more clearly revealed.

The next step of life, which you pass into through the change called death, is of course only one of the steps of eternity. But as human existence is found to be a preparation for it, your spirit friends are very anxious that you should know as much as possible about your own spiritual natures, your own spiritual possessions. And it is possible to know about this. You can enter into communication with your spirit friends; you can ascertain what the occupations and conditions are in spirit life. They will tell you the condition of the spirit on entering spirit life is determined by the growth and unfoldment in the earthly state. They will uniformly tell you that they wish they had found a better opportunity or had improved their opportunities better while here. If they have been selfish and worldly, seeking only for material gain, they will tell you that such a state was a clog upon their spirits; that they have been fettered and bound in spirit life because they had not sought for spiritual treasures more than for material treasures.

To use the things of life wisely; to have a suitable home and surroundings is the perfect right of every human being. But to use the powers of the spirit to improve the opportunities that are here to unfold the spiritual nature; this also is the highest and most divine gift of life.

Those who receive messages from the spirit states declare, that in those messages they receive the declaration, that these powers which were neglected upon the earth constitute their poverty in spirit life; that people are often deformed here by physical, human conditions, but in spirit they are deformed by lack of spiritual unfoldment; that if you could see the shadows of your earthly condition resting upon you sometimes when passing away from earth you would desire to know more of that spiritual state, to have more of that knowledge that can lead to a better and higher condition here and hereafter.

When the great Agnostic said in human life "one world at a time is enough for me," he did not realize that the larger portion of this world is in the world of spirit, which had been neglected; that with the knowledge of spiritual attributes and powers the human race would enter into its higher possessions. Now released from time and sense, and human intellect, Mr. Ingersoll is undoubtedly sorry that he did not avail himself of the opportunities he had on earth to have greater knowledge. For when you are going into a country that you are unfamiliar with, and for which you are not equipped, your limitations are painful to you. Suppose one who is starting out to discover the North Pole should go without any preparation, should make no preparation for the cold, should make no preparation for warmer clothing, and provision to sustain the bodies of the men who accompany him should they be caught in the fields of ice and snow. Would you not say, "He is foolish; how can he start out on such discoveries without any preparation?" Yet people expect to start out on the voyage of eternity when leaving the earthly life with no preparation whatever (excepting, possibly, a blind faith in the theology that has been taught them), and trusting to luck to take their chances with those who have already gone. But the course they have taken may lead to no blest haven; and they may have encountered many obstacles of their own ignorance on their journey. When you realize this you will equip yourself for your eternal journey as you would equip yourself for a voyage upon the earth.

You teach your boys and girls that their education in practical intellectual ways is because they are going to be men and women, and that they must have this knowledge of mathematics, this knowledge of language, of grammar, this higher education to fit them to cope with the conditions of life. The boy who would be a merchant must understand somewhat of the rules of trade—too often they are rules that we would not wish any boy of ours to know. The girl who would go out to teach or obtain a livelihood with her hands must have some knowledge of that which she wishes to do. But here are thousands every day in your world passing into the spirit realm with no thought of whither they are going, with no preparation of spiritual knowledge, with only such preparation, perhaps, as comes when death opens the avenue between them and the spirit realm.

However, with the light of knowledge the step that people take in entering spirit life would be no more fearful, not half as fearful as the step the boy takes when he goes out in the world to meet its temptations and its trials. It is the inevitable step that all must take and a knowledge of it prepares you to go.

You recall such instances as a dying saint who sees the vision of angels and the loved ones around the death bed; those whom you can remember in the household who have passed away with a smile upon their lips, recognizing the dear ones that have passed on and call them by their names. You speak of such a scene as a "beautiful death-bed scene." If it were common, if it were universal with all lives to pass as joyously into the realm of spirits as you receive them into this world, would it not make human life more beautiful and lovely? And would there not be garlands of flowers instead of sable drapery, and songs of gladness instead of funeral hymns, and words of light and beauty and joy instead of those of sorrow, with no garb of mourning to cloud your lives and cloud the lives of the spirits that have passed from your midst, and with knowledge, and hope and love, and "God speed," and the consciousness that their presence, as a crowning light, can be with you day by day and hour by hour?

"But," asks one, "does not the knowledge or thought of spirit life and influence unfit us for the daily duties of life? Is there not danger that we shall seek too much the things of the spirit, and not attend to our duties here?" By no means. A correct knowledge of the laws of life and spirit makes the hand more accurate in the performance of its duty, makes the heart more truthful in the fulfillment of its daily life of affection, the mind clearer to perform its part. If you know that you are spirit as well as body, and know whither you are going, the drudgery of life is not so hard, the weary round of toil is not so difficult, and the daily burden is not so hard to bear, for you know that not only human beings sympathize with you here, but spirit intelligences.

We knew one dear lady who had lost the use of her limbs, who had no fortune, but used her pen to obtain her livelihood. She lived in a small room and performed her own work, moving her body around with her hands, washing the floor and preparing her own meals to keep her spirit and body together. But, with the knowledge of spirit life she said: "Oh! I have so many blessings, I am never alone." This knowledge kept that dear heart strengthened, and her life pervaded by spiritual powers, so that the burdens of human existence did not rest heavily upon her.

How much lighter your daily toil would be if you knew that in spirit life your friends were brooding presences, helping, strengthening, and guiding you; with this animating knowledge your bodies are but performing the necessary task, until you shall take on the next higher step. How much more ennobling would human life be if instead of the mere delving and diving for physical existence you could know that it is the unfoldment of the spirit; that the great lesson of human sorrow is neither penalty nor punishment, nor revenge, but simply unfoldment. Sorrow teaches patience, fortitude and loving kindness for others. If you have wept because of your own sorrow, you understand how others feel who also sorrow.

When the great Teacher and Master of Nazareth knew the meaning of sorrow and was brought, by divine compassion, into sympathy with the world, it was because he knew the meaning of sorrow by experience. When Buddha Gautama went out from his father's palace, from the pleasure-house that was reared for him, to seek knowledge and the meaning of sorrow, when he saw death and all the things around him that he could not explain, bye and bye, through prayerful observance, by listening to the voice of the spirit, not among the sacred men who tortured the body that the spirit might live; not among the recluses, who thought they had obtained conquest by separating themselves from the world, but beneath the wondrous tree whose branches spread above him, whose leaves were vocal with the voices of the night, he heard the voice of the Spirit, he was shown the great mystery of life. How it is for conquest and unfoldment; how victory over selfishness or sorrow is the divinest achievement of life; when this knowledge came, instead of going back to his pleasure-house and living the life of idleness and luxury, he taught. He taught among the people, ministering unto them. He told the great meaning and lesson of sorrow through which they were passing. He pointed out to them the great light and attainment of the vision he saw.

When Jesus trod the pathways in Palestine, he led the people to a knowledge of spiritual truth. He made them aware that the "kingdom" of which he taught was not a kingdom of the dust, but a kingdom of the spirit, and he said, "the kingdom of heaven is within you." How many churches teach that it is some far off region? some citadel of light with alabaster thrones and gates and walls through which it is impossible to pass unless you have faith or attain by some external form or ceremony.

We know Jesus, the teacher, the beneficent friend, the wise counselor, the healer, said, "The kingdom of heaven is within;" and it is this kingdom that the spirit realm comes to reach; to find out that which has been neglected, to restore that which has been cast aside; to reveal that which has not heretofore been known.

By observing your own premonitions and impressions this faculty of intuition will be more and more cultivated. If you have impressions that you cannot explain, if they seem to be truthful, follow them. You often say in your daily life: "I wish I had followed my impression, my intuition." Why, do not you know it is because reason, material passion and external interests have shut this avenue of knowledge; that you do not know about spiritual things? Otherwise you would be holding communion with spiritual beings as freely as with one another. Your spiritual vision would have been opened to spirit life, as it is in many cases.

Sometimes children have this spiritual endowment, and the parents send for the physician. Very likely you would send for the doctor to prescribe for your little girl "because she sees things." If you knew that "seeing" was the precursor to higher knowing; that this and other gifts of the spirit is through the only faculty of the human being that is endowed from the spirit, you would cultivate it as carefully as you do the gift of music, or painting, or any other gift that manifests itself in your children.

The race must grow, sooner or later, into this spiritual inheritance. It is not always intended that prophets and seers, and those endowed with "gifts of the spirit" shall be the only ones to teach the human race concerning spiritual things. By your own firesides, at your own hearthstones, in the midst of your own family circle, this voice will be heard, this testimony will be offered. It will not be in forms and things to frighten you. Spirits are not the "ghosts," and "hobgoblins" of grave-yards. They are spiritual intelligences, beings that have dwelt in your midst, in your own households; they are your dear friends, and a part of your life and your light, and if the spiritual family is really that which constitutes the household in eternity, then of course it is just as much a part of life that this communion shall be between the spirit and human state as that you shall have conversation with each other.

You have great trouble in not being able to make one another understand. The language you use is imperfect and you frequently misunderstand each other. Notwithstanding the great affluence of the English language it is a very easy thing for two friends to misunderstand each other. In human life you get cross and quarrelsome, and go to law merely because you do not understand each other. Now when your spirits are right you will understand each other better here.

We knew two friends, farmers, who had lived side by side for many years. By and by there came up a controversy about the line between their lands, and one farmer moved the fence this way, and the other that way, until at last there was great trouble about it, and they had some words, angry words, and went to law. Finally one consulted a lawyer, who had some sense. He was an old friend of theirs. He said: "My dear friend, is there no way to adjust this matter without going to law about it? In the end you will both lose your farms."

"But I am going to fight this thing out," said the farmer. "I say so and so, and he says so and so."

"But," said the lawyer, "do you want to lose your farm and your house, and your family have no home? You were friends and neighbors, and the best of feeling existed between you; there was nothing you would not have done for him. Now let him have this little piece of land. Just go to him the next time this comes up and say: 'I don't mind this little piece of land, you can have it, it is nothing to me.' It is better to sacrifice the land than your friends."

"Why, I cannot do that!" said the farmer.

"Just try it," said the lawyer.

So the next time the farmers met, he did as the lawyer suggested, and to his great surprise, the man said, "I do not want the land; you can have it." From fighting each other they were soon trying to see who could make the greater sacrifice, one for the other.

Was not that better? Did they not understand each other better? And were they not in a better state to enter into the next step of existence? That was the result of one sensible man telling them that their friendship for each other was more valuable than all the land they owned.

When you approach humanity with that kind of spirit, do you not suppose that loving kindness and fraternity will prevail, instead of hatred, malice, scorning and striving? And that the spirit world can make you understand? It is not difficult if you are willing. The principal barriers between you and spirit life are in the fears and doubts of human life.

A great many people say: "I do not want the spirits to know everything I do." Then you should not do anything that you are afraid or ashamed to have them see. "I do not want the spirits to know what I think." Then uplift your thoughts until they are as clear as the noonday sun, and you will not be afraid to have an angel of light see and know what you are thinking. But if you think your daughter (your daughter with shining eyes and wonderful hair), with loving thoughts bends above you, perhaps in your counting-room, perhaps in your hours of daily toil, and that she may know every thought of unworthiness; if you take advantage of your neighbor or friend, does that make you feel uncomfortable? Then let your thoughts and dealings be such that it will be no discomfort to you if your spirit child can see what you do and think.

Undoubtedly when Dante, in his vision, saw the "Inferno," he was looking out on the earth conditions, Boards of Trade and Stock Exchanges, and hearing the demons of mammon howl and scream toward each other. But there are no such infernoes in the realm of spirit excepting those that you make. You take your heaven or hell with you. "The kingdom of heaven is within." Then so is the kingdom of hades. If you want hades it is easy enough to have it. Passion, striving, selfishness, contention, all these things make it. We know an angel of light could not witness a more perfect picture of hades than the human conditions that are created by avarice, greed and human selfishness.

If this spirit realm, impinging upon yours, does nothing more, it tells you that you "reap what you sow." That the next step is just as you have made it. That every human life must ultimately work out the conditions of spiritual unfoldment by growth in time and eternity.

Do you want to know about this? You say you want to know a little about it. You want to know about it to the extent of having messages from your spirit friends. But you do not want to know enough of it to live it, to bear it forward in your daily life, to make of it the theme and song that constitute the key-note of existence, that this spiritual life is yours, that every faculty, every attribute, every high pursuit, every divine endowment—in their spiritual essence—and the highest potency are yours, and that one day you will sing the songs of praise.

When you will have conquered and triumphed over the conditions of human life by this unfolding spiritually, what a beautiful human race it will be! All children will have the face of angels, all countenances will beam with intelligence, differing only as each star "differs from another in glory." Physical bodies will not be maimed, dwarfed and deformed as now; physical sickness and suffering will be overcome by the knowledge of the power of the spirit, and all human beings will come forth upon the earth in the charmed knowledge of spiritual beings, here and now as well as hereafter and throughout eternity.

Oh, habitable earth! Oh, human life full of the highest possibilities! but now warped and perverted to the lowest struggles of demons—when will this conflict cease? When will this striving in mortal life be over? Not until the spirit, rising in its fullest triumph, shall reveal the light of the soul, and you stand "face to face" with that invisible realm that you see now "through a glass darkly." Then shall the boundaries of human life expand; then shall the nations learn war no more; then shall the great struggle in the world of mammon no longer occupy the brain, and heart, and hand, but fraternity shall abide, and peace shall govern all the earth. Then man shall enter into his spiritual inheritance and the endowment of the skies, and be one with the angels.

Does Electrocution Kill?

Any student of psychology knows it is a comparatively simple feat of power to throw a "subject" he is accustomed to influence into so deep and complete a sleep or trance, that to all observers the subject is a counterpart of death, so far as animation normal or abnormal is concerned. The body of the subject, if the operator is a powerful concentrator, can be made to assume the coldness and rigidity commonly associated with death; can even be subjected to crucial tests of what would be pain and torture to a person in his normal state, yet be resuscitated into natural activity again, and aver strenuously he had no consciousness of events transpiring while he was in the quiescent or trance state.

Others say they knew every circumstance, but were powerless to move or act, in the slightest degree. These are demonstrable facts and it is futile to deny them. The cause of this seeming phenomenon is, the body of the subject is temporarily charged with a stronger degree of magnetism than the individual can generate, and the body being a vehicle of expression or in other words, a reflector and transmitter, of emotion and sensation, it will manifest forth the strongest power operative upon it, at any given time.

In cases of electrocution the victim's body is charged with power far beyond its natural capabilities, so it is temporarily paralyzed and quiescent, incapable of any movement. Rigidity, coldness, inanimation, even the first signs of putrefaction are not infallible signs of death, and there can be no doubt in the mind of men who understand electricity and magnetism, that each and every man subjected to electrocution could be revived if the proper methods were employed, these varying in many ways according to the individual's peculiarities who has been subjected to the same. The only way to effectually destroy physical activity, so that the victim is thoroughly and completely released from the body, is to generate such an enormous degree of power, that the body shows signs of being burned, which would be too barbarous a proceeding for men to want to contemplate, who had any instincts of kindness in their souls; though it would be generous to do this rather than to simply stop power of motion, leaving ofttimes, clear, active thought. If so desired, I will go further and deeper into the subject, from a psychologist's standpoint. VICTOR ILLUMINER.

Only the vulgar person seeks to adorn his short-comings and give them an air of respectability.—Confucius.

Little enough will your religion profit you, if your deeds do not accord with it.—Jussuf Ali Mustapha.

Of all the advantages which come to any young man, I believe it to be demonstrably true that poverty is the greatest.—J. G. Holland.

He that can work is born king of something; is in communion with Nature, is master of a thing or things, is a priest or a king of Nature so far. He that can work at nothing is but a usurping king, be his trappings what they may; he is the born slave of all things.—Carlyle.

In proportion as we love truth more and victory less, we shall become anxious to know what it is which leads our opponents to think as they do. We shall begin to suspect that the pertinacity of belief exhibited by them must result from perception of something we have not perceived.—Spencer.

A WONDERFUL OCULIST
Marvelous Have Been the Cures Perfected By Dr. F. Geo. Curts, the Eye Specialist

In the privacy of your own home you can cure yourself of failing eyesight, cataracts, granulated lids blindness, or any disease of the eye, by a mild medicine method perfected by the noted eye specialist, Dr. F. Geo. Curts. The thousands of sufferers cured by this remarkable man is a revelation to the medical profession. Rev. J. M. Dinsmore, 1817 Penn street, Kansas City, Mo., says: "I have been under Dr. Curts' treatment but a short time, but from the good he has done me I feel warranted in saying that his Mild Medicine Method is scientific, safe and effective. O. B. Emerson, Rock Island, Ill., conductor on the C. B. & Q. Railway, was deaf for eleven years, but Dr. Curts cured him in two months. A grand book which should be in the hands of all, has just been prepared by Dr. Curts. This book is appropriately illustrated, and contains much valuable information. It will be sent absolutely free to all addressing DR. F. GEO. CURTS, 427 Shukert Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE.
A VERY IMPORTANT WORK.
The Spiritual Significance is by Lilian Whiting, author of "The World Beautiful," "After Her Death," "Kate Field, A Record," "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning," Cloth, $1.00.
Miss Whiting finds the title of her new book in these lines from "Aurora Leigh:"
"If a man could feel
Not one, but every day, feast, fast, and working-day,
The spiritual significance burn through
The hieroglyphic of material shows,
Henceforward he would paint the globe with wings."
The aim of this book is to reveal the curiously close correspondence between the developments of modern science and spiritual laws; to note that new forces, as discovered and applied in wireless telegraphy, are simply laws of an unseen realm into which humanity is rapidly advancing and thus gaining a new environment. From this evolutionary progress, as illustrated by physical science the author of "The World Beautiful" continues the same argument presented in those volumes in a plea that the future life is the continuation and development of our present life in all its faculties and powers, and that the present may be ennobled by the constant sense of the Divine Presence, and a truer knowledge of the nature of man and his relations to God tend to a higher morality and increasing happiness. The book is characterized by the same essential style and qualities that have insured for "The World Beautiful" volumes an almost world-wide popularity.

VEDANTA PHILOSOPHY.
Lectures by the Swami Vivekananda, on Raja Yoga; or Conquering the Internal Nature, and other subjects; also, Patanjali's Yoga Aphorisms, with commentaries and a copious glossary of Sanskrit terms. Revised and enlarged. 12mo. Cloth, $1.50. Raja Yoga is an ancient system of Indian Philosophy, and one of the four chief methods that the Vedanta Philosophy offers to obtain freedom and perfection. Swami Vivekananda became a familiar figure in several American cities during the three years following the Parliament of Religions at Chicago; he was cordially received in America, where the breadth and depth of his teachings were soon recognized. His teachings are universal in their application. The book is cheap at $1.50. For sale at this office.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require. Every item sent to us for publication, should contain the full name and address of the writer. We desire to know the source of every item that appears. This rule will be strictly adhered to.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

Bear in mind that all notices for this page are cut down to suit the space we have to occupy when received.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Dr. J. O. M. Hewitt is engaged for February with the First Temple Society of Spiritualists at Newport, Ky.

Within six months three of the most prominent of the younger men in Louisville, Ky., have met with violent deaths, and in each instance it is said the circumstances have been foretold by a blind fortune-teller living there. The men were Stuart R. Young, former city treasurer, who committed suicide Nov. 29; Austin Kent, who, while visiting in St. Louis, was struck by a train and killed, and Will Goddard, who was killed a few days ago by the discharge of a gun he was cleaning. Goddard increased the insurance on his life from $20,000 to $35,000 on the strength of the fortune-teller's prophecy.

Mrs. Ted Smith writes from Bemidji, Minn.: "Our society was organized two years ago with twelve members and one or two undeveloped mediums. We now have a society with forty members, a fine physical medium, one lecturing medium (ordained), Mrs. Ted Smith, several healers and two materializing mediums. We have excellent meetings every Sunday night, with a crowded hall, a nice bank account, our hall rent paid, steam heat and electric lights, a fine organ and a well organized choir of singers. I never saw such a grad development in Spiritualism."

Kent E. Percey writes: "Sir William Crookes, of England, inventor of the X-ray tube, which has been such a boon to humanity, says: 'That hitherto unrecognized force—whether it be called physical or psychical is of little consequence—is involved in this occurrence is not with me a matter of opinion, but of absolute knowledge.' Prof. Alfred Russell Wallace, LL. D., F. R. S., says in referring to his investigation of the phenomena of Spiritualism, that the facts beat me.' He has given to the world his impressions on the subject in a book. Prof. Wallace was a co-worker and compeer with Darwin, and is today regarded as one of the leading scientific men of the world. And further permit me to quote the great French astronomer and author, Camille Flammarian: 'I do not hesitate to confirm my conviction, based on personal examination of the subject, that any scientific man who declares the phenomena denominated 'magnetic,' 'somnambulic,' 'mediumistic,' and others not yet explained by science, to be 'impossible,' is one who speaks without knowing what he is talking about."

Mrs. M. K. Glover writes from Worcester, Mass.: "Words are inadequate to express my great pleasure in the reception of The Progressive Thinker from week to week. In fact, there is nothing like it that can compare with the instruction we gain from its pages. Dr. T. Wilkins is just splendid. His controls are funny and interesting, and when he writes about his mother I can come very near to him in spirit. You can count on me as a life member. I am nearing my 78th year, and am looking forward to the time when I shall be done with the things that perish."

Mrs. McKinley Creighton, of this city, writes: "We have found 'A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands' very interesting and profitable. My husband thinks it one of the best he has ever read. Your paper comes as a very welcome guest each week."

Mrs. H. A. Stockey writes from Seattle, Wash.: "The Seattle Spiritualist Association held its annual meeting for the election of officers January 15, 1902. A fair representation of members was present, who expressed themselves as greatly pleased and encouraged by the successful work of the society during the past year and its present prosperous condition. Perfect harmony and unanimity prevailed. R. F. Little was re-elected president; G. W. Knight, vice-president; Mrs. Swan, treasurer; Walter Hall, secretary. Mrs. Stockey was appointed corresponding secretary. Trustees: Mrs. McDonald, Mrs. Lapworth, Mrs. Smith, Mr. Ross and Mr. Peterson. W. J. Colville has been with us during the last two weeks, giving two lectures nearly every day since his arrival. He leaves for the East early next week, and we much regret the shortness of his stay with us. It has been a season of intense interest, and we believe also of spiritual advancement to us."

J. A. Lant writes from Detroit, Mich.: "The Society of Earnest Workers have now an active Ladies' Aid, with the following officers: President, Mrs. Sharlow; vice-president, Mrs. Goucher; secretary, Mrs. Carlson; chaplain, Mrs. Godley. They meet weekly at the homes of members. Mr. and Mrs. Daum left for their new home in Boston, on Tuesday last. Mrs. Rose Ferris addressed a large audience at this hall last Sunday."

Dr. H. V. Sweringen writes as follows to the Record-Herald: "'Try the spirits' implies a future existence, but unless they are 'tried,' unless Christians investigate the phenomena, they are, like Bishop Foster, in most distressing doubt of immortality. But they will not investigate themselves nor allow others to do so if they can prevent it by ridicule and ostracism, the only two methods of prevention left them, for they have long since failed with reason and argument. As a Spiritualist I would not be true to my conviction and knowledge if I did not here and now affirm that it is not true that any human entity has ever lain or ever will lay in the ground or in the grave. It is simply the spirit-deserted body that lies therein. God is not a God of the dead, but of the living. The day of one's death is better than the day of one's birth. There is no death."

P. C. Brown, of Staples, Minn., has all the premium books. He is highly pleased with The Progressive Thinker.

Frank T. Ripley writes that he entertained a large audience on Sunday, January 19. He will remain in Columbus during January.

The following comes from Bushnell, Ill.: "Bushnell has a ghost—a female ghost, if there be sex in the spirit world. She appears dressed in deepest mourning. Only once has she been seen in white, and then in what appeared to be material of flowing texture. On all other occasions she has shown herself in long black robes, and a mourning veil over her face. She does not seem to confine herself to any particular place, but has been seen on different streets and at all hours of the night. She suddenly appears before the belated citizen in a noiseless manner, and as suddenly disappears. On two or three occasions she has given chase, and the frightened individuals declare it is with only the fleetest running that they have been able to keep out of the way. And on one occasion an attempt was made to capture the spirit, but after a chase of several squares she suddenly disappeared from view, and further chase was abandoned. Many stories are rife as to the true nature of the apparition. Many superstitious persons believe it to be the spirit of a woman who died recently, after months of great suffering, and that her spirit has returned to harass the city. It has resulted in keeping a great many children in off the streets after dark, and a few older ones, too."

J. M. White is now located at Marshalltown, Iowa, where he can be addressed.

The Chicago Chronicle has the following from Toledo, Ohio: "Hypnotism has played an important part in the sensational elopement and marriage of pretty Marie Nassr, 17 years old, daughter of Michael Nassr, the wealthy Monroe street wholesale fruit dealer. Friday the girl disappeared and the frantic father appealed to the police. The girl finally telegraphed from Dayton that she had been married and begged her father to come and get her. Miss Nassr was married to Ameen George Yarid, a peddler of Oriental rugs, whose home is in New York. He came to Toledo about two weeks ago and met the girl in her father's office. Yarid accepted an invitation to visit the home of his countryman and while there declared his love for the girl. She declined his attentions, she says, but he met her alone on this occasion and looked her steadily in the eye. She described the sensation as 'creepy' and told her parents she was afraid of the strange young man. He called at the office several times and she says that he exerted a peculiar influence over her. She remembers nothing of the trip to Dayton and has no knowledge, she says, of a marriage ceremony being performed. When the girl was told by the young man that she was his wife she scorned him and her first act was to telegraph for her father, who went to Dayton and brought her home. The groom was left in Dayton. The girl is of the Oriental type of beauty. She has taken a course in commercial business and has assisted her father at his office in the capacity of bookkeeper."

Mrs. Hattie Cooper Westlake writes from Marshalltown, Iowa: "The First Spiritualist Church of this city is in a flourishing condition; services every Sunday evening; great interest is manifested in the work, and we hope soon to have a lyceum. Mr. John D. Vail is our president, and having the cause of Spiritualism at heart, he works with a will for the good of that cause. I am the pastor of the church for the present. Our State convention was very successful, and accomplished good work. Mr. Harrison D. Barrett and myself were the speakers; Mrs. McCoy and Mr. Wheeler, test mediums. I would like to make engagements for camp-meetings as a lecturer and musician. Address me in care of The Stoddard."

Dr. D. M. King, of Manfua, Ohio, will answer calls to attend funerals, and fill lecture engagements for the balance of the winter, either by the Sunday or by the month; also can fill camp engagements during June, and a part of July and August. Will serve as chairman or as lecturer, with psychic lessons during the week. Societies who wish to increase their membership, please address as above."

C. H. Mathews writes from New Philadelphia, Ohio: "The Boston Traveler, from which you quote, tells of a seance held at Mrs. C—'s, and to 'their amazement,' the three spirits of Lucille and Helen Weston and daughter, materialized and sang, etc. The names of these arisen spirits is Western. They were fine star actresses forty years ago. I saw them on the stage in Cincinnati and the East, when Mrs. Bliss gave seances at my parlors in 1888. These girls came and gave us a grand matinee. Lucille sang a verse from the Bohemian girl, and posed and dressed as of yore. Their best doings are in presence of Mrs. C. B. Bliss. Those who know them are no longer 'amazed' at their manifestations. The spirits rap their approval while I make this correction and indorsement."

J. M. Holladay writes from Council Bluffs, Iowa: "Sunday, Jan. 19, brought victory for the new philosophy here. Mrs. Fritz, of Omaha, was touched with great force from above, excelling her former self. Mr. Thompson, of Fullerton, Neb., made an excellent address, which the audience received with clapping of hands. Mr. Thompson is on the National Association board. This was at the Rudd meeting, on Twentieth street, presided over by Capt. Witty. At the up-town meeting, in Justice Bryant's office, Madame Russell conducted the evening services, giving her usual satisfaction. Wilson Duncan aids the meetings with a skillful use of the violin, and with singing. Mrs. Rudd never fails to provide seats for all who attend the meetings at her house, and pleases every one."

When writing for this paper use a pen or typewriter.

Mrs. R. Maynard writes from Victoria, B. C.: "On reading The Progressive Thinker of January 4, I came across the piece, 'Her Half Century Mark.' I found it was a birthday party of Mrs. G. Partridge, No. 2576 Fulton street, Chicago, and the novel feature of the Scripture cake, giving the recipe for it. Now, as my birthday is in January, I thought I would hunt up that recipe, and make a Scripture cake, too. I did so, and it was a success as well as a great novelty. Quite a number came in to try it, and said it was good, and a great novelty. Thanks to Mrs. Partridge for the recipe. Solomon's prescription for making a good boy, Proverbs 23d chapter and 11th verse, should be 13th verse."

W. C. Mann writes from Louisville, Ky.: "Christmas Eve, as the clock was striking the hour of 8, there marched up the aisle of Speed Memorial Temple, to the strains of the organ, Mr. Edgar Burchy and Mrs. Anna Gladen, the beautiful and accomplished daughter of Mr. and Mrs. C. Kircher, of 1506 Van Buren street, who were joined in wedlock by the Rev. Mary Mann. The bride carried a bouquet of pink roses, that had been produced at a materializing seance the evening before. The services were very beautiful and impressive. Mr. and Mrs. Burchy will be at home to their friends at 520 Clay street."

Ralph Wilson writes as follows from Joliet, Ill., in reference to "Chas H. Foster and Company of Mediums": "The enclosed advertisements speak for themselves. I did not attend the meeting, as I knew from the glaring advertisement what it would be, but the information I have comes from a reliable source. Following the usual custom of these fellows, the 'Doctor' said he was very sorry, but his wife had been taken suddenly sick, and could not be present. Spiritualists were ignored when the call was made for a committee. The 'Doctor' spoke of the effects he carried. Genuine mediums do not carry such 'truck' around with them. I ask the friends to beware of this fellow." A Joliet paper says: "There was not much to mark any difference between the alleged Spiritualistic seances of Charles H. Foster Sunday night at the Joliet theatre from any ordinary trickster or magician. And what is more disappointing, there were no ghosts and unseen hands to distribute flowers among the audience. Mr. Foster spent a great deal of time telling the audience it was not trickery, but the result of an unseen force. Before proceeding with each number he would explain how some magician or trickster had done it, and then show how it would be impossible for him to do it the same way. He gave one example of slate-writing, one of mental telegraphy, one of the trausmutation of water. A few more experiments he did with his cabinet, sometimes with one of the investigating committee. In practically all the cabinet experiments he was well bound and sealed up. The most mysterious and best of his performance was the disappearance of his assistant who was placed in a box and covered with a cloth nailed to the floor [a trick, of course]. The curtains of the cabinet were drawn shut. After a brief wait, the cabinet was opened, and in the semi-darkness there could be seen a sheet as though wrapped around the body of a person. This alleged materialization took place at the end of the cabinet opposite to where the assistant had been placed. When the cloth was removed from the box containing the man he was not there, but he came bounding from the audience. The performance was not one that could convince anyone in the slightest of the truths of Spiritualism, although the investigation committee of reliable citizens assured the audience that there was no trap door under the cabinet, and no way for a person to get through the back part of the stage curtain which was all in one piece. The committee was on the stage all the time examining various instruments used. How Mr. Mr. Foster was able to take off a pair of handcuffs fastened on his wrists by one of Joliet's policemen, and put them on a pitcher and chair was one of the mysteries of the evening [a trick any magician can do.]"

L. writes from Detroit, Mich.: "Dr. Julia M. Walton spoke Sunday afternoon and evening to large audiences, at 333 Michigan avenue. The Earnest Workers are gaining in numbers, strength and usefulness. They are working together with the utmost cheer and harmony. During the week a delightful surprise party was given to Mrs. Sharlow, the secretary, on her forty-third birthday. By a clever ruse her husband induced her to attend an early evening entertainment and kept her away from home until 9 o'clock. Meantime the Earnest Workers poured in and took possession of the house. After arranging the presents, among which conspicuously was a beautiful lamp, reflecting a soft red light, a glass water set, an aquarium with gold fish, and other nice things, the company took possession of the organ and music began. Amid the din of happy voices, Mr. and Mrs. Sharlow entered their home. Her first impression in the uproarous welcome was that the house was on fire, for the first thing she did was to take off her watch and chain, an impossible feat over a spreading Gainborough hat. The ladies came to her relief, and lodged her on the piano stool. For a moment she wilted right down, and owned up this was the first time she ever had a surprise. Just here she endured the ordeal of having a poem read to her by the scribe, saying nice things about the event. It was a sort of deed in verse to the gifts presented. A general good time followed, in which refreshments, song, music and dancing were a part, which was kept up until 1 o'clock. Another event was a combination farewell reception to Mr. and Mrs. Dawm, at the home of Vice-president Stacey. Mrs. D. had for a long time presided at the piano at the hall, and both were most active Earnest Workers. They were lovingly remembered by a letter of gratitude from the society, which accompanied some appropriate gifts. Not an unimportant part of this happy meeting was the presence of a little twelve-day-old angel boy, that swung in a modern cradle. The baby was admired by all, and Mr. and Mrs. Stacey were heartily congratulated. This social gathering was a most enjoyable one. Three mediums were under control, and all giving tests at the same time. The refreshments were abundant. Miss Mabel Goucher will preside at the piano. Mrs. Walton will speak at least once a month, it is hoped, for the Earnest Workers."

Henry Brockbank, the English medium for inspirational lectures, platform tests and automatic pictures, is open for engagements at camps, or with societies from March 1, 1902. Address him at 27 East Washington street, Fort Wayne, Ind.

G. H. Brooks writes: "I close my labors in Newport, Ky., the last Sunday in January, and return to my home in Wheaton, Ill., at once, where I will remain until either Saturday or Sunday, when I will go to Milwaukee, Wis., to serve the Unity Society for February and March. I am very anxious to do missionary work during the week in Wisconsin and Northern Illinois, and desire to correspond with all who would like to get up meetings. All mail and telegrams for me should be sent to 220 Mason street, the home of Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Bump. I will as soon as settled, give my stopping place."

Geo. W. Brownson speaks very favorably of the lectures and tests of Nellie Baade, at Jackson, Mich.

Stella A. Kerns writes from Worcester, Mass.: "The People's Spiritualist Society held its Sunday evening meeting, and as usual when Madam Bruce, of Boston, is with us, the house was crowded. There was a good attendance at the Monday evening circle, the Madam reading from articles."

Henry Brockbank writes from Fort Wayne, Ind.: "The First Spiritualist Church of Fort Wayne, has awakened again into renewed activity under the newly elected president, Mr. Pearce, who is an old and staunch worker for the society. He is a good trumpet medium despite the fact that he is not a professional, and only sits occasionally for the amusement of himself and friends. Mr. Brindle, a genial aggressive worker, is the secretary and treasurer of the society. Mrs. Brindle's spirit messages do much to convince the skeptic of the truth of spirit return, whilst Mr. Miller's psychometric character readings attest to his psychic ability and the phenomenon of Spiritualism. Mrs. Dr. Sweringen is the able president of the Ladies Aid Society, and is ably seconded in her efforts by the wife of the president, Mrs. Pearce, and also by Mrs. Powers, at whose home the Ladies' Aid meets every Wednesday. Although well along in years, and not enjoying the best of health, Mrs. Powers is always with her old-time fervor trying to devise some new way to help and strengthen the society. We have been serving the society with lectures and platform tests every Sunday evening since Dec. 22. Our audiences, although not very large, are intelligent, and evince by repeated attendance and steady increase that the writers efforts are appreciated. Sunday, Jan. 19, the writer after the regular lecture gave as a slight change from the regular test, some life-size spirit pictures, in crayon, from the rostrum, giving names and descriptions also, which made them all readily recognized. The friends of the society are a genial and agreeable crowd of people, and did space permit we would like to give all their names. E. E. Parker, crystal reader and trumpet medium, is doing a grand work, and is making many converts to truth. We consider him, all in all, as one of the finest public mediums we have had the pleasure of coming in contact with. He submits on every occasion to test conditions, and on many occasions has given very satisfactory seances under absolute test conditions to a crowd of skeptics, many of whom were prominent business men of the city. The prospects for Spiritualism look very bright in Ft. Wayne, and although the prejudice is strong in some directions, yet that can be overcome in course of time. We expect to continue with the society until the end of February, after which date we are open for engagements at camps, or with societies." Address Henry Brockbank, the English medium for inspirational lectures, automatic spirit pictures and platform tests, 27 East Washington street, Fort Wayne, Ind."

E. F. Yeaton writes from Richmond, Va.: "Our society at this time has Mrs. Kate R. Stiles, of Boston, Mass., who is doing a grand work for the cause of Spiritualism in this place. She is desirous of working in the West and South during the Autumn of 1902. Societies desiring her services can correspond with her, and letters can be addressed at No. 71 Pearl street, Charlestown, Mass."

D. A. Morrill writes: "We have been here at Conklin, Mich., for the past week, and have made a good many converts to Spiritualism. We expect to stay here another week, then I will go to Coopersville. My wife and I are holding trumpet seances. We will go from Coopersville to Grand Haven."

R. McLaren Angus writes from Cleveland, O: "I am working hard to draw all the meanms into harmony with each other; also the Spiritualists. I will be engaged until the 30th of March in the Superior street church. After that date I will be open for engagements. I would like to take hold of some weak society. Terms very reasonable. Address me at No. 260 Woodland avenue."

G. W. Kates and wife had successful meetings in Gallipolis, Ohio, January 17 to 22; Lancaster 23 and 24; Springfield, 26 to 30. They will be in Cincinnati, February 1 to 5, and Evansville, Ind., 6 to 10.

Last week Will C. Hodge started for California, and will stop at San Diego. Mr. Hodge has been long and favorably known as a most excellent man, devoted at all times and places to the best interests of our cause. His lectures are logical, instructive, and at times eloquent, and our California friends can now have an opportunity of hearing him. His address for the present will be San Diego.

The Band of Harmony will give a special entertainment on Thursday even-January 30, in its regular meeting-place, Room 020 Handel Hall, 40 Randolph street. An interesting program has been prepared, and it is hoped a large attendance will be present at the entertainment.

Geo. A. Kiehl writes from Lancaster, Pa.: "Mr. and Mrs. E. W. Sprague, missionaries for the N. S. A., have just completed a course of public lectures here on Spiritualism, the first ones ever held in this city of 45,000 inhabitants. These worthy people have organized a society here of thirty members who have applied for a charter from the N. S. A. It took a mighty effort to succeed in sowing the golden seeds of Spiritualism in a place like this, but these worthy souls were equal to it. May the angel world stand by our side, and bless this newly prepared field, and may all lovers of truth and light send us their best thoughts and wishes."

L. H. Warren writes: "I am very much gratified with the stand Brother Moses Hull has taken and the effort he is making to make a success of Brother Pratt's donation of his fine building for a college that shall be free from sectarian bias, and I hope every Spiritualist—yes, and every Liberal in America will feel it their duty to do something to help this grand enterprise along. I am an old man, with an invalid wife, and am an invalid myself, but we will do all we can with our influence and money to help push this grand enterprise to a completion. I would suggest that it be named Pratt's Non-Sectarian College, where any young man or woman can get an education as free from sectarian bias as the air they breathe. I hope that every Spiritualist will feel that in order to make it a grand success they must add their influence and their mite."

C. H. Mathews writes: "I am this day in receipt of Dr. R. F. Austin's book, 'What Converted Me to Spiritualism.' It contains the testimony of one hundred intelligent, brainy people, as to how they cut loose from the antiquated Christian Dogmas that have held the world in intellectual bondage for over 2,000 years. To know that the grave does not end all, and that there will be a hereafter, has been the mission of Spiritualism, with its phenomena, to establish beyond the shadow of a doubt. To Mr. B. F. Austin and his intelligent contributors, we owe a debt of gratitude for the light they have shed upon a benighted world."

B. Frank Schmid writes from Indianapolis, Ind.: "During the past two months we have had with us Amanda Coffman, of Grand Rapids, Mich., whose teaching of the philosophy of Spiritualism has been of great benefit to many just entering on the threshold of our cause we love so well. She teaches a religion of love, of truth and of progression, and we naturally become infilled with her own illumination, and our souls respond to the inspiration of the new thought and a newer cycle and action permeate the life forces of all that love truth. Her test work is most satisfactory, and brings comfort to many a sorrowing soul, and the members of The First Spiritualist Church have been greatly benefited by her ministration. Societies will do well to engage her, as they will not be disappointed. During the month of February Manna Strafford, of New York City, will serve our organization, and we look forward with much interest to her coming."

ORDINATION CERTIFICATES

Practical Suggestions and Recommendations.

I was very much pleased to notice in a recent issue of The Progressive Thinker a communication from the pen of Brother D. W. Hull, of Norton, Kansas, relating to the matter of granting ordination certificates, and other forms of authority to act as an official representative of the cause of Spiritualism.

I am now prepared to admit that Spiritualism as a whole, is less ably represented than formerly.

The columns of The Progressive Thinker, Banner of Light, Light of Truth, and the well read issues of other Spiritualistic literature controvert the assertion. Nevertheless, it is apparent to all, I think, that in the ratio of the demand made upon us by an earnest and ever increasing constituency, for exact information and competent representation, we are in arrears to a humiliating degree.

However, we are beginning to study causes, and Brother Hull, in my opinion, has called our attention to one of them. The injudicious issue of ordination certificates, though actuated by the best of motives, has had the effect of lowering the standard in certain quarters, and as a consequence the general public has failed to grasp the true meaning and import of our helpful philosophy. Many certificates have been issued to applicants wholly incompetent to meet the responsibilities assumed, while others have applied for and received them simply as a modifying influence of the moral lapses of the past, or to prepare the way for the practice of unsanitly virtues—in the future. Men will still "steal the livery of heaven to serve the devil in."

Whatever the motive, the Spiritualistic movement has been retarded.

Like Brother Hull, we think it time to call a halt, and if possible, devise some general system operative throughout the several states—or perhaps better—one national in its application.

We need not follow in detail the methods employed by the old school of thought, yet it might not be out of place to follow in a general way those systems that have been productive of good results in the past.

Our orthodox friends require a special theological training of those who enter the ministry. Our lawyers, doctors, and all professional men and women are expected to produce the evidence that they have qualified themselves for the work in hand. Even the common artisan and mechanic must give proof of efficiency, if they would occupy the best positions. And these requirements are leading to higher standards and better results. How much more important that we, who claim to be able to prove the great fact of immortality, should see that no mistakes are made in the selection of those who publicly represent us. It is but fair to state that not all of these mistakes have been made by state or National associations. There are not a few incorporated societies, operating independently, that are issuing certificates in much the same manner as our merchants dispose of their surplus stock.

Not long since, one of the "solicitors" from one of these organizations approached the writer with the proposition to resign as president of a local society, sever connection with state and national, and be "ordained," etc., and all for the sum of one dollar in United States coin. The party of the first part meant well, perhaps, but the party of the second part did not feel complimented.

Merit, competency, and system as to authority, are three leading requisites in this matter, and the sooner adopted the better for all concerned. In this state (Washington) only the state board can grant certificates of ordination. The locals can only recommend the applicant. The locals can only recommend the applicant. The State Spiritualist Association, of which the writer is a member, has the most stringent regulations, before a recommendation can be issued. Among others, it is required that "the applicant shall have been an approved public worker for a period of at least one year; that he shall have been a member of the local chartered society for at least six months. That application shall be referred to a special committee, and shall lie upon the table at least one month. Our progress may be a little slow, but it is better, and more enduring.

This movement suggested by Brother Hull should be heartily endorsed. We are demanding recognition as a distinctive scientific and religious cult; and it becomes our bounden duty to as fully and faithfully represent the principles and policies involved, as circumstances will permit.

I am glad to believe that hopeful signs are appearing upon the horizon of Spiritualism.

In our city our cause is taking an upward tendency, slowly but surely our standard is rising, both within and without our ranks, and the good work will take a new impetus all along the line when we succeed in getting our best material to the front.

The Seattle Spiritual Association is receiving at present, the ministrations of that ceaseless worker, Brother W. J. Colville. It is needless to say that he will leave a marked impression upon the minds of our people. There are few like him in talent and endurance.

While the various duties placed upon us are being met, let us unite, if possible, in a uniform system through which to place able and conscientious workers in our public work.

A MISSIONARY ITEM.

G. W. Kates Offers Some Stirring Words.

As Spiritualist missionaries we meet much that taxes and worries us, and we get much that aids and comforts us. Perhaps the balance is in favor of the good. Yet, we are always prone to speak of the defects and mistakes, in order to offer correctives and preventives. No class of persons should examine their conduct and allegiance more than the Spiritualists. And none should be more praised for good work than they who stand out boldly for the truth and right. We meet the latter nearly everywhere; and our cause is promising because of it. Such people increase the "grit" of the missionaries to go ahead; and we in turn infuse new courage in their already resolute intentions for public espousal.

But the writers of pessimistic despair always chills us and makes our life sad as we contemplate their cowardice and lethargy.

The time has come not to mince matters in relation to the advance of Spiritualism in localities. It is too often plain cowardice that prevents the missionary from getting help in localities to hold meetings there. We write encouragingly and offer our services on any basis that can be made agreeable or possible. We often agree to assume all expense—and never ask a positive fee. We do ask to have a hall and entertainment supplied us if possible. When this is not a possibility, we are always willing to go if some one will attend to the arrangements for us at our expense. We offer every possible inducement to hold meetings. What more can we do in the name of the N. S. A.? Yet, we are often told that the N. S. A. should hold meetings free of any charge and not worry the audience by taking a collection, and pay all bills incurred—purely to help spread the truths of Spiritualism. That sounds well! It would be noble of the N. S. A.

But, the only trouble is, we would attract to our meetings the idiotic and miserly hypocrites who have such small souls that we could not impress them with a truth, nor get them to utilize a spirit message for aught else than in the interests of their deceits and dollars. But these poor benighted souls need a missionary! What shall we do? How shall we get the means to supply the need?

Will some such persons please tell us how we can do all they desire of us? Perhaps many good people much poorer in the world's good will supply the N. S. A. treasury. Such are usually the most liberal contributors.

Listen, dear friends, to the following cries from the wilderness, lately received by us from two really most excellent little cities, and you will see how some places need a missionary and a brave leader:

"We have a great many Spiritualists here, but the trouble is they don't want any one to know it. You could not get them organized; and I doubt if you could get half a dozen of them into a public hall to hear a lecture."

Would you call such phenomenalists Spiritualists? This is the boasted condition that the so-called scientific Spiritualism develops.

Would not a little religion help such materialists—for they are not Spiritualists?

Perhaps some hell-fire might burn away the mental dross. Listen again:

"This place is not ready for the work you do. While there are possibly one or two hundred Spiritualists here, only one man besides myself comes out and says so. A good medium to do private work is first needed here. One they can call on without attracting attention. As for hall work, all of the city officials are against it. The people here are very narrow and creed-bound. Churches rule everything."

And so will the people continue and the churches rule until we can get some brave Spiritualist in such localities. We need the missionary work! I publish this to prove it.

And I propose that a fund be created to send the N. S. A. president and either Mr. and Mrs. Sprague, or Mrs. Kates and self, with him, with an agent in advance to secure halls and advertise. Get all the local help possible, charge a door fee and present Spiritualism to the people. The routes to be arranged should include in rotation every locality. Stop one or two nights in each place and let the people know that Spiritualism is the great truth and the Spiritualists the best people on earth. If we can get money enough, make the meetings free and take voluntary collections. Let the world know that we are alive! We are fooling with the missionary work. We must go at it with vigor! We cannot afford to any longer have hypocrites amongst the Spiritualists, and if possible cure all such amongst the Spiritists.

No one sees the need I herein expose, more than does each of the N. S. A. missionaries. I believe that a brave attack upon the citadels of bigotry is necessary, and will result in great good to our cause, both financially and spiritually. I will freely give my service, without extra remuneration, and so will Mrs. Kates, Mr. and Mrs. Sprague and President Barrett, I am sure.

The effort is worthy of a trial. When the financial backing is assured, the work will be done. And no district needs it more, and perhaps would produce better results than the Ohio river valley from Wheeling, W. Va., to Cairo, Ill.

Let us shake some of the dry bones!

GEORGE W. KATES.

DO YOU SUFFER FROM

ASTHMA?

If so, Send Your Name and Address Today for the Greatest Discovery Ever Made for a Permanent Cure, It Is Sent You Absolutely FREE.

A new and Positive Cure for Asthma has been found in the Kola Plant, a rare botanic product of West African origin. So great are the powers of this New Remedy that in the short time since its discovery it has come into almost universal use in the Hospitals of Europe and America for the cure of every form of Asthma. The cures wrought by it are really marvelous. Among others, Rev. J. L. Combs, of Martinsburg, West Va., was cured of Asthma of thirty years' standing, and Mr. Alfred Lewis, the editor of the Farmer's Magazine of Washington, D. C., testifies that after eight years continuous suffering, especially in Hay-fever season, the Kola Plant completely cured him. He was so bad that he could not lie down, night or day for fear of choking. After fifteen years' suffering from the worst form of Asthma, Mrs. A. McDonald, of Victor, Iowa, writes that the Kola Plant, cured her in two weeks. Rev. S. H. Eisenberg, Center Hall, Pa., Rev. John L. Moore, Alice, S. C.; Mr. Frank C. Newall, of the Market National Bank, Boston, and many others give similar testimony of their cure of Asthma after five to twenty years' suffering, by this wonderful new remedy. If you suffer from Asthma in any form, in order to prove the power of this new botanic discovery, we will send you one Large Case by Mail entirely free. All that we request in return is that when cured yourself you will tell your neighbors about it. It costs you absolutely nothing. Send your address to The Kola Importing Company, No. 1164 Broadway New York City.

A WONDERFUL SHRUB—CURES

KIDNEY AND BLADDER

Diseases, Rheumatism, etc.

Rev. A. C. Darling, Minister of the Gospel, under date of May 20th, writes from his home at North Constantia, Oswego county, New York:

I have been troubled with Kidney and kindred diseases for 10 years, and tried all I could get without relief. Two and a half years ago I was taken with a severe attack of La Grippe, which turned to pneumonia. At that time my Liver, Kidneys, Heart and Urinary Organs all combined in what to me seemed their last attack. My confidence in man and medicine had gone. My hope had vanished, and all that was left me was a dreary life and certain death. At last I heard of Alkavis, and as a last resort I commenced taking it. At that time I was using the vessel as often as sixteen times in one night, without sleep or rest. In a short time to my astonishment, I could sleep all night as soundly as a baby, which I had not done in sixteen years before. What I know it has done for me I firmly believe it will do for all who will give Alkavis a fair trial. I most gladly recommend Alkavis to all. Sincerely yours,

(Rev.) A. C. DARLING.

The venerable Mr. Joseph W. Whitten, of Wolfboro, N. H., at eighty-five years of age, also testifies to the powers of Alkavis in curing severe Kidney and Bladder Disorders, Dropsy and Rheumatism. Hundreds of others give similar testimony. Many ladies also join in testifying to the wonderful curative powers of Alkavis in Kidney and allied diseases, and other troublesome afflictions peculiar to womanhood, which cannot with propriety be described here.

That you may judge of the value of this Great Discovery for yourself, we will send you one Large Case by mail Free, only asking that when cured yourself you will recommend it to others. It is a Sure Specific Cure and can not fail. Address, The Church Kidney Cure Company, No. 401 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

This work essays to utilize and explain the vast array of facts in its field of research by referring them to a common cause, and from them arise to the laws and conditions of Man's spiritual being. Third edition. Price, 75 cents.

RELIGION OF MAN AND ETHICS OF SCIENCE.

Not servile trust to the Gods, but knowledge of the laws of the world, belief in the divinity of man and his eternal progress toward perfection is the foundation of this book. Price, $1.

LIFE IN TWO SPHERES.

In this story the scenes are laid on earth, and in the spirit world, presenting the spiritual philosophy and the real life of spiritual beings. All questions which arise on that subject are answered. Price, 50 cents.

ARCANA OF NATURE.

The History and Laws of Creation. Revised and annotated English edition. "The Cosmogony of Spiritualism." Price, $1.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF SRIRIT AND THE SPIRIT WORLD.

English edition. Price, $1.

THE ORIGIN AND ANTIQUITY OF MAN.

Containing the latest investigations and discoveries, and a thorough presentation of this interesting subject. English edition. Price, $1.

THE SECRETS OF THE CONVENT OF THE SACRED HEART.

This book was written for an object, and has been pronounced equal in its exposure of the diabolical methods of Catholicism to "Uncle Tom's Cabin." Price, 25 cents.

HERESY, OR LED TO THE LIGHT.

A thrilling psychological story of evangelization and free thought. It is to Protestantism what "The Secrets of the Convent" is to Catholicism. Price, 30 cents.

WHAT IS SPIRITUALISM?

How to investigate. How to form circles, and develop and cultivate mediumship. Names of eminent Spiritualists. Their testimony. Eight-page tract for mission work. Single copies, 5 cents; 100 for $1.25.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

"American": Q. What do you think of swearing? Is there any great sin in doing so?

A. It is said that no savage races swear, and so far as the literature of the ancient pagan peoples informs us, swearing in the modern sense of the word, was unknown to them. The commandment against swearing has no reference to the profanity of to-day. Among many peoples the very name of the one great God has been held too sacred for utterance. It must not be spoken, and various means of phraseology and euphony were employed to avoid so doing. This is not strange when it is considered that among them it was considered treason to speak aloud the name of this ruler.

The injunction was not against profanity but against speaking the name at all. With a more perfect knowledge of the relations of man to that which passes for God, it cannot be entertained that the Creator is in any way injured or offended by anything man can say, and whatever injury may come is to man himself.

Swearing is the language of passion and is its intense expression. Its use at once shows want of self-control, or the yielding of the higher faculties to the lower. The most that can be said in defense is that it is used to give emphasis.

But does it do so? Rather does it not weaken? Which had you rather a friend would call you, a good and true man, or a damned good fellow?" In one case it would be praise, in the other it would be questionable in what way you were a "good fellow." One who would call forth praise in such language would at once be judged of unenviable character.

If a stranger should make a statement, would anyone believe the more fully because he had begun it with a "By ——?"

Rather the oath would reveal a character liable to be swayed by impulses and desires.

It is said that General Taylor, when his men were rushing on the enemy, and covering the field with the dead, raised in his stirrups, and waving his sword, cried, "Give them hell, boys; give them hell!" and Admiral Schley, in the heat of battle, when it was suggested that the Texas would be in his way, said, "Damn the Texas." These phrases were the language of passion at white heat, and in the carnage of battle, if anywhere, have place. Yet, do they belittle the hero, and show that instead of the cool judgment of a commander, for the moment at least, the tiger had control?

Swearing is the dialect of the saloon, the house of shame, the dive and the slum. It comes from the swollen lips of the drunkard, the prostitute, the abandoned. It is the vernacular of the criminal class.

It never ornaments, intensifies, or illuminates speech, but always drags it into the gutter.

The man who constantly calls on God to damn everything he dislikes, damns it himself, and damns himself at last. His thoughts grow into the diabolic words with which he expresses them.

Hence, although it may not be a "sin" to use profane words with thoughtless abandon; a sin as the religious world understands the term, it is a vicious habit, without one redeeming quality, and its indulgence weakens the self-control which should be the one great object of life to maintain. The constant effort to express the thought in pure phraseology, reacts on the mind, and strengthens the higher spiritual faculties.

I. T.: Q. How many Jews are there in the world?

A. The Hebrews are indeed a scattered people. While the number in all the world is estimated at something over 6,000,000, in Palestine, their alleged home, there are but 25,000. Yet this "scattering of the nation," cannot be claimed as the fulfillment of prophecy, for there never was a time recorded in their history when they were not. And when their strict adhesion to their laws and customs is considered, their arrogant claim of being a distinct people especially favored by God, which holds them fast to their traditions, and prevents intermarriage with other peoples, the preservation of their distinct nationality requires no miraculous interpolation.

In despotic Russia or free America, among Mohammedans, Buddhists or Christians, the Jew adapts himself to circumstances, yields when he must, but retains his race characteristics, and belongs to the God-favored race.

B. F. French, Arizona: Q. (1) Does the North Pole always point to the polar star?

(2) Does not the northern hemisphere receive more sunlight and heat than the southern? and does not this account for the greater amount of ice said to be at the southern pole?

(3) What of the prediction of scientists that there will be polar displacement by which cities will be destroyed and continents made waste?

A. (1) The form of the earth, that of an oblate spheroid, received by rotation on its axis when first launched into space, absolutely prevents any change in the position of the poles. There is a slight movement of the poles around a mean point, a wabbling, as is sometimes seen in the stem of a top in rotation within itself, so that the mean direction is always the same.

To assert that there has been a change in the position of the poles, is contrary to the well-known laws of motion, and shows ignorance of their mathematical demonstration.

The North Pole does not point to the polar star unchangeably, and the position of the star is accidental. It recedes from the pole year by year in the slow but wonderful procession of the stars. Bright and conspicuous as is the polar star, it belongs to that class of stars so remote, that their least distance only can be determined, and for this star it is 2,062,650 times the distance of the sun from the earth (92,000,000 miles) or a space that would take light traveling 192,000 miles in a second, thirty-two years. Hence it will be appreciated how vast the movements must be at such distances to be recognized even in centuries.

(2) At present the northern hemisphere receives more sunlight and heat than the southern, for the summer is seven and a half days longer than the winter. This, however, is a condition not perpetual, as after some millions of years the summer will be shorter and the winter longer, the southern hemisphere having the reverse. But this does not account for the present difference in climate between the Arctic and Antarctic zones. This must be sought in the preponderance of land in the north, and of water in the south, and the direction of the vast oceanic currents which introduce the warm water of the tropics into the northern seas.

(3) No "scientist" worthy of the name has ever made such prediction. Such prophecies came always from the ignorant, or by those whose egotism is inflated by a smattering of knowledge they have illy digested.

Scholar: Q. Is President Roosevelt the author of the phrase, "a strenuous life," now so much used?

A. President Roosevelt published a book in 1900, under the title, "The Strenuous Life," which popularized this expressive phrase.

"Z." Q. (1) What is the velocity of electricity?

(2) Do the waves of the primary colors, which blended make white light, have the same velocity of transmission?

A. (1) Calculated at 288,000 miles per second. Probably future investigations will show that currents of different intensity have different velocities.

(2) While each primary color depends on the rapidity of its undulations, or vibrations of the ether, the velocity of all in space must be the same, or the light would be colored instead of white.

Prof. Rudolph: Q. Can "water on the brain" in childhood or youth be produced by prenatal causes? and by what causes?

A. Interference with early growth, by illness of the mother, overwork or mental strain might produce nervous weakness in the child resulting in dropsy of the brain or hydrocephalus. So many causes might lead to this effect that it would be difficult to select one from the other.

Heredity might have the effect to make the brain of the child more susceptible to degeneration and secretion of serum from the blood, but it is not entertainable that "water on the brain" is a disease that is transmissible from parents to children, otherwise than a tendency.

Doings at Lake Helen, Florida.

The meeting Jan. 19, was very gratifying to all who are interested in Spiritualism and the Southern Cassadaga Camp. The pavilion was crowded and chairs had to be brought from the hotel to accommodate visitors.

The speaker was Dr. Hilligoss, president of Camp Chesterfield, Indiana. He welcomed all as brothers and sisters and described in detail the different manifestations of "love," as brotherly and sisterly love; the love of a friend to a friend, a mother to a child, the love set for an example by Christ when he spoke, "Love ye one another!" or the love to do good to all; and finally celestial love, or God in man, which ever prompts mankind to conquer selfishness and unfold spiritually by doing our duty to one another.

When we have reached and understand that love, the speaker claimed, then Spiritualism will no longer be stigmatized by society, and even the most learned men will embrace its truth and acknowledge that Spiritualism is the only religion which proves the truth of its teaching: spirit return or spirit communion.

My pen is too poor to express the beautiful thoughts brought out by the speaker. He seemed to be carried beyond himself and feel the power of love (God) all through his lecture.

The president, Mr. Bond, thanked him with words prompted by the deepest emotion. He then continued: It is very gratifying to me to know what great talent we have among ourselves before the regular season commences. I have in my hand a communication which was handed to me to-day by Mrs. Thompson, with the request that it be read publicly and delivered to him for whom it is intended. It reads as follows:

Lake Helen, Fla., Jan. 16, 1902.

We, the unoersigned, have recently listened to a series of lectures by C. Hagen, entitled, "The Laws of Nature, or How to Obtain Health, Wealth and Happiness."

To say that we are well pleased with the same does not nearly express our feeling of gratitude towards Mr. Hagen.

We cannot but admire his sincerity and simplicity in demonstrating the truth of his teachings and their practical application to individual needs.

We sincerely believe that all who listen to his teachings and follow his instructions will be greatly benefited, and will become better men and women.

Signed: Mrs. O. B. Webster, Mrs. Elizabeth Hatch, Ira W. Hatch, Dora E. White, Mr. and Mrs. Hardy, Mrs. E. E. Anderson, Mrs. M. White, Miss Marguerite Webster, Elizabeth H. Thompson, Mrs. Mary A. Estep, Mrs. C. C. Francis, Mame H. Coburn.

Of course Mr. Hagen was greatly surprised and very thankful for such high esteem shown to him by his scholars.

Then Sister Carrie E. S. Twing invited all "gentlemen" to a tea party for Wednesday afternoon, requesting them to bring their teacups and spoons along as well as their ladies, and promising lots of surprises for all gentlemen accepting this invitation. Have you ever heard of a gentlemen tea party? I fancy that I will have to write again and let your readers know something about this latest scientific discovery of Sister Twing, a "gentlemen tea party."

VERITAS.

"Encyclopedia of Biblical Spiritualism, or a Concordance of the Principal Passages of the Old and New Testament Scriptures which prove or imply Spiritualism; together with a brief history of the origin of many of the important books of the Bible." By Moses Hull. The well-known talented and scholarly author has here embodied the results of his many years' study of the Bible in its relations to Spiritualism. A VALIANT REFORMER GONE

A Tribute to a Humanitarian Worker.

In the vanguard force opposing cruelty and injustice in all forms, especially as shown in vivisection, has for many years stood Mrs. Fairchild-Allen, strong, brave, and unflinching, resolved to work until death in the cause she espoused from earnest conviction; and she worked as few human educators have ever done, to spread the gospel of mercy and make the world better. The good she accomplished, and the self-sacrificing spirit with which she did it, can only be known to those who have tried to carry on reform work, in any line, with limited means. She was a strong and facile writer and produced many stories which were widely circulated. She edited and published a magazine, "Anti-Vivisection," which was a revelation to those who had revered scientific research and asked no questions. Mrs. Allen clearly defined the heretofore mysterious horror, and the public came to understand it. They were made to realize that in making a vivisector there is great danger of producing a demon.

"Vivisection is the cutting up of live animals—also poisoning, burning, freezing, smothering, breaking the bones, irritating the bared nerves with electricity, dissecting out the stomach and other organs, etc. It is done in nearly all the universities and medical colleges of the world. Anaesthetics frequently cannot be employed—according to the published records of the vivisectors.

The range and variety of experimentation and consequent suffering is most graphically described by Dr. Matthew Woods, president of the American Anti-Vivisection Society, in an article in the Journal of Zoophily, of Philadelphia. He says, "It is not alone the cutting of the flesh that is called vivisection, but the brain-burnings of Goltz, the bakings alive of Bernard, the crucifixions of Mantegazza, the electric stimulations of Brown-Sequard, the freezings alive of J. C. Coleman, the disease-producing feeding of animals upon the putrid lungs of human beings, of Dr. Klein; the inserting of tubes into arteries, as advised and practiced by Stephen Halea, of Teddington; the covering of the shaven skins of animals with varnish, of Drs. Kleinberg and Prolatus; the injection of putrid matter into the blood vessels, of Dr. Sanderson; the starvings of Dr. Chossatt; the drownings and smotherings of the commission of professors from the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons, London; stopping windpipes with corks; keeping animals forcibly under water until almost dead, then, by methods as cruel, restoring them to consciousness; holding the heads of Guinea pigs in basins of quicksilver; cramming the mouths and larynxs of dogs with liquid plaster of Paris until it solidified—such practices as these, although knives are not used, and cutting unnecessary, are catalogued under the heading of Vivisection."

[Curare. There is employed to a great extent, in vivisection, the drug Curare, which paralyzes motion while sensibility acutely remains. According to Claude Bernard, who was named the "Prince of Vivisectors," the curarized animals undergo atrocious suffering without being able to cry out or move a muscle.]"

Mrs. Fairchild-Allen's definition, and the wide-spread diffusion of it in her monthly journal and in other publications, did a great work. She was an officer in the Illinois Anti-Vivisection Society, organized of the International Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Society, and editor of Our Fellow Creatures, a monthly publication.

She made an atttmpt to make an exhibit at the Paris exposition of everything available to throw light on "the cruelest cruelty" and a large amount of money was raised for this purpose, but it was impossible, in the land of Pasteur, to secure space for anything which could damage the ideals of Frenchmen. So she was obliged to abandon the original idea. This was a great defeat to her sensitive soul, and we believe was a factor in the final break-down. She wrote to me, "I am so tired. I always need more money and am nearly sick for the want of it for there is so much I want to do. I am not strong nor well and am taking treatments hoping to brace up." The next we knew she had dropped in harness, and was gone. Here are a few lines to her memory:

THRENODY.

To Mrs. Fairchild-Allen.

Unnerved at last, dear hands!
Mercy's vast army stands
In tears, and wreaths of rue,
Sobbing a last adieu.
No good-bye word, no warning of your call,
Nothing except the news that you are gone.
Gone!—Gone! How can one word so plain and small,
Stagger the soul, and shake the strongest tone!
Surely are we bereft!
But, vanguard, none like you,
So strong, so sweet, so true!
How can we spare you, brave heart, from your place?
Who can take up your task, and work away
As valiantly What other holy face
Can so inspire us with its soulful play?

Rest, dear soul, rest awhile—
Give us one word,—one smile!
Inspire us that we stand
For what you wisely planned!
You were most loyal, veiling e'en defeat
That others might not veer at your despair.
O, did we sense your zeal, your trembling feet,
Your sacrifice?—more e'en than you could bear!

IN PURSUIT OF FACTS.

Detailing an Investigator's Experience.

I am in pursuit of facts. Millions, billions of people have sought for truth, and the brains of the world now, as in all the past years to know whether "if a man die shall he live again." Theory, theology, philosophy, do not answer the great question satisfactorily to humanity. Millions have accepted the so-called scriptural salvation and groan under the burden of its uncertainty. In the absence of anything better countless millions of the human family have taken hold of the Christian "plan of salvation." Myriads have planted their hopes therein; many have suffered martyrdom therefor, but the innumerable throng in all the ages of the Christian era have pursued it as a phantom only, and have died in the labyrinths of its colossal uncertainty. Christianity has never yet come up to the demands of the world. Something tangible, demonstrable, sure, has ever been the yearning of the great human heart.

Possessed with a strong desire to know, I have for many years of my life unceasingly caught at every floating straw in the hope of riding safely on the top of the wave. I have sought in vain for solace, abiding rest in the Christian hope. Nothing is offered but a blind unreasoning faith based on a fabulous old mythological story of the Christ, so antiquated and stale that the moss and mist and myth of the distant past cover it all over with improbability. How can an intelligent mortal be content in so momentous a matter with such an intangible structure as the Christian religion? Feeling thus, I have ever been alert for something better.

Three years ago I and a friend, who like myself, was groveling in the slough of spiritual despond, secured a brief vacation and determined to spend the short time allotted us at the spiritual camp-meeting then in progress at Chesterfield, Ind. This place had been described as an inviting resort, and excellent for a short recreation. We had also heard of the alleged spiritual phenomena manifested there through the so-called medium. Never having come in contact with anything of the kind, and having no faith whatever in its genuineness, prompted by curiosity and a desire to enjoy an outing for a few days, we took the train for the camp, reaching there late in the afternoon. We were entire strangers, never having been there before, and never having seen any person on the grounds. Seeking the camp hotel, we ate our suppers, being careful to conceal our identity by refraining from registering our names, or by addressing each other by name. Over the entranced to many of the cottages scattered over the grounds was a sign or placard, indicating the business or calling of the occupant, such as "Trumpet medium," "Independent talking medium," "Clairvoyant," etc.

Seeking one of these as the shades of the evening came on, in company with a farmer and his wife and daughter, and two other parties whom we happened to get in company with, we expressed our desire to the medium of forming a circle for a seance. This was readily accorded us and we went inside the cottage consisting of one room, securely fastening the door and the two windows. A small, plain table upon which sat a lighted lamp and a tin horn or "trumpet" and the chairs we occupied, constituted all the furniture in the room. The medium, an unlettered Irish woman, with a decided brogue to her talk, placed the table in a corner, sat the trumpet down on the floor, seated us in a circle around it, and after admonishing us to respond to all questions propounded to us by the spirits, and to talk freely to them, blew out the light and all were in inky darkness. My curiosity as to what character of trick was about to be perpetrated on us, was wrought up to the highest pitch, but I confess I was illy prepared to meet what shortly followed.

We were asked to join the medium in singing, "Nearer, My God, to Thee," which we all did as best we could. Then there was a deathly silence except that I could hear my heart go thump, thump, thump. Presently something touched both my knees and though tender voices, as of children, immediately by me, one on my right, one on my left, and another in front of me, all saying, "Papa, Papa, Papa!" I promptly said, "Who are you?" and the answers came in rapid succession, "I am June." "I am Carl," "I am your little Bennie; don't you know us, papa?" These were the names of my three little darling children, who had passed away years before, the youngest and last to leave me—Bennie—five years prior to that time. Impulsively I reached out to take hold of them, for I could feel them touch me, but this effort only provoked a hearty laugh from them all as they said, "Dear papa, you can't take us up as you used to do; you can't see us, but we can see you; you have, oh, so many grey hairs"—and I could feel something as if a hand passing over my temples, where my hair was beginning to get slightly grey.

Well, all this was indeed a "stunner," for who in the circle could have ever known Carl, June, or Bennie? My friend who was with me had never seen them or known of their existence, and I do not think I had even thought of the first two of them for many months—perhaps years—they had left me so long before. I was much overcome by their apparent presence, but as soon as I could recover my self possession, I questioned them closely concerning their identity, the time, place and circumstances of their leaving me, and, strange to relate, every response was exactly correct, even in the minutest detail. I enquired, "Bennie, what was Mamma doing to-day?" The answer was "Earnest (our youngest child, at home, 00 miles away) was playing, and fell off the teter board and hurt himself badly, and mamma carried him in the blue room and laid him on the bed, and he cried, and cried and cried, but at last he fell asleep, and so did mamma, and when I left there this evening they were still asleep." Several days afterward, when I arrived at home, the first thing I said to my wife was, "What were you doing last Saturday afternoon?" A moment's reflection, and she responded, "I heard Earnest crying out in the yard; I ran to him and found he had fallen off that hateful old teter you fixed for them, and had hurt himself—as I at first thought—badly; I carried him into the blue room and laid him on the bed, and to comfort him, I lay down by him; he cried a good while but at last went to sleep and so did I, and we both slept all the afternoon. Why, what made you ask me this?"

Well, after much more conversation with these little spirits, as they claimed to be, they, one by one, bade me good night, promising to see me again at the first opportunity, and they were gone.

What immediately followed in this seance must be preceded by a brief explanation. Five years prior to this time my aged parents had departed this life and only a few months before my visit to Chesterfield, I and my brother—who is an orthodox preacher—had completed a monument to their memory. We had labored all day in connection with the help employed in getting the monument in place and in giving the finishing touches to the grave. After the help had departed and we sat down in the shade to rest, I said to my brother, "Do you believe father and mother are cognizant of what we have done here to-day in respect to their memory?"

He responded affirmatively, and quoted some scriptural passages in support of his opinion, and thus we kept up the conversation for some time before we departed for our respective homes. With this explanation I will relate what followed after the alleged spirits of my children had gone from our circle. The trumpet which had stood on the floor undisturbed up to this time seemed to be taken up and was flourished around, touching nearly all of us with a slight ringing sound; at last it seemed to halt immediately in front of me and a voice through it so like my sainted mother's that there seemed to be no mistaking it, called my name, and with melting, loving tenderness and familiar accent, described her joy and happiness because of this first opportunity since her "crossing over" of communicating with me. She mentioned the spiritual presence with her of numbers of my departed friends and relatives referring familiarly to them by name. She also said, "My dear boy, when you and F—— (my brother) had completed the monument to father and I, and when you sat down to rest and you said, 'I wonder if father and mother have a knowledge of what we have done for them,' I was right by you and tried hard to manifest my presence to you at that time, but could not do so." I had not once thought of the conversation referred to between my brother and myself since it had occurred until my attention was thus called to it. I also afterward spoke to my brother about it and he recalled the conversation as I have described it.

Many other marvelous things occurred during this trip to Chesterfield. I found myself at once fairly launched on the sea of investigation into the occult mysteries of Spiritualism. During the years that have intervened I have lost no opportunity at whatever cost of time or means to try to discover the mysterious source of these phenomena. I have encountered hundreds of like manifestations given under the strictest possible test conditions which I have neither time nor space to detail. I am still endeavoring with all my might to determine whether there is any other possible explanation of the phenomena than that given by Spiritualists.

BOOK REVIEW.

The Story of Abraham Lincoln, or the Journey from the Log Cabin to the White House. By Eleanor Gridley.

Abraham Lincoln was and is an interesting character, and will always remain such; and everything pertaining to his life and work on earth is of interest.

This book is decidedly unique in its presentation of the subject, giving much of especial interest concerning Mr. Lincoln's early every-day home life, before he became known to fame and greatness as a lawyer and statesman.

Mrs. Gridley has done well in respect to the facts of Abraham Lincoln's life, and the faithful and well-expressed manner in which they are portrayed.

The book is for sale by the author, No. 6457 Langley avenue, Chicago, Ill., and will be sent postpaid by her on receipt of the price, $1.50.

TWENTY MINUTES IN HELL

Vivid Account of a Terrible Psychic Experience.

I have always felt a strong aversion to detailing any of my personal experiences that relate to mediumship, or to describing any impressions that were aroused in me by the influences that operated on me under the conditions of passive receptivity. I am conscious that some of these are of such a nature as to excite incredulity in those who have had no contact with psychic phenomena, and such persons must receive them wholly on faith.

There is no way to demonstrate that what you have felt, actually occurred, and as it is outside the realm of common knowledge it is but natural that it will be regarded with a disposition to confine it to very narrow limits. I can only emphatically declare that what I shall now set forth actually transpired to me and that the language I shall employ is very inadequate to convey the reality and vividness of my experience which left such indelible effects that I cannot at this late date recall it without a shudder. I have been through the beat of battle and have heard the shrieking missiles of death make discord in the surrounding air, but never has such intensity of feeling reached its maximum as it did in this overwhelming visitation when I even felt that my very soul would be rent asunder by the misery that overshadowed it.

It was more than forty years ago that I was a member of a small circle that organized with a view of following up the various phenomena that are associated with the developments of spirit power. We had been meeting once or twice a week for three months or more and I had felt the convulsions or shakings that accompany psychic developments. There had been no very notable display until now, but I realized that some exterior power was becoming more potent with each succeeding seance and I was waiting with interest, but not with fear to see what it would lead to. I did not doubt that I could take care of myself anywhere in the realms of nature by strong self-assertion and imperial will power.

One night as we sat down to our experiments the air seemed surcharged and almost explosive with some force that dominated everything within it. I found myself responding to this power and was soon wholly subject to its sway. My eyes went shut and I felt myself merging into an unconscious state; that is, unconscious to physical surroundings but intensely sensitive to new relations that my mind took cognizance of. Suddenly it seemed to me that I was falling through space, and I finally landed in a dark and gloomy region that was inexpressibly forbidding, and that filled me with the profoundest sorrow. Although the place was dark, one could in some way penetrate the gloom for a far distance on every side. The surface was a rocky desert without an object to cheer the vision. It was rough, too, and full of pit-holes, and when I attempted to travel over it I would tumble into these and the surface of the rocks was so covered with a slimy deposit that in trying to get out I would slip and fall back continually. The atmosphere was stifling and the inhaling of it only added to the depression of the place. I tried to reach some of the forms that were roving over this region, hoping that I should receive some information or sympathy but as I approached them they would recede, and I observed that none of them could come near to one another. They would give utterance to the most heart-rending moans, indicating a suffering constant and profound. The woe and anguish of the place seemed infinite.

No language can describe my own sufferings. I looked on every side for relief in vain. My very soul was rent with distress and in my agony the dark shadows would go flitting by and their dismal wailing would fill me with a chilling horror. How could I longer endure.

In my agony I cried out: Oh, God! oh God and angels! is there no hope; no escape from this horrible place? If I must remain here, let me be annihilated and become extinct.

I had reached, I felt, the utmost limit of suffering. While I cried out with all my fainting strength I saw on one side a place that seemed lighter and with a sudden gleam of hope I stumbled towards it and presently began to fall, and with a loud wail and shout I landed in the circle where my feeling of gratitude and escape overwhelmed me, and broke out into a loud paroxysm of weeping that overpowered every vital in me, and while convulsions shook my frame, I shouted, Thank God! thank God!

The atmosphere was so surcharged that all the circle wept with me. It was near an hour before all were calm again, and the marvelous influence of this experience pervaded me for days. I felt so grateful and so thankful that I had got away from that dreadful place.

Since then no arguments could convince me that there is no hell, though it may differ greatly from that formerly delineated by the Vesuvian orthodoxy, its penalties are sufficiently acute.

I have frequently pondered on this experience and wondered whence and why it came. I am sure it had not a subjective origin. If so there must be springs of action within us that are not dependent upon the will and that we are wholly unconscious of; but that yet have the power to arouse the mind to the most vivid realization of scenes that we have no previous knowledge of, but that are forced upon us by some exterior influence that we are not well acquainted with.

Some one may suggest that this picture was the reproduction of something that had previously been presented to the mind and had lain dormant until a favorable nervous state had revived it with increased intensity. It cannot be so satisfactorily explained. Previous to this incident I had never read any of Swedenborg nor Dantes' Inferno nor anything similar from Spiritualism. I had not even personally speculated upon what kind of place hell might be or the nature of its suffering. I had so far repudiated the surging fire and sulphur stench as to leave no credence of that in my nature. Is it likely that my mind would invent a new kind of hell and subject myself to its suffering torture just to see how it would work? Nothing can be more improbable. To me this experience is inexplicable by theory, and it remains as one of the mysterious facts of psychic occurrances.

Good Work at Wheeling, W. Va.

I feel it a duty and a privilege through your valuable columns, to let you know something that is going on in this section of country. If anyone thinks Spiritualism is dead or dying here, a short visit to our city and society would satisfy the most critical that there is a great awakening going on.

The talented missionaries and mediums of the N. S. A., G. W. Kates and wife, under the auspices of the First Progressive Spiritualist Society of Wheeling, W. Va., closed an engagement of eight days in our midst. He is one of being the grandest and most eloquent gentlman and lady who ever were heard from the rostrums in our city. The Odd Fellows' Hall was secured, which was very spacious, holding nearly 600 people, and almost every meeting it was taxed to its utmost capacity, and in one instance the door had to be locked, not even standing-room obtainable. The interest was intense. The lectures of Mr. Kates were of high character; he dwelt upon facts pertaining to this and the other life; he held his audience spellbound, and every statement that was made was riveted upon his hearers in a manner that commanded the highest respect, even from people who had not known the blessed truth of spirit return.

Mrs. Kates is a wonderfully attractive lady, endowed with grand oratorical powers, entrancing in her manners, beautiful in her language, she stands before her audience without notes, and words of truth come from her lips, which carry comfort to many a sorrowing one. All through her talks which were rendered so touchingly, a pin could be heard drop, and she in many instances would move her hearers from laughter to tears.

Time and space will not permit me to do these good and eloquent people justice. Our people feel thankful that Modern Spiritualism has such able advocates upon the platform, and the amount of good they have done among us is beyond human estimate. In all their meetings, upon the platform could be seen the form of our worthy home medium, Mr. G. W. Way. This gentleman is well and favorably known as a pure and gifted man, possessing remarkable clairvoyant and clairaudient powers. He together with Mrs. Kates, gave some overwhelming evidence to many persons present, that the dear one were very near them. In conclusion, I would say, I wish it was possible for every city and hamlet to be visited by these grand workers, Mr. and Mrs. Kates. We will one and all welcome them back again to our city.

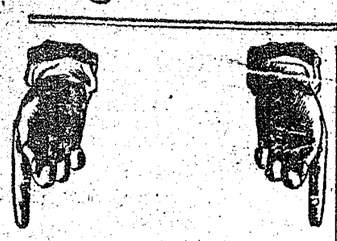
SPIRIT ANIMALS.

Reincarnation and Metempsychosis.

In The Progressive Thinker dated January 18, is an extract from Light, London, England, of a most remarkable nature. It tells of the appearance of a spirit dog to the clairvoyant view of children in the first instance, and afterwards to the maid, and then to the lady herself, the mother of the children. This lady is described as an excellent drawing and writing medium, and her writing, impelled by spirit power, a spirit informs her that he it is who appears in the form of a spirit dog, and that he is by this means forced to learn what fidelity means, having been during life a cheat and had robbed his master. He asked for prayers from this family that he might be restored to human form; on their complying with his request the appearance of the dog became fainter and fainter, until at length it disappeared altogether.

To those unacquainted with the various and peculiar states of souls on first entering spirit life, this must seem an undoubted proof of the truth of metempsychosis. Apparently it presents such an assurance to those ignorant of psychic power in spirit life. If one such case were proved as a certainty, there could be no more argument left to oppose it.

Theosophists deny metempsychosis, yet they uphold reincarnation. Had we as strong evidence for the truth of reincarnation, as this relation gives, on a cursory glance with regard to metempsychosis, then indeed we might begin to give it credence.



Strong as the evidence appears to establish the idea of metempsychosis, yet upon examination into the psychic law of the spirit world we come to learn the wonderful power of this law in its effect on a darkened soul, and as an instrument to awaken in him remorse and repentance. So many spirits enter the life of spirit in such a deplorably ignorant state as to be totally unaware of the change and, subject to psychical hallucinations which astonish us. It is more than probable that this spirit left earth with the idea of metempsychosis strongly imbued in his mind, consequently when conscience was aroused to perceive the wrong he had done in robbery of his master, his thought would lead him to imagine he must enter the body of a dog to learn faithfulness. The thought would grow so strong as to actually become to him as a reality, and so strongly was it imprinted that he was able by psychic influence to cause his thought to appear in bodily form. In order to free himself he sought the aid of mediums, and besought their prayers. His faith in these prayers was so powerful that he became loosened from this idea and gradually it faded from his mind, and consequently from the spiritual view of the mediums. It is through such psychic influence that the idea of elementaries, fairies, gnomes, bobgoblins and headless creatures are brought to the vision of some; all these owing their existence to unseen psychic power and having no real existence.

We have been assured on high authority that there are no such creatures as these in reality. One sees, however, in this example of this spirit dog, the harm which such false ideas in earth life may do to the unhappy spirit, and how such false teachings carry their influence into the other life, and thereby retard the advance of the spirit to a higher knowledge and understanding of that life.

It is, however, a fact that real spirit forms of animals appear to mediums, for animals exist there in spirit life and are sometimes brought to earth by spirits. But in this instance the form was but the crystallization of a thought by spirit psychic power. The spirits of animals have been seen to follow their old masters, to whom they were drawn by the force of attachment. It does not at all follow that because a spirit makes a statement that he is forced to take on the appearance of an animal, that such a thing, even if it were proved as a reality, could substantiate the dogma of metempsychosis—for this latter entertains the idea of man living again on the earth in the form of an animal—which being repugnant to reason and to nature, it becomes unnecessary to take the pains to refute it.

It is the first time I ever heard that "bloodthirsty souls in course of retrogression eventually land in the outward form of even a flea!" It would be well if people were instructed to know that the human soul divine never did emerge from the animal, as the writer of this article leads us to suppose. The mortal body did evolve from the lowest stage of life and in the ages past, has been evolved the higher animal called man a fit residence for the divine spirit nature, but in all animal nature beneath him was not found an appropriate receptacle in which to incarnate the divine soul. Man alone is fitted with the complex nervous organizations capable of manifesting and supplying means of expression for that soul.

DR. G. E. WATKINS,

The Noted Chronist,

Is Now Located at

No. 1087 Boylston street, Boston, Mass., where he will be pleased to meet all who may call between the hours of 10 a. m. and 2 p. m. The wonderful work in healing the sick that Dr. Watkins is accomplishing is indeed most astounding; his patients live to testify to his wonderful powers as a healer. For the last year his work has been most wonderful. He says himself that his cures this year have been more than ever before in numbers, as he confined himself to only 30 new patients a month. Dr. Watkins attends personally to each case, and therefore he can do better work than if he had a great many assistants; no staff of visible helpers are in his office to annoy and suggest this and that. He knows what is the trouble with each patient, and knows the right specific to give. He prepares and puts up all of his medicine, and has no help in his medical treatments that is visible help. Write him to-day, and by return mail you will receive the diagnose. No charge made for diagnosing your case. Send age, sex and leading symptom.

"BEYOND THE VAIL."

Another Good Book Produced by Departed Human Spirits.

This work is an object lesson of the value of mediumship. If mediumship was utilized by all Spiritualists in the same way that the Spiritualists of Spring Hill, Kansas, utilized W. W. Aber's mediumship, we should hear little of the frauds that we now hear. Somehow Spiritualists don't seem to realize that it is useless to attempt to indoctrinate a person into Spiritualism until he is morally, mentally and spiritually ready for it. Persimmons until thoroughly ripe, are unfit for eating, and a person who is not ripe for Spiritualism is not fit for it and should take a thorough schooling in Children's Progressive Lyceums before he is indoctrinated in our sublime philosophy.

This thing of getting up a promiscuous materialization circle is one of the greatest mistakes that Spiritualists ever made, and one that has been the most prolific source of fraud of any other dozen things that one can think of. The seances at which the manifestations herein recorded were produced were before old and experienced Spiritualists, men and women who had had large experience in intercourse with the spirit world and who had been readers and thinkers and thoroughly understood our beautiful philosophy. They carefully guarded against the admission of anything likely to interfere with the harmonious conditions necessary, admitting not more than one or two outside of their circle at any seance and those none but full-fledged Spiritualists.

Mr. Aber has traveled over the country many years giving public seances, and many have seen the manifestations in his presence. But outside of Spring Hill, I believe his work has done little good except to satisfy curiosity seekers, who are not worth wasting our time on. I say this with the full knowledge that at various times people have been brought to see the light of Spiritualism at his seances. Some of those thus convinced were worthy people and will use their knowledge for the edification of the public; others, however, have been ever since seeking tests and will thus continue till they die, just as the loafer grows grey sitting on the store box, talking gossip or telling smutty stories. Worthy people thus convinced of the truths of Spiritualism would eventually have been reached, and we should not then have the dead weight of phenomenalists to interfere with the progress of the work.

This work, "Beyond the Vail," is a companion to the other work produced before this medium and the same circle, this circle altered only by some deaths and the introduction of new materials to supply their places. Although it does not give so many insurmountable tests as the companion, "Rending the Vail," it is fully as valuable and I might say more valuable to the initiated than the one first issued. But I would not, if I could have my preference, have the reader read one to the exclusion of the other. In fact, the two belong together, and should be read seriatim. I do not believe in bibles as books of authority, nor in fact do I believe in any other than individual authority, and that authority should have the privilege of changing its rules of government every day according to the needs of the individual, but I believe commend this as a bible, calculated to teach men and women of the consequences of our conduct in this life upon the future life. It tolerably acquaints us with the conditions in the other life, or the life beyond this. I was going to say it roughly acquaints us with these conditions, when I realized that such a thing as that would be impossible. But it does give us such thorough knowledge of life and occupation in the spirit world, of what our department in this life has to do with our homes "over there," of what we shall find that is interesting when we reach "the farther shore," and this knowledge is supplied in no other works except in Spiritualism, that I feel no hesitation in saying to the reader, procure these books and lay them on the stand and study them as your bible. You cannot understand them too well. (And I would also say the same by Nature's Divine Revelations, by Andrew Jackson Davis.)

Although there are not as many tests in proof that a power other than mortal superintended the production of this work, as there were with the production of "Beyond the Veil," yet there are sufficient to establish its supermundane origin. In one instance two spirits appeared in different parts of the room at the same instant, the voices were also different from each other, several of them were heard talking at the same time, distinguishable in sound and volume from each other. One spirit talked in the Spanish language, but not being well understood he talked in the German language which was understood by one in the circle who held converse with him. But for this, he, notwithstanding the English language could not have made himself understood. But perhaps one of the best tests was the rapidity with which some of the writing was produced. Twenty-six words per minute is as fast as the best average longhand writers can write. A few will write as high as 40 words per minute, but it is generally illegible to all but the writer, and sometimes he even has difficulty in deciphering his own manuscript. But on several occasions words were produced in longhand at the rate of from 200 to 600 words per minute, the spirit writer meantime either holding conversation or talking to members of the circle at the ordinary rate of talking on an entire different subject from that on which he was writing. The ordinary speaker usually speaks at the rate of 6,000 words per hour, but here are spirit writers writing on one subject while talking on another, at the rate of 36,000 words per hour, or six times as fast as the average shorthand writer writes.

Another test was in the style of writers and speakers. Not every one can distinguish between the vernacular of different writers and speakers, but those who make a study of books can often easily name the author when they hear the language used. Here those of us who were acquainted with William Denton will discover that the language used by the Professor was Dentonian in style. As an illustration I want to subjoin an extract:

"You cannot dodge Spiritualism straight. If you go to the four corners of the earth, you will find Spiritualism all the way. And if you flee to the mountains and stop over night with the woodman in his cabin, you will find Spiritualism there. The miner, the camper, all will tell you something of Spiritualism. There is no language nor speech where its voice is not heard. Its line hath gone out through all the earth and its words to the ends of the world. You may undertake to upset your world, you may undertake to stop its going, you may try to reverse the motions of the starry heavens, and to turn the sun back in his course—you may as well undertake all that as to try to blot out Spiritualism. You can blot out Spiritualism only by blotting yourself out. Spiritualism has come to stay, and while the church sets up its opposition to Spiritualism, it plays a boomerang, and in a few years your churches and religious dogmas set up and supported by the sword of Constantine, as the walls of Zion, must tumble to Spiritualism, for Spiritualism is founded in eternal truth as the rock upon which it is builded, having its superstructure of unfolding humanity, rearing its dome aloft and out into the everlasting spheres."

Had this statement been made thirty years ago, when E. V. Wilson was well known, thousands of persons would have had no difficulty in guessing who was the author. Certainly no one who knows the medium, would ever make the mistake of supposing it to be a production of his. Recently, in talking with a quite prominent Spiritualist on this subject, I was told that spirits did not produce this book "Rending the Vail." How was it done then, since the whole work in every particular is beyond not only the mental caliber of Aber, and so entirely different from his mode of expression? I was answered that J. H. Nixon wrote it. But to assume such a thing is to assume not only that he was a fraud, which considering his reputation, was difficult to do, and we also had to assume that those who had signed affidavits were perjurers and villains, and all of them people of good reputations, in the neighborhood where they live.

In all, about two hundred and fifty spirits came and talked to the circle. Some gave their experiences in passing from the mortal to the immortal, some their experiences on waking up to spirit life, others their experience while in their darkened condition in spirit life, and the process by which they became enlightened as to their then condition, and also in working their way up out of the condition in which they were, some their experience in missionary work as they are trying to persuade people to reform, "preaching to spirits in prison," and others in the several occupations in which they are employed. Some describe the beauties of the spirit world, its scenery, architecture and all that they are able to make us comprehend of it, etc. There are still others who tell us of the slums of the spirit world, of the people who sit in darkness out of sight of the great light, of the miser who sits in the presence of his gold robed in filthy rags while the imaginary wraiths of the victims of his cupidity haunt him much as the victims of some murderers haunt them in their cells while awaiting death. In fact, as much is related as could be expected from two hundred and fifty persons relating their separate experiences.

Numerous pictures drawn up by the spirit artist of persons and scenes in spirit life illustrate the work.

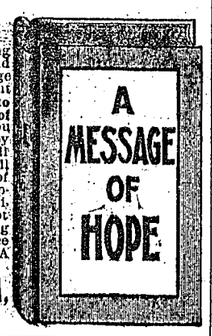
A MESSAGE OF HOPE

The Eminent Dr. Peebles with an Able Staff of Assistants has Discovered and Perfected a Treatment that Gives Hope to Every Suffering Home in the Land.



J. M. PEEBLES M.D., A.M.

Dr. Peebles' Institute of Health, composed of some of the leading physicians of the country, have perfected their method of healing so that it can almost be said that there are no incurable diseases. This system of treatment is a combination of Medicinal Remedies, Psychic Treatments, combined with a system of Hygiene and Physical Culture and is so perfected that any one can take it to their own home without detention from their business. Years ago the Doctor concluded that nature had wisely provided a cure for all diseased conditions just as she had for all injuries such as cuts, bruises, etc., and he at once set to work to discover what this mighty power might be and how it could be used. After almost half a century of persistent study and investigation he, with his able staff of co-workers have given to the world a perfected system of treatment that is destined to revolutionize the art of healing the sick. The entire country is astonished at the almost miraculous cures performed by these physicians, but the Doctors claim there is nothing mysterious about it at all. They say they are able to cure thousands of those pronounced incurable by other physicians because they work IN HARMONY WITH AND EMPLOY THE MIGHTY HEALING FORCES OF NATURE IN ADDITION TO THEIR MILD YET POTENT MEDICINAL REMEDIES. In a perfectly natural manner it builds up the system, enriches the blood, improves the digestion and appetite, gives strength to the nerves and muscles and repairs wasted tissues and organs, causing the invalid of many years to rejoice after having been told by the local doctors "there is no hope for you."

Mrs. J. D. Stevenson, of Hillsdale, O., in writing the Doctors after a three months' course of treatment thanks them heartily for curing her of a long standing case of female trouble and falling of the womb. Miss Daisy Burke, of Kalama, Wash., who was completely cured of catarrh, sends a thousand thanks and says "I am almost the only person around here free of this dreaded disease." Harry McClure, of Pittsburg, Pa., corner Fifteenth and Bingham street, who had been troubled with kidney trouble and rheumatism for years, writes after four years of treatment with local doctors: "I cannot express in words the hearty endorsement I give your wonderful treatment." Mrs. Joel Curtis, of Method, N. C., writes: "I cannot thank you enough for the good you have done me." You cured me of asthma two years ago and I have not felt anything of it since. I recommend you to all suffering humanity." F. Villiers, of 692 N. Francisco Avenue, Chicago, Ill., writes: "When I wrote you I was suffering the torments of the damned with my stomach and had been told by the best physicians in Chicago that I had about two months to live. As a last chance I wrote for your free diagnosis and you told me I had a severe case of inflammation of the stomach. Under your treatment and sound advice I improved from the first and am today in better health than in years. I most heartily endorse you and recommend your treatment to all."

FREE TO ALL.

It makes no difference how serious your case may be or how long you have been suffering there is positive hope for you in this grand treatment. If you have not read their late book entitled "A Message of Hope" and do not understand the wonderful system of treatment you should write them at once for it. It will give you the key to this GRAND TREATMENT, and explains fully how thousands of chronic sufferers are being cured after giving up all hope. If you will write them a plain, truthful letter about your condition they will go over your case carefully and send you free of charge a full diagnosis and their expert opinion of your case and candidly tell you what treatment you should have and the probable length of time it would take to cure you. You cannot afford to miss this opportunity to come into correspondence with these eminent physicians. They can tell you your exact condition and whether or not your case is curable and will give you their services in diagnosing and advising ABSOLUTELY WITHOUT COST. Write them at once for their opinion in your case and their grand book, entitled "A Message of Hope." Address

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

Passed to spirit life, from his home at Mantua Station, Ohio, on January 8, 1902, Lewis King, aged 71 years. Bro. King was conductor of the Progressive Lyceum in Cleveland, O., for many years. He and his wife have been earnest and active workers in the cause of Spiritualism for fifty years. They were charter members of the National Spiritual and Religious Association, and have never faltered in the upbuilding of Maple Dell Camp. The funeral services were conducted by Hon. O. P. Kellogg, assisted by the members of Mantua Lodge No. 647 K. of P., whose burial rites were very impressive. COR.

Samuel Davis was born in Conway, Franklin county, Mass., August 13, 1824. He passed to spirit life in Cleveland, O., Jan. 11, 1902. He had been an earnest and faithful advocate of Spiritualism for fifty years. On July 4, 1840, he was married to Philanda Harrington. They had three children, all of whom are living. Funeral services were conducted by the writer. The remains were placed in the cemetery at Hiram Rapids. D. M. KING.

Passed to the higher life, at Lyons, N. Y., Dec. 12, 1901, Sarah D. Burgess, aged 80 years, 3 months and 10 days. Mrs. Burgess was naturally a woman of high intellectuality, and always viewed any subject from a liberal standpoint. She was one of the pioneers of Spiritualism, and, loving and admiring its philosophy, never hesitated on any proper occasion to advocate and defend its cause. W. H. D.

Passed to spirit life, from the Michigan Masonic Home, Mrs. Amanda D. Johnston, aged 68 years. She died as she had lived for 19 years, a consistent Spiritualist, knowing that death is simply transition to a higher life and a reunion with the loved ones gone before. A true wife, a loving mother, a faithful friend and a good woman has gone to her spirit home. S. B. J.

Esoteric Lessons.

An Argument Against Physical Causation.

The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely physical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom, insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief in which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

RELIGION OF THE FUTURE.

By S. Weil. Cloth, $1.25; paper, 50 cents. This is a work of great value, written by one of the keenest, most powerful and most truly religious minds of the day. It is particularly a work which should be put into the hands of those who have freed themselves from the dogmas of orthodoxy and from the dogmas of materialistic science, for it will strengthen the conviction of the free mind that mind and senses are not the whole of life.

The chapters reveal a new method in psychic and spiritual research. They show vivid glimpses of a stupendous moral cosmos that will supersede moral confusion, that only verifiable tenets can survive, and the childhood period of faith and fancy will be superseded by knowledge and facts.

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER.

VOL. 25. CHICAGO, ILL., FEB. 8, 1902. NO. 637.

A Chapter from "The Arabula," by A. J. Davis, Demonstrating in a Most Masterly Manner the Existence of a God--Not Original with Mr. Davis.

THE AUTHOR OF THE ARABULA CHAPTER.

The Late Judge Arington's Wonderful Demonstration of the Existence of a God Appropriated Bodily by Andrew Jackson Davis.

Letter of Explanation From a Prominent Chicago Attorney, Which Can Not Be Truthfully Controverted.

To the Editor—I have noticed for some time past, in the columns of The Progressive Thinker, a discussion going on between Professor Loveland and Mr. J. Y. McFarland, turning somewhat upon the authorship of a certain article in regard to the existence of the Deity. Both of these gentlemen seem to be in great doubt as to the authorship of the article in question. With your kind permission I will take the liberty of stating, for the benefit of the gentlemen named, that said article was written by the late Alfred W. Arington, Esq., of the Chicago bar, and who died in this city in the year 1868. Judge Arington was for years a very prominent figure in legal circles in the West. Judge Arington and the late Corydon Beckwith were doubtless two of the ablest members of the legal profession who ever practiced at the Chicago bar. They were pitted against each other for many years, and probably discussed more great questions of municipal, railroad and constitutional law before the Supreme Court of Illinois than had ever been discussed by any two other members of the profession in the West, and it may be safely said that neither of these gentlemen ever had a superior in legal attainments west of the Alleghenies.

Judge Arington in his younger days was a district judge in the State of Texas, and he is the party mentioned in said article who "wandered on the banks" of the Texas stream. Judge Arington after having completed the article was so possessed of the idea that it amounted to an actual mathematical demonstration of the existence of the Deity that he desired to submit the same to some of the Boston scholars, and to that end he traveled by stage in the winter time from Texas to Boston, where he submitted the article to the consideration of several Boston scholars and among others to the late Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes. It is said that Prof. Holmes, after listening to the article, answered with these words: "Order! Order! Order!" Judge Arington understood the opinion of Prof. Holmes to be that his elaborate article had only succeeded in disclosing the order of the development of the universe.

The article was first published in the Democratic Magazine of Baltimore in 1846, and was subsequently appropriated bodily by Andrew Jackson Davis at a lecture which he gave somewhere in New England, and thereafter made its appearance in "Arabula."

This, in short, is the history of the famous apostrophe to the "flower of five petals and the glass of water."

Judge Arington was a profound scholar, something of a poet and well up in all modern philosophy.

I do not wish to be understood as charging plagiarism upon the part of Andrew Jackson Davis. I must say, however, when I first came across the article in his writings I was something more than surprised to find that it had been appropriated bodily by him. After many years of study, however, of the writings of Mr. Davis, I can well understand how the appropriation came about, for, in fact, it does seem to me that his controls at times have appropriated everything known or possible to be known on a given question. If, as it appears to me, the doctrine of Evolution is clearly foreshadowed in "Nature's Divine Revelations," which was published long years before either Wallace or Darwin began their writings upon this topic, we have a much more interesting and important fact to deal with than the question involved in the appropriation of the Arington article by the controls of Mr. Davis and in no sense an act of plagiarism on his part. No man can make a careful study of the writings of Mr. Davis without reaching the conclusion that when under control he was able to draw upon all known sources of information. HIRAM BARBER.

An Important Question Settled.

Andrew Jackson Davis' Main and Masterly Argument to Prove the Existence of a God, as Published in His Work, "The Arabula," Was Not Original With Him, but Was Written by Judge Arington, of Chicago.

It Was Judge Arington, and Not Andrew Jackson Davis, Who Sat by the Colorado River in Texas, and Engaged in Sublime Thought.

Honor to Whom Honor Is Due Is at Last Given, and the Mists Have Been Cleared Entirely Away.

We Reproduce the Remarkable Chapter as Published in "The Arabula."

GOD REVEALED TO INTELLECT.

The construction of the following argument, in my own mind, originated in the necessity of my nature. Some years ago, I had the misfortune to meet the fallacies of Hume, on the subject of causation. His specious sophistries shook the faith of my reason as to the being of a God, but could not overcome the fixed repugnance of my heart to a negation so monstrous; and consequently left that infinite, restless craving for some point of fixed repose which atheism not only cannot give, but absolutely and madly disaffirms.

Through the gloom of utter skepticism, I turned for relief to the Treatise of Paley, and other reasoners, on the mere mechanical hypothesis, but there found, as I deemed, an impassable hiatus in the logic of the argument itself. I was forced to admit that every machine must have had at first a machine maker; but I saw clearly, that the fact of its being a machine must, first of all, be proven, before the reasoning could hold at all; and thus the argument was worthless. For as it is based on the assumed postulate of an actual creation, and as such a postulate is anything but self-evident, it needs to be demonstrated. And no logician of the whole mechanical school has ever attempted to furnish such a demonstration. Indeed, were creation once proven, there would be no necessity for more argument on the subject, since a Creator would on that supposition be proven also.

But I saw a still more fatal defect in the reasoning of Paley. I said to myself, Suppose that we admit the world to be a machine; still, we have no evidence that the machine builder exists now. The watchmaker of Paley's example may have ceased to be, countless centuries ago, and still the watch remain as perfect as ever. And thus the mechanical conception of the universe could afford me no ray of light.

And yet I sought with eager solicitude for some solution of this vast world-enigma. I resembled a child, who, in the crowd, had lost its parent. I went wildly, asking of every one, "Where is he? have ye seen him?" But there was no answer. I teased philosophy, science, and literature with endless questionings, but all in vain. I plunged in fierce excitements, but no solace was there. The infinite void in my want-nature would not thus be filled. I was as an Arab, washing himself with sand instead of water. Neither the heat of the heart, nor the impurity of even the surface, diminished by any such lavation. I will not attempt to paint the intense gloom of my situation. Death seemed to ride on the present hour as a race-steed of destruction. The past was a grim waste, strewn with the ruins of worlds, men, and things. The future was a chill mist hovering over incalculable sepulchers. Every voice in creation seemed to me a wild wail of agony. The godless sun and cold stars glared in my face. I turned often to the pitiless sky, which no longer wore the poetic hue of my credulous boyhood.

One beautiful evening in May I was reading by the light of the setting sun in my favorite Plato. I was seated on the grass, interwoven with golden blooms, immediately on the bank of the crystal Colorado of Texas. Dim in the distant west arose, with smoky outlines, massy and irregular, the blue cones of an offshoot of the Rocky Mountains.

I was perusing one of the Academician's most starry dreams. It had laid fast hold of my fancy without exciting my faith. I wept to think that it could not be true. At length I came to that startling sentence, "God geometrizes." "Vain revery!" I exclaimed, as I cast the volume on the ground at my feet. It fell close by a beautiful little flower that looked fresh and bright, as if it had just fallen from the bosom of a rainbow. I broke it from its silvery stem, and began to examine its structure. Its stamens were five in number; its green calyx had five parts; its delicate corol was five-parted, with rays expanding like those of the Texan star.

This combination of fives three times in the same blossom appeared to me very singular. I had never thought on such a subject before. The last sentence I had just read in the page of the pupil of Socrates was ringing in my ears—"God geometrizes." There was the text written long centuries ago; and here this little flower, in the remote wilderness of the West, furnished the commentary. There suddenly passed, as it were, before my eyes a faint flash of light. I felt my heart leap in my bosom. The enigma of the universe was open. Swift as a thought I calculated the chances against the production of those three equations of five in only one flower, by any principle devoid of the reason to perceive number. I found that there were one hundred and position. I extended the calculation to two flowers, by squaring the sum last mentioned. The chances amounted to the large sum of fifteen thousand, six hundred and twenty-five. I cast my eyes around the forest; the old woods were literally alive with those golden blooms, where countless bees were humming, and butterflies sipping honey-dew.

I will not attempt to describe my feelings. My soul became a tumult of radiant thoughts. I took up my beloved Plato from the grass where I had tossed him in a fit of despair. Again and again I pressed him to my bosom, with a clasp tender as a mother's around the book and the blossom, bedewing them with tears of joy. In my wild enthusiasm, I called out to the little birds on the green boughs, trilling their cheery farewells to departing day, "Sing on, sunny birds; sing on, sweet minstrels; Lo! ye and I have still a God!"

Thus perished the last doubt of the skeptic. Having found the Infinite Father, I found also myself and my beloved ones—all, once more. By degrees I put together the following argument. I tried it by every rule of logic; I conjured up every conceivable objection against all its several parts, and grew thoroughly satisfied that it contained an absolute demonstration. But I rested not here. I resolved to have it tested to the uttermost. For this purpose I journeyed all the way to Boston last winter. I presented it to the most eminent pantheists, atheists, and skeptics of that literary city. Not one of them attempted to point out a flaw in its logic.

Thus I became convinced that the demonstration is utterly unassailable; and I therefore offer it without hesitation to the criticism of the world.

The aggregate argument is my own; though many of the particular elements have been freely borrowed from others.

The principal consideration, however, is not as to authorship, but validity. And this may readily be determined. Let the objector designate its fallacy, and I will be among the first to renounce it altogether. Until this is done, I hold myself pledged to maintain it in fair controversy against all adversaries; though I will not debate the question with any person unacquainted with algebra, geometry, and the rules of strict logic.

"GOD GEOMETRIZES."—Plato.

The following argument assumes a bold tentative. It undertakes to demonstrate, in an absolute manner, not only the being, but ever-present agency of the Deity in all the phenomena of the material universe. It professes to solve the old problem that has puzzled philosophy in every age, ever uttered by human curiosity, but perhaps never, as yet, answered by pure reason— "What is the true nature of causation?"

Beyond all controversy, this must be regarded as the fundamental problem of all real science; for we know nothing, we never can know anything, but causes and effects. All time and eternity form but one vast flowing stream, where these come and go like waves of the sea. All space is but the expanse where these rise and fall in oscillations, as of some ethereal fluid of infinite extent, vibrated by a viewless force. Well has a distinguished pantheist of modern German school worded this profound idea: "The soul will not have us read any other ciphers but that of causes and effect." All scientific treatises, however pompous their nomenclature, contain but generalizations of these, expressed in mathmatical formulas, with greater or less accuracy. I am stating a simple fact, admitted on all hands. Cause and effect are thus correlatives in language and thought. The former is first, both in logic and chronology. It is, therefore, the necessary exponent of the latter. Unless its true nature be comprehended, nothing else can possibly be understood. If we err at this great starting-point, every subsequent step must prove a blunder in every process of philosophical inquiry. And accordingly, universal history shows that the false solution of the radical problem has been the fruitful source of all pestilential heresies, both in philosophy and religion.

To the mighty question, "What is causation?" four different answers, and no more, can be given—the skeptical, the material, the pantheistic, and the rational, or Christian.

To assert that man is utterly ignorant of the true nature of causation, is total skepticism.

To predicate the doctrine of invariable sequence, as did Hume and Brown, presents the formula of materialism. Idealism is but another phase of the same false view, for both idealism and materialism are at a certain depth identical, as they both take for granted that conjurer's trick of fleeting appearances, where phenomena have only the tie of antecedent and consequent, to bind them together in a union that touches nowhere and produces nothing.

If we answer, that emanation is the only causation, we are landed in pantheism. All individual existence vanishes away, and with it all proper ideas of right and wrong, of truth and falsehood; and, in fine, all logical predicates of every name and nature; for if nothing remains but indivisible unity, proposition is impossible, since it would be absurd to assert unty of itself.

The only remaining conceivable answer I deem the rational, the Christian, the true one—that causation alone resides in mind; that matter never can be a Cause; and, therefore, every phenomenon in the universe is, and ever must be, but the effect of intellectual force exerted by pure volition.

This view we now proceed to demonstrate, after the rigorous method of the geometricians, and discarding, as much as practicable, all loose and rhetorical digressions.

PROPOSITION I.

We may lay it down as a general proposition, that the perception of mathematical truth evinces mind of a lofty order.

It is for this reason the universal consent of mankind has placed Pythagoras and Plato, Archimedes and Kepler, Newton and La Place, among the very foremost of the species. We would not exalt beyond due bounds the dignity of mathematical studies. We have long since awoke from the dream of our youth, that supposed a vain distinction of high and low among the sciences, which ought to be like the halo of a star, bright all around. But, beyond question, there is no good reason for the neglect of those ennobling, strict, and severely logical exercises in our elementary education. Far wiser was the lesson taught by the great Plato, in the inscription engraved over his immortal academy—"Let no one presume to enter here who does not understand geometry."

However this may be, even in this age of light studies, no enlightened mind will deny that the power to perceive mathematical truth is essentially an attribute of no mean intellect.

COROLLARY.

Hence it follows, a fortiori, as a self-evident corollary, that to evolve mathematical motions—or, in plainer terms, to work mathematically, evinces mind of a still loftier order.

For to evolve mathematical motions unquestionably implies their perception. No person will assert for a moment that an analyst can reduce algebraic equations, or solve geometrical problems, and demonstrate theorems, without comprehending in the one case the meaning of the terms, and in the other the axioms and definitions on which the operations hinge.

To present this view in the clearest possible light, we beg leave to offer an obvious illustration.

Suppose that John and James sit down to work out a knotty question in decimal fractions; John passes from one operation to another with the skillful rapidity of an accomplished arithmetician, adding and subtracting swift as thought, and balancing tangled columns of vast numbers into a definite and accurate result; while James can understand the explication of it when it is stated in luminous order on the sheet before his eyes, but finds it wholly impossible to accomplish the task for himself. Now, which of the two, in the given case, manifests the superior intellect? The veriest skeptic must answer—"He who has not only the penetration to perceive, but the mental power to perform the processes assigned him." Thus, undeniably, to evolve mathematical motions implies not only their distinct perception, but the additional faculty of an active power also. Finally, I put the question home, and the entire controversy betwixt the believer and the atheist turns upon the answer—Can any one work out all the sublime problems of mathematics, from the simplest in the first book of Euclid to the most complex in conical sections, without the mind to comprehend what he is doing? He who responds in the negative must cruelly reason and betake himself to utter insanity.

The discussion of our second proposition will place this averment above all dispute. To that we will now attend.

PROPOSITION II.

All the motions of the material universe, in all their wondrous variety and unity, are strictly mathematical.

The foregoing proposition is susceptible of proof by an immense induction. The field for its exercise has absolutely no other limits than the frontier line hundred volumes might be filled with instances, and still the materials would remain unexhausted in their infinite richness. Every new discovery in the abyss of unfathomable Nature adds to the store, which is as vast as the immensity of creation.

We have only room in this hasty dissertation for a few out of incalculable millions of examples. Our choice will be only embarrassed by the teeming profusion that crowds upon our eye, and almost overwhelms every sense of the soul, from the circles of light that spread in decreasing intensity and augmented distance around the candle, near which we are now writing these paragraphs, to yonder remote pale star that twinkles through the open window, immeasurable leagues away, in the midsummer's night of a cloudless sky.

INDUCTION I.—MYSELF.

I will begin with my own organism.

I survey my right hand; it has five fingers. I look at my left; it has five also. There is another member of an algebraic equation. This is singular. I turn down to each foot, and on each behold five toes. There is another equation. This is still more singular. I then think of my bodily senses; there are five again. The wonder is increasing. And now all the millions of my fellow-men rise up before the mind's eye—and in rapid succession. Lo! the countless millions of millions that have lived and died pass along the great world-stage, in the view of astonished meditation; and they all, with unimportant exceptions, possess the miraculous five fingers on each hand, five toes on each foot, and glorious five senses. If this be not a God-announcing miracle, then is human reason itself a dream, and all truth a worthless fiction.

But let me apply to myself the rigorous doctrine of the calculation of chances, lest I suffer my judgment to be deceived by undue excitement of the organ of wonder.

In this calculation of chances, let me bear in mind an ingenious remark of Archbishop Whately, that "the probability of any supposition is not to be estimated by itself singly, but by means of a comparison with each of its alternatives."

Now there are but two suppositions possible as to this mysterious combination in the human organism, by which the number five is five times repeated, not only in myself, but in all the myriads of mankind. For these wondrous equations there must be a Cause; and that Cause, whatever may be its nature, and by whatsoever name you see fit to express its evidence, be it necessity, law, order, physical force, or God, must either possess intelligence to perceive its own marvelous results, or else be destitute of such intelligence, and work blindly through all its processes. There is no means to evade the force of this statement. These two are positively the only alternatives which logic allows us. For in abstract, definitive division, a perfect affirmation and negation always exhausts the subject divided. Everything, in the whole compass of thought, must be either a tree or not a tree; and as there is nothing that can be neither, so nothing can be both at the same time. Just, so, every Cause, or assemblage of Causes, must possess intelligence or not.

Therefore this wonderful combination of fives must be produced by either a rational Cause, or one wholly irrational—by a Cause that can perceive the relations of number, or otherwise—in fine, by a Cause that can count, or one that cannot count five, or any other numerical amount whatsoever.

Let me now assume the first alternative. If the Cause that arranged the relations of my several organs be sufficiently intelligent to understand the mathematical harmonies, then all is luminous. There is no chance to be calculated against their production, since he who comprehends the relations of number, can, of course, evolve such relations to any extent, and indefinitely, nay, infinitely, if he be granted to be infinite himself.

Let me now take up the only remaining alternative which the given case permits.

I will assume that the Cause, call it what you please, which produced this even combination of fives on my hands, feet, and in my corporeal senses, be not mathematical mind at all, but unconscious force—what, on such a supposition, are the chances against one single combination of fives, in a pair? Let the fixed laws of eternal mathematics answer the question. Suppose we had two dice with five faces each, marked in arithmetical order, one, two, three, four, five; we shake them in a box—what are the chances against turning up number five on each? Every gambler will answer, "the chances against such an event are just twenty-five, the square of the numbers on the several faces; or the total number of ways in which two separate series of fives can possibly be arranged."

Apply this analysis to the given case of the human organism. If the Cause which made me, man, be indeed destitute of mathematical reason, the chances against my possessing five fingers on each hand are twenty-five; add the five toes on each foot, and the chances are six hundred and twenty-five. Then incorporate into the calculation the five senses, and the chances are three thousand, one hundred and twenty-five. Let us now get a larger sheet, for the full flow of infinite numbers is fast pouring in upon me. Now calculate the chances against this combination of fives in two men; they swell to the enormous sum of nine millions, seven hundred and sixty-five thousand, six hundred and twenty-five. Then calculate the chances for four men like myself. They will be the square of the last number, and so on, forever. But the immense sums overpower all the most magnificent powers of our algebra, can aid us to grasp what soon stretches into immensity.

The attempt to apply the calculation to all the innumerable millions of mankind now living, and all that have lived and passed away, were as idle as to essay the enumeration of sunbeams shed during sixty centuries of solar years. The algebra of an archangel, with infinite space for his balance-sheet, and eternity for the period of solution, were insufficient, perhaps, for the overwhelming computation.

I would advise the atheist, before he dares grapple in this argument, to refresh his memory with the doctrine of the calculation of chances, in his favorite La Place—or, at least, to look into his common arithmetic. No acquaintance, however profound, with Fichte, Hegel, or other German mystics, will avail him aught in such an inquiry as the present.

In relation to my single self, I might pursue the subject much further. Throughout all the members of my body there runs a wondrous duality—in my eyes, arms, hands, feet, ribs, and the convolutions of the brain, where equal numbers balance each other.

The simple question that settles the controversy on its true basis is this: Could any cause without the intellect to perceive—the reason to count, produce all these invariable equations? Shrink not from this simple problem, I beseech thee, O, my brother! The infinite hopes hang upon it, and all time and eternity—the life everlasting, and the loves dearer than life itself. Fly not for refuge to barren logomachies. It will not thus be resolved. Answer me not, that these are only the effects of law! Say not, with Ralph Waldo Emerson (who thus responded when I presented the demonstration in private conversation), that "it is Order which does all this!" That is no solution of the problem at all, but only its statement in a different form. The enigma cannot be read by a mere repetition of the same idea crouched in other words. The difficulty remains as inexplicable as ever. For these equations, this sublime universal harmony, is the order itself—neither more nor less. Could the order constitute itself? Can there be order without intellect?

But even supposing that we allow a reality to the abstractions. Let us admit, for the argument's sake, that Law, or Order, or any idea you please, caused these mathematical harmonies of equation, in every series and degree; the same question rebounds upon us with undiminished force: "Is that wonderful order, that mysterious law, self-conscious? Knows it what it doeth? Can it count? Hath it mathematical reason?"

If ye answer "Ay," very well; ye believe in God, though ye misname him. But if ye say "No," the veiled Sphinx repeats her riddle. "How, then, can blind force produce heavenly harmony, and midnight darkness gild all worlds with ineffable radiance? Whence come these iris-winged splendors that flash up through all immensity? Yonder are the halos, but where is their sun?"

I know the beggarly sophism to which the skeptic ever flies as his dernier resort. He will reply, "Suppose we acknowledge a God to account for this magnificent order, we only postpone the difficulty indefinitely, without attaining the required solution. For then we must attempt the greater problem, to account for the existence of Deity himself." This objection is plausible only in appearance, and can never satisfy any but very shallow minds. The acute logician sees through it at a glance. It is one of the most pitiful specimens of ignoratio elenchi. It is founded on a total misapprehension of the true difficulty.

The reason why we set about accounting for the present order and harmony of Nature is, because we see with our own eyes its finite evolutions passing immediately before us. We see many millions of them begin; we watch their progress, as in some gorgeous panorama; and we behold them terminate. The flower puts forth in spring and perishes with the advance of autumn. Yonder great oak on the Alleghanies was once a little acorn, and shall again be nothing as an organized form. The child was born to-day; last year it was not, and next summer it may die. We are made acquainted with indubitable tokens of commencement in the whole material universe. We read those infallible signs in the first leaf of the Bible of creation, scorched, as it were, among the primitive rocks, by the mighty fire-pen of world-volcanoes. The star that shoots from the midnight sky proclaims as it falls: "Look, mad atheist! Lo! I had a beginning once, as now I have an end!"

For this reason we seek to account for these passing, present events—these mathematical motions, which, it were worse than lunacy to deny. We are irresistibly forced to the predication of a Cause by a fixed necessity of our rational nature. Failing to do so would be, not to over-soar the condition of living men, but to sink below the moral status of even brute instinct.

But the idea of a God presents no such problem. Here the necessity of the intellect does not hold. There is not a token, in all time or throughout all known space, of his commencement. He is not revealed to us by Eternal Reason in the character of an effect at all. In the mere conception of his whole being and attributes there is nothing whatsoever phenomenal. Therefore, to assert for the Divinity a producing Cause, were as foolish as to affirm a like predicate of the infinite space, his everlasting and unchangeable habitation.

We say, then, to the atheist, show us only the slightest proof that God ever began to be, and then, but not till then, can you, with any show of philosophical consistency, demand of us to account for his being. We admit that every phenomenon must have a Cause. Present us, then, some evidence that the hear you with patience, when you inquire for a pre-existent producing power. Nothing but phenomena implies causation. No one thinks of proposing such a question in relation to any eternal truth. Who is so silly as to ask why the three angles of a triangle are always equal to two right angles? We have dunces enough in this world of ours, beyond all doubt, but the darkest of them all never conceived such a problem as that. Give us the actual evolution of an undeniable effect, and its origin must be explained—some causual force is necessarily assigned. But to assert such an evolution, and then seek for the evolving power, is an act, not of philosophy, but madness.

In the works of material nature the transient manifestations pass immediately before our eyes, and therefore we must, in spite of ourselves, attempt to account for them. No one but a fool will ever ask, "What was before the Eternal? What is greater than the Infinite?" But every one endowed with one pale ray of human reason cannot help but ask, "What caused the transient? What is above the finite?" This is the first question of infancy, and the last of old age. The savage puts it to his reason in the earliest glimmerings of reflection; and it glances like a sunbeam, gilding the loftiest meditations of the sage. And all science is but an actual or ideal answer to this great radical problem of the universe.

Thus we have sufficiently shown the folly of atheism as an objector, as well as her insanity as a constructor of syllogisms. And now we return to our main argument, by which we are attempting to demonstrate that all motions in Nature are strictly mathematical.

INDUCTION II.—CHEMISTRY.

We will take our next comparisons from Chemistry, that youngest daughter among the sciences, the beautiful child of the Galvanic Battery, brought forth in splendor and cradled on rollers of fire.

Go, analyze me a cup of water; you find it composed of two parts of hydrogen to one of oxygen, by volume, and eight parts of oxygen to one of hydrogen, by weight. And these numerical ratios never vary. Freeze it into ice, hard as the granite of the eternal hills; dissipate it into vapor of such exquisite tenuity that it would take a million acres of the floating mist to form a single drop of dew; bring it from the salt solitudes of the ocean, or from the central curve of a rainbow, and submit it to the test of analysis; and still the pale chemist, as he watches the developments of his laboratory, calls out, "Two to one and one to eight, now and forever." And will any one be mad enough to affirm that the mighty Cause, who rolled out yon dark blue expanse of ocean, and bade the liquid crystal bubble in multitudinous springs from the fissures of cleft limestone, and sing in the innumerable flowing rills, was and is himself unconscious of the mystic numbers by which the separate elements that compose its dual essence are married to eternity? I would be loth to judge any man's heart; but it does seem to me that the head which can credit an hypothesis so monstrously absurd must have exchanged brains with a baboon. It may be argued that I express myself too strongly. I can only say, in reply, that I do not utter the half of what I feel. Nor can I be made, very easily, to believe that any decorous terms are too severe, in denunciation of the moral felons of the universe, who would rob humanity of its dearest hopes.

But to proceed with the argument. Go again, and analyze me a gallon of atmospheric air. You find it composed of twenty parts of oxygen to eighty of nitrogen in every hundred, by volume, nearly.

And these proportions never vary. Bring it from the high billows of the distant seas, or from the depths of the Lybian deserts, or with Guy Lussac in your balloon, bottled up twenty-two thousand feet above the earth's surface, and still the mystic numbers keep their exact count. And was the Cause of this numerical harmony—the Author who rolled this ocean of the breath of life, forty-five miles deep, around the globe—destitute of the reason to perceive the ratio of its union? Can that Cause count—yea or nay—which ever works in magnificent numbers?

But still again, go analyze me a bit of limestone. You discover that its elements bear a quadruple ratio. There are twenty-two parts by weigut of carbonic acid, and twenty-eight of lime. Lime is composed of twenty parts of the white metal calcium, and eight parts of oxygen gas. Carbonic gas is composed of sixteen parts of oxygen, and six parts of carbon. And these proportions, too, are of unchanging uniformity. They are the same in the stalactite, icicle-shaped and crystal-grained, torn from the roofs of coral caves, and in the rifled slab, hurled up from the heart of the earth by the volcano's hand, mailed with thunder, and in the glittering pebble that a child picks out of the brook in which it plays with naked feet. What a field is here for the calculation of chances! What a theme for devout and transcendent wonder! What a Bible is this among the old rocks! What magic hieroglyphics on the mountains!

But not only are numerical characters here; symbolical angles are traced in splendor also. All the hundred forms of carbonate of lime split into six-sided figures, called rhombohedrons, whose alternate angles measure 105 deg. 55 min. and 75 deg. 05 min. Let the mathematician come with his plane trigonometry, fresh from the schools, and study a higher lesson. But if he be wise, he will study it as the great Linnaeus studied flowers—on bended knees!

INDUCTION III.—BOTANY.

We will make our next comparisons in that science so charming to all lovers of Nature. Not over smoky furnaces, or in darkened chambers, will we read this division of our lecture; but out among the silken sisterhood of sweet-scented flowers, where the blue-eyed heavens smile love down in our faces, and the winds whisper through our sunny hair.

The first ten classes of Linnaeus are arranged simply according to the number of stamens in each flower.

Let us analyze a flower of the tobacco-plant. It is of the fifth class, and of course has five stamens. Its corol has five parts, and its calyx five points. It is so with every tobacco-flower on the earth. It ever was, and will ever remain so.

Now let us suppose that every flower is produced by a Cause that cannot count; what are the mathematical chances against this combination of fives, three times in a single flower? The answer is obviously: "One hundred and twenty-five;" while the chances against a like combination in two flowers amount to the great sum of fifteen thousand six hundred and twenty-five.

Let the atheist answer me. What must the chances be in one large field? In all the fields throughout the world during one solar summer? and extending the view still wider, so as to embrace all the summers ever shed by yonder bright sun?

He who can shut his eyes to the overwhelming force of this mathematical argument, deserves never more a single glimpse of the green fields, with their coronals of golden bouquets floating in their own perfume.

Look at the lily in her snowy robes. All over the world, and throughout all times, it numbers but six stamens, and its delicate corol is six-parted.

Some of those beautiful flowers are vegetable clocks and watches, and keep time with the revolutions of the world, and sublimer roll of the twinkling orbs in their eternal movements. Some open to the morning sun; some beneath the blaze of noon; others at purple twilight, when the soft dews begin to fall; and one in the wild West, the magnificent flower discovered by Captain Bonneville, near the base of the Rocky Mountains, lifts its gorgeous eye alone to gaze on the midnight stars! Do these blooms of Nature's garden know the divisions of days and darkness, or the seconds and minutes of recorded time, that they thus equal our best pocket chronometers in taking note of the fast-flowing hours? Can the Cause of all this order be unintelligent? He who can believe so may safely be set down in the category of those who are beyond the reach of all argument.

INDUCTION IV.—LIGHT.

We shall not hazard a single remark as to the nature of light, that wonderful agent that plays so important a part in the processes of creation, and which is so beautiful in itself, and moves with a velocity so immense, that, with a slight poetic license, it might be regarded as a smile of the omnipresent Deity. We have only to do, at present, with its mathematical evolutions.

Its first law is a strict algebraic formula, and may be expressed thus: The intensity of light decreases as the spuare of its distance increases, and vice versa. Does the Cause, whatsoever we may suppose it to be, which produces this mathematical ratio, understand the evolution of numbers? If not, how, in the name of reason, can it be supposed to form those miraculous squares that often sweep, in many circles, embracing billions of leagues, in the stellar spaces? Let me pledge faith in the wildest fictions of fairy land, the most impossible fables of false theology, sooner than in such inconceivable absurdities as an hypothesis like that. But it is ever thus; when the human mind once rejects the general belief of mankind, there is nothing, then, too monstrous for its voracious credulity.

The second law of light is stated mathematically, in a form equally luminous, and conveys a truth equally magnificent. The angles of incidence and reflection are always equal. Thus, if a ray of light from the sun fall on the table before me, at an angle of forty-five degrees, it is reflected again at a like angle; and so of all other lines of every possible obliquity. These angles never vary so much as a single hair's breadth. Euclid or Legendre has none so perfect. Try, we entreat you, oh, rational reader, with all your skill; and see if you can trace any equally exact, with the pen, on the smoothest paper! And is it possible that, after all, the Cause which thus geometrizes is devoid of all knowledge of geometry? If so, then may a blind mole—nay, a nonentity itself, compose a treatise superior in splendor and accuracy to Newton's world-renowned Principia.

But apply the doctrine of chances to these angles now being formed, every instant, all over the universe, and even imagination staggers under the immensity of the idea. Only pause here for a moment. Think of all the beams that emanate from the sun during one long summer day—of all the rays that flash out from the stars for only a single night. Then let your mind travel back over the march of dim, distant centuries, gathering age upon age, and cycle on cycle, in vast segments of eternity, where platonic years vanish into insignificant vibrations of the pendulum, and the duration of galaxies are seen but as shadows on the dial-plate of infinitude. Then bid imagination lift her lightning wing away on high, from world to world remote, as far beyond the reach of the telescope as the glance of that magic tube transcends the vision of a flitting insect, and behold the horizon of the space that knows no limits, still opening forever, onward and upward, and all around, and thickening with columns of suns, and breaking into nebulous starry haze, and undulating, like some shoreless sea, with waves of light, and then tell me the number of all the rays ever shot athwart the great immensity since the first fire-sons of heaven sang their choral hymn in the morning of creation—and then answer me, who shall calculate the chances against the perpetual, universal observance of the law in relation to angles, in and by all these, on the supposition that there is no God? Only God himself may solve the mighty problem!

We may here note a remarkable law, in reference to light of different colors, only discovered recently. [Children's Lyceum colors have high meanings.]

If two rays, from two luminous points, be admitted in a dark chamber, and falling on white paper, or other suitable reflecting surface, differ in their length by .0000258 part of an inch, their intensity is doubled. A like result is produced if such difference in length be any multiple of that nearly infinitesimal fraction by a whole number. But, strange to say, a multiple of 2½, 3½, 4½, etc., gives the result of total darkness! While a multiple by 2¼, 3¼ etc., gives an intensity equal to one ray only. In one of these cases the fact is seen, which, from the beginning of the world, has been regarded as the extreme of impossibility—light actually produces darkness!

Corresponding effects are witnessed in violet rays, if the difference in their lengths be equal to .0000157 part of an inch. And the like results are given by experiments on all other rays, the difference in length varying with a steady uniformity of increase, from the violet to the red. Who shall reckon the chances, in two cases only, in such vast number as these?

Let not shallow sciolism answer me by a pitiful evasion, "that all this is accounted for on the principle of mechanical vibrations." Cannot the merest tyro in logic see that the difficulty remains the same? For the question immediately presents itself: What causes the vibrations? And how can unintelligent vibrations be supposed to arrange such wonderful combinations of arithmetic?

Uniformity of colors in refracted light is equally marvelous.

See yon dark cloud, only a moment ago one thick mass of gloom, lurid, almost appalling to the gazer's eye! Suddenly the sun breaks forth in the western sky; and, lo! in an instant the rainbow is born, and stretches afar the curved wings of its prismatic plumage, as if to play around the world! Count well its gaudy colors. There is the sacred number seven, composed by the blending of the mystic three. And never, either on the land or sea, in city or solitude, hath a single cloud blushed to the kiss of the sunbeam without the colors of the sacred seven, painted by the Divine ray-brush, in heavenly enameling there. O, golden-haired sun! O, airy vapor! Father and mother of that beautiful child of the sky, brought forth in purple, cradled in vermillion, banqueted in molten gold, and swathed in [illegible] indeed blind? Can ye count without arithmetic? without the algebra of a Euler?—ay, without even the poor instinct of the eagle, that dips his wing in the checkered cloud—would ye undertake to teach the whole world mathematics?

Were there no other proof of the existence of a Deity, this one consideration would settle the question forever. Every rainbow is an exact mathematical equation of every other rainbow in the universe!

Awake, ye dreaming metaphysicians! Arouse from your darkling dormitories, and those pale lucubrations which are more than half slumber. Come away to the floods and fields, the flower-banks and the forests—out here, in open space and the free air, where sea and earth and sky mingle in mutual embraces, like the greeting of youthful lovers! Listen to the pine-songs, which are chants of praise, and the wind-warblers, which are hymns of hallelujah! Look up yonder on the fire-dance of innumerable rolling worlds, and then answer me, before the sun and all the stars—"Is there no God?"

We will take our next inductions from the science of Astronomy, which is only another name for sublimity itself.

For countless centuries, the stars, high and mysterious, had shone on in the blue vault of immensity; and ignorant man knew nothing of the nature of their movements—could not divine even what they were. But although knowledge may sleep, the eye of curiosity never closes while the heart of the human reckons one beat. And so the eager question was repeated in every age, and over all lands—"What do these lights mean?" But neither to Magian on the plains of Shinar, nor to the prince of philosophers in the "city of the violet crown," came forth any answer from the silent solitudes of the sky.

At length a little boy was born. His dark eye inherited some rays from the light of the stars, and flashed with wild meaning from his childhood; and as he grew up, he became a gazer at all things beautiful, and a questioner of all things dim. He saw all eyes turned to those "isles of light" that gem the seas of the upper firmament; and he heard all lips repeat the earnest inquiry, "What do those lights mean?" But he heard no whisper in reply. He looked at them with his naked eye, but the God's type of their far-off letters could not be read so far. He ruminated on the mystery day and night, and, either waking or sleeping, he dreamed of the power of lenses; and then set about constructing glasses to read the riddle of the lofty stars. He succeeded; for there are no impossibilities to patient attention—there never was a bar unconquerable to the will that dares all things! And then for the first time the vail of Egyptian Isis was lifted up, and the secret of ages was out. The stony eyes of the Sphinx melted with tears of joy!

What a miracle is this of the telescope! Never a poet lived, but in his heart wished for pinions to soar and mingle with the stars. Lo! Here are the plumes. The telescope gives not the wings to us; but it ties them with lines of light to the stars, which thus fly down to us, and tell us all their hidden laws! Is there anything in the golden dreams of fable—in all the tales of fairy enchantment, to be compared to this sublime result, evolved by mathematical reason?

Next came the great Kepler, and erected his triangular pyramid of the three laws, on the summit of which Newton stood, to fix forever the true theory of the universe.

Let us glance a moment at these laws.

1. All the planetary orbits are regular ellipses, in the lower focus of which the sun is placed.

Propose the problem to yonder intelligent schoolboy. Tell him to trace on the paper, with his pen, an elliptical curve, and dot the two foci. Can he do it? Come, sage skeptic, with all your boasted reason, can you do it yourself? The planets are masses of blind matter. Who, then, dare assert that such may trace perpetually, for thousands of years mathematical lines, with a regularity that no college professor can ever hope to equal?

2. The times occupied by any planet, in describing any given arcs of its orbit, are always as the areas of sectors, formed by straight lines drawn from the beginning and end of the arcs to the sun, as a center.

Let no one attempt the solution of this problem, in any specified case, unless he be a thorough mathematician. God solves it for all the planets.

3. But the third law of Kepler is still more astonishing. Hear! The squares of the periods of the planets' revolutions vary, as the cubes of their distance from the sun. What wonderful operations are these, to be the work of unthinking masses of matter! What music is this among the stars, to be sung by tongueless atoms!

Well might the inspired old man exclaim, "I have stolen the golden secret of the Egyptians. I triumph. I will indulge my sacred fury. I care not whether my work be read now or by posterity. I can afford to wait a century for readers, when God himself has waited six thousand years for an observer!"

Some cold critics have called this insanity. The man must be insane to say so! I never perused the passage without tears. It is the language of reason and imagination, which, at their sublimest depths, are but one.

We will not speak of chances here. We may not even think of them, unless we might pilfer the algebra of the morning star.

PROMISCUOUS INDUCTIONS.

1. Some years ago it was keenly debated whether the sea was not receding and the dry land gaining ground; and the general opinion of scientific men leaned strongly in favor of such an hypothesis.

At length a Swedish astronomer struck out a novel method of settling the controversy. He cut down a large pine tree that grew at the water's edge on the Gulf of Bothnia, and on counting the concentric circles, found that it was five hundred years old; and, consequently, during all that time the ocean must have remained stationary. This was decisive. And yet how wonderful the fact! Millions had lived and died; nations had flourished and fallen; genius had sung its flame-songs, and love had breathed its burning sighs, and all had passed away—and still the forest-born grew on, buffeted by tempests, and chilled by freezing frosts, but nurtured always by genial summers, and fed on silver-singing rains, and listening to the bird-music in its branches, till half a millennium is gone; and still all that time it had kept an exact account of its age, never losing a single year, all noted in beautiful circles, amid the fine woof of its own fibers. It is so with every cone of wood in the wide world. And again we ask, Can aught but reason trace circles, or reckon the count of passing time?

2. But let us select a last example. If anywhere we might suppose the absence of mathematical motion, we would expect to find it in those airflends that often desolate whole countries—the hurricanes of the tropics.

But modern science teaches us that [illegible] larger scale. That they all have a regular axis of rotary motion, which axis is itself progressive, like a planet in its orbit, tracing an elliptical or parabolic curve." Sometimes the vortex of storm covers an arch of over five hundred square miles; and sweeps over distant seas for hundreds of leagues; but ever this dual motion is preserved. Ay—beyond all question, the hand that launches the tornado, and girds its dark bosom with thunder, is the same that originally "weighed the hills in sucles, and the mountains in a balance," and not poor, blind, and utterly impossible chance!

Thus it is plain that all motions in nature are mathematical.

But the skeptic may object:

The proposition is not proven. For although we may admit that such a truth holds within the sphere of our actual observation, still, what right have we to extend the predicate beyond the limits of that sphere? What right can we show to carry it back to the everlasting ages of the eternity without a beginning, and down to the incalculable years of that time which shall never end? What right have we to break over the impassable limits of the sense of sight, and assert a law that we know only to appertain to a little segment of the circle of infinitude, of all the untrodden fields that may bloom with worlds, like flowers in the unexplored spaces, of which we behold but a twinkling point?

We have stated the objection in its full force; because it is much easier to answer than to state it.

We reply thus: All the forms of matter must be, of necessity, mathematical, simply because it is matter; as all its motions must likewise be so, for the reason that matter is inert.

We ask the reader to pursue the second scholium to the nineteenth proposition of the fourth book of Legendre. He will there find that all the figures possible in space are resolved into the triangle, and of course must be mathematical.

Then let him turn to Arnott's Elements, where it is demonstrated that all motion must be in a straight line, unless controlled by some interfering force, when it takes the direction of a curve. So all motion must be mathematical, or not be at all.

The simple answer that demolishes the whole objection is this: We see nothing but mathematical harmony in all the motions that occur within our own sphere—we can conceive of nothing but mathematical harmony in any other sphere. We see the unequivocal footsteps of a God within our sphere; and every fresh gush of light from the remotest suns adds to the evidences that it is so everywhere else in the wide universe. And this is enough. We are not called upon to roam over all space, and ascend the heights of all eternity, merely to answer a supposition destitute of even a shadow of proof, and verging close on the confines of absurdity! If we have a God ourselves, that is sufficient, if we but pay him the proper adoration. We need not stop to inquire whether some little mote or molecule of sand does or does not gyrate without a God, somewhere in the vast void of immensity!

Now let us put together, syllogistically, the two propositions heretofore demonstrated, and note the logical result.

1. Nothing but mind can work mathematically.

2. All the motions of Nature are strictly mathematical.

Then must it follow, as a conclusion utterly unassailable, that every effect in the universe is produced by the immediate agency of Mind.

To this, however, a plausible but false objection may be made. It was put against my argument last winter, by a distinguished Pantheist of Boston.

It may be said, that although it be demonstrated that matter cannot geometrize, still we are not entitled thence to infer that mind alone can; since there may be other substances in space beside matter and mind. What right, the objector may say, have we to assume duality only in substantial existence? It is true that we are acquainted within our own sphere with nothing but these. But our sphere is scarcely so much as an infinitesimal fraction of the whole universe. The entire concavity of the sky is a mere point, dotted in a space of inconceivable extent. The totality of our historical time is not a second in that eternity without bounds, which expands both behind and before us. And how can we know but beyond this paltry sphere there may exist millions of substances that are neither material nor mental, but of an altogether different, nay, contradictory nature? And even as to that, we are limited in our own fragmented sphere by the solid wall of impassable sensation, that shuts us up as in a cage or prison of iron bars, in this our little world of fleeting appearances. For aught we can say to the contrary, here, where we now dream our philosophical reveries, perhaps no loftier than those the oyster excogitates in his shell; yea, immediately here, in the very space occupied by this poor grain of earth, and yonder evanescent bubbles of air and sky, there may be now substances indefinite in number, the very opposite of matter and mind, and with which we have no sense fitted to converse! To deny this, says the sophist, were as unreasonable as for the animalculae in the dew-drop to assert that there is nothing but insects in the whole creation.

We cannot forbear remarking what a marvelous amount of credulity it implies to put with a grave face such objections. The skeptic refuses to credit the existence of the God who made him, though the splendor of the divine attributes shines on the face of all Nature brighter than the blaze of the myriad suns; and yet he finds no difficulty at all in affirming the reality of innumerable beings, the impossible brood of a wild imagination, as devoid of all proof as the fairies of Scottish fable—the veriest of all moonshine.

And yet even scientific men of eminent fame have entertained such vagaries, and gravely uttered them on the printed page. Dr. John Mason Good was absurd enough to give the hypothesis a place in that strange medley of fact and fiction so pompously denominated "The Book of Nature." I cannot but attribute such crude inanities to the general neglect of logic, mathematics, and true metaphysics among the moderns.

No person the least acquainted with logical analysis ever could have seriously started such an objection. It is founded on the sheerest ignorance of division. We showed, at an earlier stage of this inquiry, that the abscisso infiniti always exhausts the subject divided. Everything in the whole compass of thought must be either a tree or not a tree. It is so with matter and mind. We define mind, that which possesses reason; and we define matter, that which doth not so possess reason. And it is evident to a schoolboy that every object that ever was, or will be, or possibly can be, must either possess reason or not possess it. He who fails to see this distinction may rest assured, that whatever may be his talents, the faculty of logical investigation is not to him an attainable accomplishment.

For surely, unless reason itself be a dream, and insanity the only wisdom, every substance must be either active or not. And, therefore, matter and mind are two logical categories that encompass all thought and exhaust all Nature. We demonstrate, then: 1. That matter is passive, and consequently cannot be supposed to originate its motions. 2. That no effect in Nature can possibly occur without motion. We must, therefore, seek for causal force in the category of universal substance, or nowhere. We find it in mind; and this is confirmed by our own inner consciousness, which assures us, by the exercise of our voluntary activity, that the mind within us can and does produce motion, and cause effects as astonishing as they are beautiful. We next demonstrate that nothing but the reason, which perceives its own operations, can possibly work mathematically. And then we show by inductions, as wide as the generalizations of science, that all natural motions are mathematical. Hence, they must be produced by a cause possessing reason. And the calculation of chances proves most conclusively that to deny this is an absurdity a thousand times worse than the ravings of utter madness.

As to all that exuberant sophistry about the impossibility of predicating anything out of our own actual sphere, we may observe that it is but a common trick of skeptics when driven from the field of fair argument. They assume a feigned humility, meeker than the most pious believers. Creation becomes a mere point, and life the flutter of a leaf in the sunbeam. They claim affinity with the blind worm and droning beetle, and can do nothing but shiver with awe at the immensity above and beyond them. They ape all the ignorance of the child, without any of its trusting confidence, its ardent, innocent love, or its eager, soaring hope.

We admit the grandeur of eternity—we wonder at the infinitude of space; and we freely confess our own littleness when compared, not with those mighty masses of moving matter that wheel on high over our heads, but with that Omnipotent Being who guides them in their courses.

For although our life is fleeting, and our globe but a dot on the map of the universe, we have thought, that wanders throughout eternity, and, "before creation peopled earth," even now "rolls through chaos back;" and with a glance dilates o'er all to be in the vast fields of futurity, and climbs with winged feet the golden ladder of all the stars. Nothing material can do that—not the beam of light, shot from equatorial suns—not the lightning, which darts from heaven to earth in a moment. May we not assert, that although we be as nothing in the presence of that God "who wheels his throne upon the rolling worlds," yet one human soul of the countless millions of our species is superior to all the worlds that God ever made or can make? It inherits the divine attribute of reason. They never knew the sublime "geometry of their own evolutions!"

But it is utterly untrue that we can predicate nothing beyond the sphere of our own sensation. That is one of the follies of exploded materialism. Do we not know that everywhere a triangle must have three and only three angles? Can we not affirm this truth as certainly of the space a million leagues beyond the orb of solar day, beyond the farthest star that twinkles in blue ether, as of the little figure on the paper but six inches from our eyes? Must not the radii of every circle in the universe be equal? Is not the whole everywhere greater than any of its parts? Can there be any phenomenon without a cause? —In any, the wildest of the wilderness?—In any, the remotest cycle of eternity? Can love be a crime, or murder virtue, in any conceivable sphere of existence? Can truth become a lie for any being to whom atheism is not reason? All spheres alike belong to the soul, when it puts on its beautiful wings, and goes forth through the open door of universal faith to universal triumph. Then the stars beckon it to their bosom, and legions of angels fly down to meet it. Then it becomes a note in the eternal anthem of sphere-melodies that hymn the universal Father; and in affirming God, it conquers even death, and is already one of the immortals.

But again, it may be objected, that although no mass of matter can be supposed to move itself, yet two masses or elements, when brought sufficiently near, may move each other.

But this is too shallow for a serious answer. For how shall the given masses, or elements, or separate atoms, be ever brought near without first of all moving? And what cause may move them? Not other matter, for that would be to shift the difficulty without solving it. Such are all the arguments of atheism—fallacies that are their own refutation—quibbles that a modest monkey, were it gifted with speech, would blush to utter!

Another and very common objection of scientific skeptics may be expressed thus: It is true, say they, that we are irresistibly forced by our intellectual constitution to affirm a Cause for this vast flowing stream of phenomenal events that together constitute the universe. But we find that Cause in Nature; it is Nature which does all this. She builds up and tears down her own systems. She evolves at once the life and the death, which are but two different phases of one and the same fact, or as the opposite sections of all are, where the universe plays as a pendulum betwixt birth and dissolution.

See how easy it is to use words without meaning. The shadows of language do not embarrass each other—do not impinge, so to speak, at all, when they have lost the substance of ideas that gave them soul.

Let us ask the objector—Tell us seriously, what do you mean by the term Nature? Is it a reality, or only a relation? Hath it a substance? and if so, that substance, as we have seen, must be either matter or mind—must possess reason or not. And if it be without reason, how doth its mimicry of the attribute so far transcend all known originals? The difficulty loses nothing of its force by predicating Nature as the cause of any conceivable operation. The question still comes up, whence this exquisite harmony, which intellect alone could order? That will not down at the bidding of a lifeless word—that will not be solved by the art of a juggler, that merely shifts his penny covertly from one hand to the other.

All men of sense now agree that Nature is but a general term—a mere abstraction. It means but the totality of phenomena that constitutes the universe. It is the very order which it is used by the sophist to account for—nothing more. It is an ideal exponent, a symbol in the mind's algebraic notation for all the motions of the universal whole. It does not and cannot give the unknown X which lies beneath them.

It is the same with the phrase, "Laws of Nature." No philosopher, since the publication of Bacon's Organon, has regarded these as anything other than the very facts themselves generalized. They are merely classifications of observed phenomena. How ridiculously absurd it is, then, to use the word law to account for the facts that constitute the law, and without which it were not. It is a law of Nature that the sun rises in the morning. But that is nothing more than a general statement of the [illegible] because it is a law of Nature, is precisely equivalent to the identical proposition, "the sun rises because the sun rises!"

Nor is the case at all different, if we use the word property instead of the word law. For recollect, that Matter and Mind are the only two substances possible, even in imagination. And when you affirm that a certain property in one body causes motion in another, before you look wise, and raise a shout of gratulation at the fancied success of your own ingenuity, pause a moment and ask yourself the short, simple question—What is property? Is it matter, or is it mind? Is it an entity, or an abstraction? Has it color and form, or hands and feet? Has it consciousness and a will? And above all—for that will touch, as with a ray of electrical light, the secret heart of the matter—be sure and ask, "Has the given or supposed property Reason, and does it understand mathematics?

But we feel that on this part of our argument among these skeptical objections, we have wandered far from the sunlight of the common earth and air, into a dim world of empty abstractions. A cold wind breathes in our faces, like "the difficult air of the iced mountain-tops, where the birds dare not build, nor insect's wing flits o'er herbless granite;" or rather like the stifling vapors of sepulchral vaults, where shadows come and go, as in a dance of mocking wild-fires. Never mind; let us proceed. The children of the mist will vanish before the torch of Reason, and the firmest pillars of the capital of atheism melt away into mere negation.

I will now state an objection to the mathematical argument, urged in a private conversation, by an eminent atheistical writer of Boston, during a recent visit to New England.

He said: "It is true I cannot pretend to answer your demonstration by laying my finger on a palpable logical flaw in the reasoning. But I can do more. I can show that it must be false, since it contradicts the evidence of the senses. You can undertake to prove that one body cannot move another. Every man's eyes behold the contrary. Yonder is a barrel of gunpowder. Let a spark fall on its surface, and the whole detonates instantaneously with a deafening explosion, producing light, heat, and sound."

To this we reply, that in such cases as these, and all others of sensible motion, our eyes truly see nothing but the visible phenomena. We behold the appearance, not the power which produced it. The surface is plain enough to view; the solid center eludes our vision. Yet we know there is a producing power—we believe with absolute certainty in a center. We cannot help doing so, unless we would turn maniacs. The veriest atheist does the same. Ask him what causes the gunpowder to deflagrate on the application of a spark of fire? He will not answer—unless in the last stage of lunacy—"there is no cause for it, in good sooth." That would be too much for even an atheist of the Modern Athens. He will respond, "there is a secret property in the spark to ignite the powder, and therefore it must be ignited;" and ten to one he will launch boldly out into a learned dissertation concerning the chemical composition of the powder, and the hidden qualities of fire, showing, with consummate ingenuity, how well suited they are to be joined in wedlock—how much they desire to be married, and what a flame-progeny they must necessarily beget between them! Now ask him what is the secret property in the spark which evolves such results? He will surely respond—"It is the unknown cause, which has the power of production." One more question and the problem is solved. Is that property or cause matter or mind? Doth it know what it doeth? Hath it a will to originate motion? Can it move itself? And so still on and forever, there can be but one solution for the universal enigma, and that alone is afforded in the infinite reason. We can never hope to meet with action, save in that which is essentially active. The purely passive cannot furnish it.

But finally, as a last resort, the skeptic flies in a sudden panic, as it were, from his own objections, and takes refuge in blasphemy. "If there be a God," says he, in the maddened language of Shelley, "that God must be the author of all evil; and such a proposition is more revolting than the worst forms of atheism. I would rather," he continues to urge, "credit any absurdity, or commit any conceivable folly, than acknowledge a creed like that. Can we suppose that a God of infinite reason and unlimited power would voluntarily create such a universe as this? Would he give life to beings, only to confer an acquaintance with its exquisite sweetness, and then almost instantly take it away? Would he plant in quivering hearts not only those burning tortures which are of the very essence of hate, but those sorrowy stings that follow the rosy feet of gliding love also? Tell me that God made some other world, where perfection is the order of Nature, and I may, perhaps, believe you. But ask me not to admit a divine origin for such a desolate sphere as this. Somewhere else, for aught I know or care, there may be harmony. Here I behold nothing but sin and disorder. Pestilence and famine—volcanoes and devouring war—tempest and earthquake, alone reign around us. A wild, wailing howl of agony resounds throughout all lands; and even brute instinct echoes the appalling cry of the human. Vanity is written, in fire-letters of ruin, even on you starry azure, where pale suns burst in shivered bubbles, and vanish away. Urge not that a Deity dug, in void space, this universal sepulcher, haunted alone by the ghost of mourners, by the incalculable millions. Say that it is the work of some dreadful demon, and I may entertain the proposition!"

Such blasphemies are horrible to hear. * * * * I can listen to any other man with patience. I can bear with the poor Pagan, who honestly bows the knee to his idol, painted with blood though it be. I can sympathize with the Polytheist, who beholds a separate god in every object of beauty and of wonder. I recognize a brother man struggling through the deep gloom of superstition, striving to reach the light. But I recoil instinctively from an unprincipled atheist. I realize the fearful presence of some dark spirit of a different order.

But let us trace the objection seriously, according to the strictest rules of logic.

We remark, in the first place, that it is not an objection to the argument, as such, but a mere truculent tirade against the conclusion established. And even so to this, it is wholly irrelevant. It lies, if it be of any worth at all, not against the being, but the attributes of the Deity. The presence of evil may, or may not, furnish a valid reason for pronouncing as to the moral character of a power. It certainly does not touch the question of existence at a single point whatsoever. The dullest intellect must perceive this at once, without illustration, on the bare statement. The problem of the origin of evil has positively nothing to do with the proposition that God is. It belongs to a very different category—the inquiry as to whether God is good.

OCCULT MYSTERIES.

FOUR DEATH PROPHECIES FULFILLED

THE DOCTOR WHO WAS WARNED BY A MEDIUM, THE CITY TREASURER AND THE YOUNG SOCIETY MAN WHOSE TRAGIC DEATHS WERE FORETOLD BY A BLIND GYPSY, AND THE CLUBMAN WHOSE TERRIBLE FATE WAS REVEALED BY THE READING OF HIS PALM.

Within a year past four well-known men of Louisville, Ky., have died under tragic circumstances. In each case the death has been foretold; in each the warning was laughingly disregarded.

What was there in the look, the touch, of these four happy, prosperous, healthy young men which could have suggested to the blind prophetess, Lou Monahan, or to Mrs. Peterman, the medium, or to the young society girl practicing palmistry for the amusement of it, that they were to meet with sudden and violent deaths?

It is not a pleasant thing to make this some prophecy to a man, young, revelling in life, in strength.

But in each case the warning seemed wrung from the prophetess by some mysterious power stronger than she.

And now that the four men are dead hundreds who have learned of these appalling coincidences are speculating afresh with beating hearts and scared faces on the eternal mysteries of things.

It was between October 1, 1901, and January 1, 1902, that these four fatal accidents occurred.

Not to Dr. Alfred Lemberger, who, laughing at a woman's curse, fell dead across the card table; nor to Stuart Young, the defaulting city treasurer for $50,000, who fills a suicide's grave; nor yet to Austin Kent, the society favorite, ground to pieces beneath the wheels of a switch engine; nor, finally, to Will Goddard, the popular young man about town, who fell a victim of his own recklessness with firearms, was given a moment's warning. In each case the predicted time for the fulfilling of the prophecy came.

GOT $35,000 LIFE INSURANCE.

Goddard alone took precaution, and, as a result, his father will profit by the $35,000 life insurance which the young man took out two weeks before his death.

Of the four cases, that of Dr. Lemberger was the first, and in some ways, the most appalling. He was a physician, widely known in his profession for his ability and among poor people for his charity. The child of a poor foreign family, whom he attended, died after suffering for days from diphtheria, and, according to the law, Dr. Lemberger was compelled to placard the house. The mother was enraged, for she thought the yellow sign a curse. She followed the doctor to his home, and placing both hands over his heart held him as in a spell as she hissed:

"I wish you ill! I wish that your horses will die, that your dogs will die, and then that you will die and burn forevermore!"

The doctor paid no attention to the curse until his fine hunting dog disappeared. Then, after trying everything else, he sought the aid of Mrs. Peterman, a medium. She said to him: "Do not worry about that particular dog, because within nine days that fine mare will die, the colt that you value will die, your last hunting dog will disappear, and then you will die."

The doctor belonged to a little club that met to play cards regularly. The members heard the story of the prediction and straightway it became a standing joke. The doctor laughed with them until one day, October 4, the mare died suddenly.

About three days after the death of the mare, the six-months-old colt refused to eat, and the next morning had developed an acute case of pleurisy. Four men worked with the little animal for six hours, and then it died.

The morning after the death of the colt, the last good hunting dog disappeared. Two of the pups died that same day.

LAST PROPHECY FULFILLED.

But one of the strange woman's prophecies remained to be fulfilled.

The time for the club meeting rolled around. The doctor went. He seemed in finer spirits than he had been for a week. He was even joking and laughing about the prophecy of the strange woman.

They were playing "auction pitch."

"I bid one," said the man on Dr. Lemberger's left.

The physician ran his cards over. The others were doing the same and paid little attention to him.

"I bid two," said Lemberger at last.

Then he fell forward on the table, dead.

The prophecy of the soothsayer had been fulfilled.

It was on the evening of the ninth day.

And yet, the Fates in their thread-clipping were kinder to Alfred Lemberger than to Stuart Young, city treasurer. Lou Monahan, the blind woman, made known well in advance to him his condition and what his end would be.

"For God's sake, don't tell me that," he gasped—then rushed from the house. And the next Lou Monahan heard was nearly two months later when the woman who lives with her read aloud from the newspaper of the $50,000 shortage and horrible suicide of the city treasurer.

No one stood higher than Young. No one was more popular, and even if some shrewd people did wonder how a $3,000 salary kept up a $20,000 pace, it was a long time before suspicion was given a public voice. All knew that his brother the president of a jockey club in Chicago, had money, while his father in Louisville could command almost any amount.

Early in the summer Mr. Young was married to Miss Bessie Wymond, for several years a noted Kentucky beauty.

But finally, on Nov. 20, an afternoon newspaper printed a sensational article under these headlines: "City Treasurer Young Is Short."

Young had been out in the country all day and was returning when a newsboy, to whom he had been kind many times, stopped him.

"Oh, Mr. Young, look here, they got your picture in the paper. What does it mean?"

READ THE STORY OF HIS CRIME.

The man took the paper and held it out to read above the big two-column cut of himself—"Defaulter."

The game was up. A minute he held the paper, then without a word handed it back to the newsboy.

He went through an alley and came out into a vacant lot. Quickly he drew a pistol from his pocket and placed it against his head. There was a report, a full. And, almost in the shadow of the great Confederate re-union amphitheatre, where at the big balls he had presided as a leader, Stuart Young, the shrewd politician, the social favorite, the defaulter, lay dead.

Terror-stricken, the watching newsboy rushed away to the Louisville Hotel to give the alarm, and there at the door almost overran a Western Union boy who had been waiting an hour with a telegram for Mr. Young. The message was from his brother in Chicago, who, suspecting trouble, had wired him not to worry for he would be down immediately and all financial difficulties would be straightened out.

Death had won that race by just fifty yards, and the prophecy of Lou Monahan had come true.

But how was that prophecy? How came it, and of what did it consist?

Lou Monahan, who to the gift inherited in her family for generations back of foretelling the future, adds marked power as a medium, is the only one able to answer the question.

In the old days of long ago when "Superstitious Louis" reigned on the throne of France, there was a beautiful gypsy girl, Louise. And she was remarkable, so runs the tradition, not only for her beauty, her grace, her spirited nature, but also for her wonderful power to foretell events. In fact, her ability in this line was the salvation of the band, for she kept them warned in advance of danger.

WHERE HER STRANGE POWER FAILED.

Her only failing was that she could never foretell important events in her own life, and so it was quite natural that she should fall in love with a young soldier, a noble and a member of the king's guard. She married her lover and at the court the king saw the beautiful gypsy. A son was born to her, and then the husband mysteriously died.

The wife, so the story runs, killed herself to save her honor and to escape from the king. And that little baby, born of that ill-fated marriage, was the many, many times removed ancestor of Lou Monahan. The babe inherited his mother's powers and in every generation since then there has been one of the family able to foretell the future.

To her inherited faculty Lou Monahan adds a strong mediumistic power.

To the Sunday World correspondent the blind prophetess told the story of the warnings she had delivered to Stuart Young and Will Goddard.

"Goddard called me a fool and a fakir," she said, "when I gave him the warning. I had to tell him. He came down with a gay party and they waited while he came in to have his fortune told. He sat down opposite me in the chair, and I knew that it was hard for him.

"I told him some trivial things, and then at last I had to tell him the truth—that there was danger and death for him. He was to pass out suddenly in a tragic, horrible way with much pain. It would be a bloody death. I told him to avoid trains and firearms for months if he could. He got up and laughed, said I was a fakir, trying to make money by skinning the public!

DIED WITHIN THE MONTH.

"'Yes,' I said to him, 'you may think that, but take out life insurance for the dear ones you'll leave behind.' Then he blustered out. That was during the first week of December. On Dec. 31 he died."

Within three weeks of the time he had consulted the prophetess Goddard had taken out $35,000 worth of insurance, the last lot, $15,000 in the Metropolitan Company of New York, being contracted for on Christmas Eve.

The next day Goddard went for a hunting trip to his uncle's place near Paducah. Always agreeable, entertaining, a social favorite and a splendid fellow, Goddard took from the first. His ability as a sportsman aided, too, in the impression he made upon all. The actual hunt was a great success. The time set for the departure of the Louisville man, December 31, came. There was a small dinner, a few guests in his honor at his uncle's house, but as his train left early Goddard had to leave them all a few moments to pack his things.

"I'll be back in a jiffy," he shouted, as he jumped up the front steps, three at a time. The others waited for him below, now and then shouting up to "make it quick there!"

"Suddenly the roar of a shotgun sounded from above.

"My God! Will's room," and his uncle, heading the guests, rushed up the steps.

There the young man was found dead, the still smoking gun lying on the bed beside him.

William Austin Kent, the fourth Louisville man to be warned, was ground to death beneath the wheels of a Wabash switch engine at a dangerous crossing in North St. Louis on Dec. 26. It was just a few days before that Kent had written to a friend in Louisville:

"Isn't it queer, a girl at a dance the other night told me that I ought to have been dead before now, for the fates had willed me not to live until thirty?"

Kent had been in St. Louis a month, and a friend who has since returned to Louisville tells the story:

It was during supper at a big dance when the girl sitting opposite exclaimed suddenly, "Mr. Kent, let me see your hand."

"What for?" he asked.

"Oh, I'm something of a palmist, it looks so queer," she explained.

After one glance the girl gazed at him horrified.

"Why! Why! You ought to be dead," she cried. "The lines in your hand say you are to die a tragic death before you are thirty!"

"Is that so?" he laughed. "Well, I've just passed thirty, so I suppose I'm safe."

"Well, be careful, Mr. Kent, please be careful," the girl insisted; and laughing, but moved somewhat by her earnestness, Kent promised to be as careful as possible.

A few days later a friend asked Kent to accompany him on a tour of the St. Louis terminals. The young Louisvillian agreed readily. A party of five went in a gasoline motor car. The car came around a curve toward a dangerous crossing at full speed.

Then the party espied a switch engine approaching. It was too late to stop. The man at the lever turned on full speed. It was a race with death. Closer and closer steam engine and motor car approached the crossing. From his cab the horrified engineer looked into the eyes of five fearful, awe-struck men in the motor car. Only the man at the lever kept his head, holding the motor car at full speed.

It seemed a matter of inches.

Suddenly three men arose in the car. Together the three leaped for life. Then the car whirled over the track safe by five feet. One man, D. Ewing, who jumped, saved himself. Kent and his friend were ground to pieces beneath the switch engine.—New York World.

SERIOUS AND OTHERWISE.

Some Experiences with an Ouija Board.

In the winter of 1895-6 three attorneys-at-law, of whom I was one, and the wife of one of them, residing in a certain city of Wisconsin, all of whom had been investigating Spiritualism and psychic phenomena for several years, and who had had considerable experience with professional mediums, determined to undertake an independent investigation.

For that purpose we met regularly once a week during the entire winter.

We adopted as the instrument for our investigation a kind of "ouija" board which we made, consisting of a large hard wood board, with the alphabet, the numerals and a number of words most frequently used, written upon it, and a side of cigar box slightly warped with a hole about an inch square cut in the center. We made the edges of the concave side of the small piece of wood smooth, so that it would move easily over the face of the larger board.

The two persons operating the apparatus placed their hands on the little board and it would move over the face of the other and come to rest with the hole over a letter, a number or a word.

We all obtained results with this apparatus, but Mr. and Mrs. P. were the most successful, probably because more mediumistic than the other two.

We received communications which were astonishing, at least to us. Some of these communications were from deceased persons, with whom we had been acquainted, and some were from those of whom we had never heard.

Mr. ——, an attorney-at-law, with whom we had been acquainted and who had died shortly before, appeared regularly for a time and talked upon scientific subjects. Finally he gave way to a celebrated statesman, who during nine sittings discoursed on the most absorbing political question of the day—the financial question—in a communication containing about 3,400 words. The thoughts and the language of this remarkable communication could only have come from a profound thinker and most scholarly person.

The messages we received were not all of a serious character; many of them were jovial and trivial.

On one occasion my former partner, who had been mayor of the city and who had died about a year before, announced himself, when my hands and those of Mr. P. were on the board, and we had quite an extended conversation. I remember the following portion of it, which contains some test questions. In this quotation I shall designate my deceased partner as "X" and myself as "Y."

Y.—When did you and I first meet?"

X.—"In 1881."

Y.—"Where was it?"

X.—"On an N. P. train."

(Both of these answers were correct; we first became acquainted while traveling on a Northern Pacific train in 1881.)

Y.—"Have you met F—— A—— over there?"

(A. was a mutual acquaintance who had committed suicide.)

X.—"Yes."

Y.—"What is he doing?"

X.—"He got a year in h—l."

Y.—"Are you in the same place where A. is?"

X.—"No. Wine in queer bottles. I am an angel."

Y.—"Do you ever feel that you would like to be back here again?"

X.—"Yes, just for the spring election."

Y.—"How does it seem to die?"

X.—"You lose consciousness for a short time and then you remember what was taking place when you stopped breathing."

"X" had not been a believer in a future existence, and we had urged the question more than once. I therefore asked him this question:

"Are you not now satisfied that I was right in saying that death is not the end of life?"

X.—"My presence here demonstrates it."

At some of our meetings our apparatus moved with little, if any, hesitation and we got long communications. At others, the board moved very slowly, and the result of the evening's sitting was meager and unsatisfactory. On some of these occasions it was stated that the atmospheric conditions were such that communication was difficult. On one occasion the message was broken into by some influence and became unintelligible.

Finally, when we were about to give up in disgust, these words came: "A band of roving red men is around here." This explained it.

On another occasion, when my hands were on the board, we had been getting but small results. Finally these words came:

"You have got your legs crossed."

It was a fact that I was in that position. I changed my position and the board moved better. It is said that crossing the legs interrupts the current.

Whether these communications came from the persons named in them as the senders, whether they came from persons deceased or still living; whether they were Spiritualistic or telepathic, I know not. Of one thing I am, however, convinced—that is, that the communication came from some intelligence outside of the party of four making the investigation.

I will add that I shall believe the communications to have been Spiritualistic until I am convinced by some better argument than that contained in Hudson's "Law of Psychic Phenomena" that they were telepathic.—Newton J. Ensley in the Indianapolis Sentinel.

NOTES AND THOUGHTS.

Locked Up in Words Lies Wisdom.

Our Southwestern trip proved highly beneficial to my youngest daughter and myself in many ways; and our experiences were often unique. My friends are constantly asking me how I like Texas. I certainly like Texas people, but I am still pondering as to how much I like the country.

At El Paso the gray landscape is a perpetual contrast to the golden sunshine and the warm-hearted people, but while the sand-storms raged I felt sure there were other places to live. Dallas, the Chicago of the Southwest, encountered an unusually hot summer, and when the mercury showed 110 degrees I frequently thought of the breeze-swept lake regions of the North.

Galveston, when protected by a sea-wall offers in the future alluring possibilities, but two and a half feet of water in the yards and streets reminded me of the value of hillside homesteads.

San Antonio is the queen of pretty cities, and Fort Worth has many beautiful possibilities, but the tides drifted us north once more.

But Texas and Mexico are fascinating and I am convinced offer just the right climatic conditions for development of test-giving and physical mediumship. But parties seeking it for that purpose should have their own home surroundings and be sure to drink either filtered water or rain water. The northern and western part of the State would be best for physical development, San Antonio and the coast for messages. The wide gray plains, covered 365 days of the year with pale, golden sunshine; the green fields of North Texas merging into the beautiful undulations of the territories; the wide, wet prairies of the South with their miles of sugar cane and rice; and the broad table lands of Mexico with their strange population, homes and daily lives, attract the earnest student by the inarticulate cry of their people for light, more light; for knowledge, for truth.

At Houston I had the pleasure of meeting old friends who gave me cordial welcome. Among others I was pleased to greet Mrs. Florence B. Shaffer, now lecturing for the Houston Society. Mrs. Shaffer is an unusually well educated, deep thinking psychic, and should be constantly employed by the truth-seekers of the Southwest. A lady of unexceptionable character, she stands in a position to place our cause properly before the people.

"Locked up in words lies wisdom," a sentence used by Mrs. Shaffer during a lecture, attracted my attention most forcibly; and I thought how foolish it all is, this constant battering at old words. The old terminology was evolved out of the spiritual apprehensions of the people of the past, and their original meanings are wholly spiritual.

Many Spiritualists object to using the word church—a sympathizing assembly of souls; and of religion, to bind back to God, (Spirit, Love).

But to my mind the one word which has brought more evil into existence, which has caused more tears to flow, more hearts to break, more brains to throb with sorrowful thoughts, more orphans to suffer, more widows to mourn, more of the helpless and aged to sigh without hope than any other is the

and if we feel it absolutely necessary to destroy words we should be at least slightly sensible and commence by uprooting that word from all languages.

We cry out that under the word religion rivers of blood have flown and inquisitions flourished, but the mind to do these wrongs was inherent in mankind as the first cause, and the word religion was only an excuse, just as the words liberty and progress covered the most revolting and bloodiest revolutions in France and many other countries; but it was humanity which was bloodthirsty, and fiendish, not Liberty, the Majestic Spirit of Truth.

Within the shelter of the word Home more children have been murdered, more helpless women tortured, more good men driven to destruction than under cover of any other term, and yet we love the word, and as a people forget the evil and cling to the good associations in our memories of it.

Sustained logical thinking is perhaps a gift for the few, but surely common sense will intervene some day and we will cease this useless discussion over words with well established definitions.

Angels—ministers of God; Heaven,—the heights, heaved up; Hell, Hades, Sheol, the grave, deep, dark caverns, the depths; are words which belong to Truth and should be used by all Spiritualists.

Perhaps it would be better to study words nearer home. The word Spiritualism signifies the belief that departed spirits hold intercourse with mortals by means of physical and psychic phenomena; and 2nd, the quality or state of being spiritual.

To believe is the most objectionable term possible to use in the vocabulary of men of science. The higher religionists also repudiate it; and it is out of place among people who profess to possess knowledge.

The theories of spirit return have become demonstrated facts, and instead of being believers we know.

Evidently Webster needs an addition to define the words Spiritualism and Spiritualist, or else we need a new term to designate the majority of our people.

My Sturgis audiences have grown in interest weekly. The young ladies of the Harmonial Society gave a select dancing party which was very successful in all ways, the 14th. Much of the continued interest of this association has been due to the faithfulness of the young ladies.

Miss Etta Pontiers, who possesses a beautiful and highly cultivated mezzo soprano voice, furnishes vocal selections. The genial Dr. Denslow presides, this being his second year of office. I am entertained at the home of staunch-hearted Mrs. Hannah Buck, whom all workers love and remember.

"Where are we at" might be less frequently inquired into if official bodies would take the same action as the board of trustees of the Texas State Association, which sent out a circular in folder form as an educator. Let other State Associations follow suit and we soon will have not only a devoted membership but a welcoming mind from all people.

GREAT LESSONS.

They Are to Be Found in The Progressive Thinker.

The last Progressive Thinker, February 1, is chock full of good things. The leading article by Jas. C. Underhill, "The Desires and Pleasures of the Vivisectionists," is worth a year's subscription. It should be read by every lover of justice and humanity. Every reader of The Progressive Thinker owes it to himself to read it carefully, and study its lessons, and then echo them around the world.

"Spirit Return," by Louisa B. Reed, interests me much, for I am after facts and testimony of a careful clean-cut character, that stand out strong and clear as representative history.

We read the comments of the three distinguished writers on the Bangs Sisters and the challenge, and were glad to see the subject attracting attention. Hon. A. Gaston sums up the case admirably, and I think justly and fairly. D. Edson Smith shows his faith in facts and common sense by a $500 testimonial. I think there are thousands who could safely say as much and find no one to earn the reward. But that there are adverse facts and experiences, I presume most of the witnesses will admit. The Sisters are often heedless and do and say things which they ought to know create suspicion with sincere investigators. I infer that they have all their lifetime been so familiar with these agencies, and they are so common they habitually treat them in a free and easy way, and do not think of the suspicious appearances of their acts, as judged by skeptics. But the absolute genuineness of striking phenomena manifested by means of their mediumship without any possible trick on their part, can be substantiated by hundreds of witnesses in all respects as well qualified to judge, and as critical in observing as Mr. Mangasarian or any other doubter.

I can duplicate Mr. Edison's offer with perfect safety, and find no one to earn the $500. I offered $100 to any one who will duplicate our picture of Maude, under the same conditions, and show it to be a trick. No one has attempted it, though it is over four years since my challenge was published. It is not a bet, but a reward that I could afford to pay for such a revelation.

Some of Mr. Singer's criticisms seem to be well taken, and perhaps the mediums may profit by them; but his letter carries a shadow of sarcastic bitterness, and censorious suggestions, that does not impress me as the criticism of kindly sincerity. It may be intended as such; but if it is, the writer seems to me unfortunate in his temperament adaptations. I think the Sisters are right in refusing to accept a wager; but it seems to me they should have offered Mr. Mangasarian an opportunity to test them, and to do it exhaustively, in his own way, provided he imposed no unreasonable obstacles to the exercise of honest mediumship; but he should not expect them to give their time and psychic energy to him without proper compensation. If he would pay them for a day, or a week, what is their average earnings, they should, it seems to me, be willing and glad to devote their gifts to him. These criticisms ought to be helpful to the Sisters, as genuine mediums, which they surely are.

But I am interested in the establishment of all facts bearing upon the question of a future life and spirit communion, on a scientific basis; and so long as any of the phenomena are attended with conditions that leave room for a possible doubt, there is need of discussion and experimentation, of the most exhaustive character.

I wish I could get more definite testimony in regard to that remarkable experience quoted from the Rochester Herald. Such things, if they can be thoroughly substantiated, furnish a natural prelude to the advent of Modern Spiritualism. What I chronicle as history should be thoroughly verified, as nearly as possible beyond any suspicion of error. I am getting some interesting responses to my call for facts, and hope all points will be thoroughly covered in time. The Progressive Thinker is a great medium for collecting and distributing knowledge.

LYMAN C. HOWE.

INSANITY.

A Subject That Should Be Better Understood.

To the Editor:—Here is a subject that should be better known among Spiritualists. Much was known about insanity in pre-Christian times. Instances of those called mad, controlled or inspired by spirits, good or evil, occur frequently throughout the history of animal life. Insanity, unless forced upon public notice, is not sought out by the educated or ignorant who are given to self interest. Sometimes a case of insanity is forced on a person, then that person has an interest in the subject.

Hypnotism and Spiritualism led me to know much about modern insanity, and to know more about insanity as I read about it in history.

The ignorant should not be allowed to judge, to convict another as one insane. Those who are most learned in science of mind, and humane, should act as such judges when such service is required. The imperfection and cruelty of the present system of confining in hospitals for insane, persons who were orderly, peaceful and in good health, when in fact these persons are mediums. This is a horrible monster in our state. Some of these persons in prison as insane are peaceful clairvoyants and clairaudients, and no other fault was found in them. Who put mediums to death, of old? Who put those mediums in a hospital for the insane and keep some of them prisoners there to this day? They are there. I have seen them, talked with them and examined them with care, and after an experience with mediums for forty years. We should have our hospitals for the insane examined, both the private and public hospitals. This work should be done at once, so a great wrong may not be against us of this generation after we know of it. We have strong-minded and educated men in the ranks of Spiritualists. These should help the weaker ones in this work of education for justice for our mediums who are in prisons for the violent and imbecile insane. A little space may be used for the history of insanity in sacred and profane history. We can call on all Christians to help heal the insane after the manner of Jesus, his first followers, disciples, etc. "And certain women, which had been healed of evil spirits and infirmities; Mary called Magdalene, out of whom went seven devils."—St. Luke 8:2.

We can call on the materialists to heal others according to their knowledge. We have the history of the insane told in the sacred books of various people. Some of this information is to be read in the Bible. How were the insane treated and healed by different races of people?

An ancient case of spirit control is recorded in the case of a learned physician who was summoned by Proetus, King of Argolis, to attend his three daughters, who were stricken with insanity, because they neglected the worship of Bacchus. The physician found the three princesses running about the fields, and lowing incessantly, under the belief (obsession) that they were cows, and not maidens. He very soon produced a change.

It is an important fact, to notice that the ancients believed, or knew, that the neglect of the worship of Bacchus was punished by causing the scoffer to be controlled, or obsessed by an evil or ignorant, insane spirit. Nowadays intoxicants or other modes of intemperance are the causes of some phases of insanity or evil spirit influence. There was a case of insanity in the family of Athamas, King of Thebes. This case of insanity indirectly led to the famous expedition of the Argonauts.

The history of insanity is a great and interesting study. We may consider the case of Ajax and Orestes; of Ulysses, previous to the Trojan war; of Lycurgus, King of the Edones, in Thrase; of Cambyses, King of Persia; and of Solon, who stood inspired on the place of the herald and spoke the words that led the people of Greece to establish a system of finance that made Greece famous for its prosperity, not less than five hundred years after the age in which Solon lived.

Such is a concise idea about insanity presented to the leaders, thinkers or humble ones who read The Progressive Thinker in the year 1902. Anyone who has studied the subject can know that the ancient wise ones had knowledge about the science of mind.

A perfectly healthy mind requires a perfectly healthy body, and it also needs a certain healthy or normal training. Ignorance in some cases is judged to be insanity, and some of these harmless, ignorant ones are held as prisoners in hospitals for the insane in Massachusetts. Such ignorance is the cause of much insanity that helps to fill prisons with criminals. In many cases our legalized and registered physicians in Massachusetts are more ignorant about a person being controlled, obsessed, or inspired by a spirit, or spirits, and know less about healing such than an ordinary intelligent medium.

Secrets of Personal Magnetism Laid Bare

Thousands of Dollars' Worth of Books on Personal Magnetism and Hypnotism to be Given Away by a Noted Philadelphia College.

Hon. James R. Kennedy, of Pennsylvania, Chairman of the Committee on Distribution.

Every One May Now Learn All the Secrets of These Mysterious Sciences at His Own Home.

Hon JAMES R. KENNEY, of Pennsylvania.
Ex-Mayor of Reading' Pa.., noted orator, author and scientist.

"I can honestly and conscientiously say from my long experience in dealing with people and from my personal acquaintance with many of the most prominent men in this country, that there is no other one thing which will help one so much in life as a thorough knowledge of Personal Magnetism," says Hon. James R. Kenney, "and for this reason I accepted the chairmanship of the committee on distribution of works on Personal Magnetism and Hypnotism for the American College of Sciences of Philadelphia.

"The real secrets of Personal Magnetism and Hypnotism have always been jealously guarded by the few who knew them and kept them from the masses of the people. One who understands these sciences has an inestimable advantage in the race of life. I want to put this information in the hands of every ambitious man and woman in this country.

"The American College of Sciences has just appropriated $10,000 to be used in printing books for free distribution, and if this does not supply the demand it will appropriate $10,000 more. The books are absolutely free. They do not cost you a single cent.

"Tell me what kind of work you are engaged in; or, if sick, the disease from which you suffer, and I will send you the book which will put you on the road to success, health and strength. It matters not how successful you are. I will guarantee to help you achieve greater success. The work which I will send you is from the pens of the most eminent specialists of the country: it is richly illustrated with the finest half tone engravings, and is intensely interesting from start to finish. It has been the means of changing the whole current in the lives of hundreds of persons who were ready to give up in despair. You can learn at home in a few days and use personal magnetism in your daily work without the knowledge of your most intimate friends. You can use it to influence others; you can use it to keep others from influencing you. You can positively cure the most obstinate chronic diseases and banish all bad habits.

"If you have not met with the business or social success which you desire; if you are not successful in winning and holding friends; if you are sick, and tired of taking drugs that do not cure; if you care to develop your memory or any other mental faculty to a higher state of perfection; or, lastly, if you wish to possess that subtle, invisible, intangible power that sways and rules the minds of men, you should write me to-day and let me send you a free copy of our new book. It will prove a revelation to you." Address JAMES R. KENNEY, P. L. 11, Commercial Union Building, Philadelphia, Pa.

THE WORLD BEAUTIFUL.

Series one, two and three. By Lilian Whiting. Three choice volumes, each complete in itself, in which spirituality is related to everyday life in such a way as to make the world beautiful. Price, $1.00 each.

THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH,

Or the Future Life According to Science. By Louis Figuier. Translated from the French by S. R. Crocker. A very fascinating work. This fine volume might well have been entitled Spiritualism Demonstrated by Science. It is written in that peculiar interesting style in which French writers excel when they would popularize scientific subjects in adaptation to the needs of the general reader. The author says: "There is a true and respectable idea in Spiritualism," and regards as proved "the fact of communication between superhumans and the inhabitants of earth." Price, $1.50.

ASTRAL WORSHIP

By J. H. Hill, M.D. A valuable contribution to the current discussion of religious problems. The author by illustrations and a planisphere (a representation of the celestial sphere upon a plane with adjustable circles), traces most of the myths which lie at the base of Christianity to, their origin in sun and star worship. The astronomical facts given possess great value, the illustrations rare and curious. The book is bound in only one style—heavy boards. Price $1.

Father Tom and the Pope,

Or a Night at the Vatican. Written probably by Sir Samuel Ferguson. From Blackwood's Edinburg Magazine. This is a humorous account of a rollicksome visit to the Pope of Rome by Father Tom, an Irish priest, armed with a superabundance of Irish wit, two imperial quart bottles of Irish "poteen," and an Irish recipe for "conwounding" the same. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

Three Journeys Around the World

—OR—

Travels in the Pacific Islands,

New Zealand, Australia, Ceylon, India, and other Oriental countries. By J. M. Peebles, A. M., M. D., Ph. D. In this splendid large book Dr. Peebles has concentrated a vast amount of valuable information. It is exceedingly entertaining and readable, and Spiritualism as he found it everywhere in his travels receives due attention, making the book of special value and interest to Spiritualists. 454 large pages, finely bound, at the price of $1.50.

JOYS BEYOND THE THRESHOLD

A Sequel to The To-morrow of Death.

By Louis Figuier. Translated from the French. The To-morrow of Death is written to develop the idea of the permanence of the human soul after death, and its reincarnation in a chain of new beings, whose successive links are unrolled to the bosom of ethereal space. "Beyond the Threshold" continues on the same lines, enlarging and expanding the idea by reasons and considerations drawn from science and philosophy, claiming that the certainty of a new birth beyond our earthly end is the best means of arming ourselves against all weakness in the presence of death, and that the help offered by science and philosophy to that end is far superior to that of any of the existing religions. From beginning to end it is interesting, entertaining, instructive and fascinating, and whether one accepts it all or not, much will have been learned and much pleasure enjoyed in its perusal. Price, $1.50.

Forecasting the Far-Away Future.

There is interesting matter for study in a special from London, to the Inter Ocean, setting forth some distinctly new lines of thought advanced by H. G. Wells, a "scientific novelist" who, it is said, out-Darwins Darwin, and dares to direct a confident gaze upon a future still eons distant, in a lecture at the Royal Institute on "Discovery of the Future." This did not mean an aerial flight or any single development of science, but discovery of the future as a whole.

Along certain lines, with certain limitations, he argued that a working knowledge of the things of the future was practicable and possible. As, during the past century, the amazing searchlight of inference had been passed into the remoter past, so, by seeking for operating causes instead of for fossils, the searchlight of inference might be thrown into the future.

The man of science would believe at last that events in A. D. 4000 were as fixed, settled, and unchangeable as those of A. D. 1600, with the exception of the affairs of man and his children. It might be argued that man, individually and collectively, was an incalculable factor, a new element offering the nature of the inquiry, and stamping it as vain and hopeless, but Wells seemed to favor the idea that man, though complicating, did not alter the essential nature of induction.

He did not believe in the importance of the leading man, and he confessed to a belief that if by some juggling with space and time Caesar, Napoleon, William the Conqueror, and other great individualities had been changed at birth it would not have produced any serious dislocation of the course of destiny. Great men were no more than images and symbols and instruments taken at haphazard by the incessant, consistent forces behind them. They were the pen-nibs which Fate used in her writing, and the more one was inclined to trust these forces behind individuals the more one could believe in the possibility of a reasoned inductive view of the future that would serve us in politics, morals, social contrivances, and in a thousand specious ways.

A deliberate direction of historical, economic, and social study toward the future, and a deliberate and courageous reference to the future in moral and religious discussion, would be enormously stimulating and profitable to the intellectual life. That man is not final is a great and disturbing fact in scientific discovery in the future, and the question, What is to come after man? is the most persistently fascinating insoluble question in the world.

But for the near future some few general statements have grown more certain. Two years ago it was an irresponsible suggestion, but it was the commonplace remark of cabinet ministers that our dense population were in the opening phase of the process of the diffusion of aeration. Secondly, it was inevitable that the mass of the white population of the world would be forced in some way up the scale of efficiency within two or three decades. Thirdly, reasons have been collected showing that in the comparative near future humanity would indefinitely and consciously organize itself into a great world state, purge itself of much that is mean and bestial and dreary in this world.

The lecturer asked why should things cease at man; no creatures lived under changing conditions without undergoing changes. Human society, he said, was never static and would presently cease in its attempt to be static.

Mr. Wells declared: "We are at the beginning of the greatest change that humanity has ever undergone. There will be no shock, as there is no shock at a cloudy daybreak. We are creatures of twilight, but out of our minds and the lineage of our minds will spring minds that will reach forward fearlessly. A day will come—one day in the unending succession of days—when the beings now latent in our thoughts, hidden in our loins, shall stand on this earth as one stands on a footstool, and they shall laugh and reach out their hands among the stars."

In the crowded assembly that listened, interested and enthusiastic, were Dr. Dewar, Sir William Crookes, Prof. Armstrong, Lord Rayleigh, and Sir Frederic Bramwell. The lecture has already aroused widespread interest and will probably be much discussed.

"All Souls Not Immortal."

The only Dr. Parkhurst, of New York, the advocate of moral purity, who in his strenuous hunt for vice went to places where decent men do not go, inveigled the inmates to dance in costumes more scant than the usual ballroom toilet, and turned State's evidence and prosecuted them, has made a stunning declaration. In a recent sermon he startled his hearers by saying that he found nothing in the Bible insuring the soul against destruction. The soul must be "taken care of" or it will surely perish.

"Taken care of?" What does that mean? Why, according to this preacher's views, it must go to Jesus. It must accept Christianity and believe in Christ, else at death it will be blotted out. His sermon has called forth some faint criticism, but really has he not boldly stated a conclusion which has confronted the churches? What evidence have they of the conditions of the spirit after the death of the body? The annihilation of the wicked is an old doctrine, as is the election of the saints.

Dr. Parkhust's heresy or personal opinion is of small moment, but it indicates the unrest and uncertainty everywhere prevalent, even in the highest quarters. Doubt has come to all. Every step calls for excuses, special pleading and apology. To that most vital question which can come to a human being: What of death? the church has only one answer: We don't know!

The Pope and the Bible.

The Progressive Thinker thinks it important that its readers be in constant touch with the religious thought of the world and the various projects to further and solidify the interests of the church in all branches.

For this reason we note the fact that the Pope has appointed a commission to consider the questions at issue as to the authority of the Bible, and collateral relations.

As stated by the Inter Ocean, the commission is composed of Cardinal Parocchi, known for his long experience in dealing with delicate doctrinal questions; Cardinal Segna, distinguished for his profound knowledge of the writings of the church fathers, and Cardinal Vives y Tuto, who stands in Rome as an intellectual giant of the faith.

In addition there are some twelve consultors, among them the most learned Catholic Biblical scholars of Italy, Spain, France, Holland, England, and the United States. The American consultor is Professor Grannan, of the University of Washington.

"The scope of the inquiry," says the Rome correspondent of the London Tablet, "is to ascertain the limits of the freedom allowed to the Catholic exegetist in the Biblical questions of the day, to point out definitely conclusions that must be maintained in the interest of orthodoxy, others that must be rejected as incompatible with or dangerous to divine faith, as well as the debatable ground between the two where each is free to hold his own view.

To attain to these ends the consultors are free to submit ideas from any source, Protestant or rationalistic, as well as Catholic, and may obtain help from any quarter in elaborating their arguments. This provision, as well as the fact that the consultors are drawn from so many different countries, each with its own atmosphere and currents of thought, appears to be a sufficient guaranty that the inquiry will be broad and sincere.

What conclusions the commission may reach it is, of course, impossible to predict. Yet one general prediction may be made. The Roman Catholic Church will stand by the Bible, for its leaders are men of practical sagacity as well as learning. Though they believe that the head of the church is an infallible interpreter of the Bible, which Protestants deny, they know that behind and as the foundation of papal infallibility there must be faith that the Bible is an infallible rule of faith, for without the Bible neither papacy nor church nor Christian religion could exist.

Though they may conclude that some of the lesser wonders which excite Professor Pearson's ridicule are misunderstood or erroneously interpreted, they will cling to the supreme miracle of the incarnation, for without that Christianity would have no foundation. The Roman Catholic Church is standing by the Bible because without the Bible its faith would not be Christian, but something else.

The founders of Protestantism, rejecting the authority of the Pope, rested their faith upon an infallible Bible. Some of their successors are now seeking to destroy that foundation. They may succeed, though that is not likely. But if they should succeed, then the Roman Catholic might be excused for a certain feeling of satisfaction. For if Protestantism should cease to mean faith in the Bible, and in its supreme miracle, then Protestantism would cease to be Christian, and the Roman Catholic Church, which has most steadfastly resisted the onslaughts of the "higher criticism," would remain the only Christian church. This outcome, though possible, is not at all probable.

$100 In Behalf of Spiritualism.

Betting, while rarely desirable under any circumstances, yet in certain cases it answers a specific purpose and does good. The following is not a bet, but hinges closely thereon. The Banner, of Frankfort, Ind., says:

"The proposition on the part of skeptics on Spiritualism to purchase certain paraphernalia for giving bogus manifestations of spirits made by a Frankfort professional man and his friends has brought the believers in Spiritualism to the front with a challenge that cannot fail to be of interest to that portion of the public who have been taking part in the recent discussion on the subject—a proposition which at least shows the sincerity of the Spiritualists in the belief and confidence in the genuineness of Medium Jessup's demonstration.

"A prominent Spiritualist called at the Banner office Saturday afternoon and requested that the Evening Banner publish a challenge to the skeptics, proposing to forfeit $100 to Frankfort charity, the money to be placed in either one of the Frankfort banks, if Medium Jessup is not able to secure the usual manifestations given at his regular seances, such as messages through the horns, the ringing of bells and other such demonstrations under the following conditions: 'That there shall be but three persons in the room besides the medium; that one of these persons shall be Guy Coffin or any other doubter, who shall be permitted to hold Mr. Jessup; that the second can be any witness that the disbelievers may select, and the third a believer in Spiritualism. That the said believer in Spiritualism and the witness are to be tied in order that neither may interfere with the medium and the gentleman who is to guard Mr. Jessup. If the medium fails to produce the usual manifestations after three sittings the $100 of the Spiritualist is to be turned over to Trustee Sims or any other person that the disbelievers may name for distribution among the poor. If the medium thus held and guarded does succeed, then the skeptic's $100 is to be turned over to charity. It is further agreed that the committee of disbelievers shall select the room in which to hold said test, strip it of furniture if they choose and seal the doors and windows.'

"Mr. H. H. Boulden is the gentleman referred to in this article, and the gentleman who may desire to accept the challenge can call at his office in the Steele Block."

A. JACKSON DAVIS.

He Was Never Seated on the Banks of the Crystal Colorado River of Texas.

We give this week a remarkable chapter from "Arabula," by A. J. Davis. It is one of the best demonstrations of the existence of a Deity ever presented to a thoughtful world. As Mr. Davis did not sit at any time "on the grass, interwoven with golden blooms, immediately on the bank of the crystal Colorado of Texas," and evolve a solution of the wonderful problem in connection with the existence of Deity, we can trace the authorship of the thoughts given to another man, Judge Arington, of Chicago, thus giving honor to whom honor is due.

Another Antediluvian Fossil.

Another sample of antediluvian fossilism, if we may form a judgment based on press reports, is afforded by recent utterances of President Schurman, of Cornell University, in a letter written in reply to Gen. Wheaton's comments on a speech of Schurman, at Boston, relating to the government of the Philippine Islands.

It is not within the province of The Progressive Thinker to enter into party politics, but there are questions that rise far above the domain of ordinary partisan politics, into the broader realm of human rites and civil liberty.

It is, it appears, the opinion of President Schurman that the "Christian Filipinos" are the only Filipinos whose wishes or welfare should be considered; that, as he says, "we must eliminate the Mohammedans and heathen tribes."

The Christian Filipinos, in his view, have rights to which the Mohammedans and other non-Christian people are not entitled.

We wonder where Mr. Schurman studied his lessons in the principles of liberty. It could not be in the history of American principles government. If he had studied the history of the formation of our National Constitution, and the principles imbedded therein, and had imbibed a thorough apprehension and appreciation of the same, could he have enunciated such wholly un-American ideas of people's rights?

Instead, he seems to have reverted to the ancient Romish Church idea, that none outside the pale of the church, whether individual or nation, has a right to "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness."

Is President Schurman aware of the fact that the American ideas of human rights, under which he enjoys his civil and religious liberty, were promulgated and formulated in our Declaration of Independence, and embodied in our Constitution, by the pens and labors of non-Christians, or "infidels," such as Thomas Paine, Thomas Jefferson, Ben. Franklin, and others? But he, to be consistent, would exclude all except "Christians," from all title to inalienable human rights.

Buddhists, Confucians, Jews, Mohammedans, etc., have no civil rights alongside the "Christian Filipinos."

President Schurman's idea seems to be that expressed in the olden formula:

Resolved, that the earth belongs to the saints of the Lord.

Resolved, that we (Christians) are the saints.

Blood and Bones of Martyrs.

A press dispatch from Louisville, Ky., says:

"A package containing the bones and dried blood of St. Magnus, a Roman centurion, and St. Bonosa, a Roman virgin, who were martyred in the time of Nero, arrived from Rome at the office of the surveyor of the port at Louisville to-day. The relics will be placed under the altar of St. Martin's Catholic Church in this city. They were taken from the catacombs more than 200 years ago and have since rested in the church of the Convent of Agnai, near Rome."

The Twentieth Century of Christianity and the result—worshiping the bones of some unknown martyrs two thousand years old! Dried blood! A child would know that blood could not be preserved for that time short of a miracle, and what object could God have in preserving the blood of a "virgin" of Nero's time, that some priests might place it under the altar of a church at Louisville? If all the bones of saints, held by the priests and sworn to by cardinal and Pope to be genuine, were gathered together, they would fill a cathedral from floor to dome, a gruesome sight, and every piece of bone would represent an infamous series of lies whereby it became a talisman!

The catacombs furnish an exhaustless supply of material. Skeletons well preserved are piled like wood at some great lumber yard. There are children's bones which furnish relics for the innocents destroyed by Herod. There are bones of women, that may be used for those of the ten virgins. Giant skeletons admirable for the giant killed by David.

Idolatry! How far has the cult of Christianity advanced beyond the medicine man?

A Peculiar Method to Raise Money to Support the Church.

The church at North Greenfield, O., is in debt, as most churches are, and wants money to pay the pastor's salary. The deacons have canvassed the members, and the goats of the surrounding country, and yet they have not half enough. If they do not have more, the pastor will have a call to other pastures. They hit on the following scheme, which ought to fill the treasury, that is if the fair ones of the church do not object, and no doubt their consent was obtained before the publication of the proposal. This is no less than a "Hugging Society."

The society by-laws provide that for hugging a girl under sixteen not more than two minutes, a charge of fifteen cents shall be made; for girls between sixteen and twenty, fifty cents; between twenty and twenty-five, seventy-five cents; for schoolma'ams, forty cents; another man's wife, one dollar; old maids, three cents each, without time limit.

As it is all Christian and in the line of religious devotion, it may be all right, yet we should seriously object were our daughters members. What can be more degrading and subversive of modesty, than to sell such favors indiscriminately to whoever gives the money? It may be in keeping with church morality, and give no shock to the sense of propriety, but Spiritualism could not, nor would not tolerate it for a moment.

FINAL REPLY

Of the Bangs Sisters, in the Mangasarian Controversy.

In regard to this contention we have received many letters from our patrons, some of whom have been great skeptics, commending us in our course. Sufficient has been written in our behalf and published to show the folly of attempting to convince any one person, be he great or small, of the truth of spirit communication, hoping thereby to gain a strong adherent to the cause.

A Mr. Joseph Singer, whom we do not know, but who, we infer was the companion, the chaperon of Mr. Mangasarian, has written his song and sung it in the late issue of The Progressive Thinker. He has touched the imaginary wire he hung between two cities with his tuning-fork, and has produced a medley of jargon.

Mr. Singer assumes the right to affirm that our refusal to reconsider our words can have but one interpretation, that is the one he would give it. That remark is on a par with all his other statements, and unworthy of further notice.

Mr. Singer may be very capable to suggest and dictate letters on some subjects, but we are not now in need of his services.

We desire to make but a few points in this letter. We sat once with Mr. Mangasarian, and he expressed himself as puzzled, but not prepared to attribute the phenomena to the manifestation of departed spirits. He desired and sought a second sitting, suggesting his own conditions. This we granted, but when he came to meet the appointment he imposed entirely new conditions, and such as would obviate the necessity of a medium other than himself, as he insisted on holding the slates in his own hands, standing at a great distance from the medium, announcing in a very emphatic manner that he knew no writing could be obtained. This defiant attitude of Mr. Mangasarian makes it impossible for us or any medium to get a communication for him. Under harmonious conditions we have often obtained marvelous results without coming in direct contact with the sitter or the slates, but owing to the positive demeanor of Mr. Mangasarian we could not hope for good results unless more harmonious conditions were complied with, to overcome his direct positive contact with the slates we requested him to lay them on the table in plain view, neither of us to touch them. This he refused to do, and the seance was discontinued.

We do not make it a practice to sit for people simply to gratify their idle curiosity or to prove that we can produce the desired phenomena. We would of course be glad to have Mr. Mangasarian and all the world accept of the philosophy of Spiritualism, which is the philosophy of life, but we are not in the proselyting business, and do not believe that the cause can be aided by such an effort. There has been an abundance of phenomena in the world within the last fifty years, and of so wonderful a character as to convince the most skeptical who seek in the right spirit.

Investigators of this subject must adopt the plan of the scientist. Several years before he departed for the spirit world, Prof. Coues, of the Smithsonian Institute, announced in the Religio-Philosophical Journal, a spiritual paper published in this city at that time, that "independent slate-writing is a fact in nature." He had learned this by the energetic, but gentle spirit of the scientist who tries many ways and after many years to coax from nature the revelations of her mysteries.

We do not desire to sit for any one who does not adopt the spirit of the true scientist. We doubt not the high character of Mr. Mangasarian, but his spirit and method of investigation are wrong. We do not object to test conditions, but they must be reasonable; that is, within the possibility of spirit power, for there are some things that spirits cannot do. Skeptical investigators generally overlook this point. They refuse to comply with conditions that Nature herself imposes. These conditions we have found by an experience of many years, during which time we have been subject to the trials and performed the feats of courtesy of all the heroes and heroines that Mr. Singer so inharmoniously sings about.

We do not turn away honest investigators. We think the editor of The Progressive Thinker would verify our statement that we have spent much time in efforts to convince honest skeptics, and without gathering any of the shekels from Mr. Singer's wire. We sit for very few Spiritualists. Ninety-nine per cent of our visitors are skeptics, and when we fail to get results we make no charges.

Mr. Mangasarian's second sitting cost him nothing, it cost us our time and energies.

We have made a full statement of the case, and do not see that any good can result by a continuance of newspaper controversy. We are busy getting communications for those who are willing to receive them. Respectfully,

BANGS SISTERS.

A Test Case.

Dr. Joseph P. Gordon and Dr. Nannie A. Gordon are magnetic healers at Rockford, Ill. The Spiritualists of that state will no doubt be interested in Dr. J. P. Gordon's statement, made to this office, January 28, on the status of the litigation started against him by the State Board of Health for violation of our present medical statutes. The case is uncomplicated by the administration of medicines, or drugs, by the defendant. His words are: "I received your letter dated January 21. In answer, will say my case is now in the Supreme court. I am looking for them to report every day. I have beaten them in the three lower courts, and I think I will this time, but it is hard to tell. I have practiced in this state two years and six months and have been located in this office (Stewart Building) all the time. I will let you know how the opinion is rendered from the Supreme Court as soon as I hear."

So we have a test case before the court of last resort in the state much earlier than once seemed possible, because of Dr. Gordon's individual grit. Inquiries made by me recently at the office of the Chicago attorney for the State Board of Health developed total ignorance, whether real or assumed, I cannot say, of the case of Dr. Gordon.

Let us hope for a speedy decision favorable to the defendant and the principle of individual medical freedom. Who should reimburse Dr. G. for his personal outlay in making this contest?

GEO. B. WARNE,
President Ill. S. S. A.

Dr. Louis H. Freedman.

Dr. Freedman, the Australia healer, has been arrested by the State Medical Board, for healing magnetically. Every healer in the state should contribute something to aid him in this fight against the medical monopoly, for it may be their turn next. Help him, you who can. Address him at No. 3036 Indiana avenue, Chicago, Ill.

FROM WASHINGTON, D. C.

The N. S. A. Secretary Offers Some Notes.

It gives me pleasure to again make report to you and your readers of the progress of the Cause in the good city of Washington, and also of the N. S. A. work in other directions. Here, the three local societies hold their weekly Sunday meetings, each attended with appreciation by interested and increasing audiences. During the month of January that grand inspired worker, J. Clegg Wright, has been teaching the people at Masonic Temple, and holding week evening classes, which have proved "A feast of reason, and a flow of soul" to all who have been privileged to listen to his utterances. During the month, the popular medium, J. Homer Altemus, has followed the evening lecture of Mr. Wright, before the First Association at Masonic Temple, with tests and communications that bear consoling and convincing testimony of spiritual truth, to the hungry souls who receive them. During February the lecture work for this society will be discoursed by the guides of Mrs. M. T. Longley, and the spirit manifestations will be produced through the well known and popular mediumship of Mr. P. L. O. A. Keeler, of this city. Mr. F. A. Wood, the genial and untiring president of the First Association, is doing a grand work for the Cause in his quiet way and we all feel that his heart is in the work and that the angels bless him for his fidelity, and the same may be said of our true philanthropist, T. J. Mayer, as of others in our midst.
